The addresses of brethren Babcock and Bailey we expect to give entire in our next and therefore will not attempt a synopsis of them here.

The following resolutions were adopted, after remarks by L. Crandall, J. M. Allen, and others:—

> Resolved, That this Society approves the proposition of the Board, to obtain a building in the city of New York for the transaction of its business, and would recommend that the Board take such measures as they may deem necessary to secure this important object.
> Resolved, That we would cordially and earnestly invite our ministers and others to write more frequently for our denominational publications.

The next meeting of the Society is to be held at Adams, N. Y., in October, 1853.

THE TRACT SOCIETY.

The American Sabbath Tract Society held its Ninth Anniversary in the afternoon of Second-day, Sept. 13.

The usual introductory exercises were followed with an address from the President, N. V. Hull, on the reasons which impel Sabbath-keepers to prosecute the work of tract distribution.

The Treasurer's Report, and the Annual Report of the Board, were then read. The Report of the Board states that during the past year the Society's series of sixteen tracts has been thoroughly revised, and that they are all now stereotyped. A large edition of them has been printed for sale and gratuitous distribution, and also an edition for binding. Of the volume, about 600 copies have been sold, and the Board have determined to present a copy of it to the library of every College and Theological Seminary in the United States, and also to supply the saloons of many first-class steamers with copies properly labeled. Tract No. 9 of the series, and the Address to the Baptists, have been published in French, and distributed to a considerable extent in Canada. Three colporteurs have been employed by the Society during portions of the year.

J. W. Morton moved the adoption of the report, and sustained the motion by an interesting address.

An address was then delivered by Wm. M. Fahnestock, on the following resolution:—

> Resolved, That the encouraging indications of the times demand increased alacrity and perseverance, at the hands of Sabbath-keepers, in the circulation of our Tract Publications throughout the length and breadth of the land.

A gentleman named Lambert, who has labored to some extent as a teacher and colporteur in Canada, occupied half an hour in a statement of his labors, and of his recent experience in considering the claims of the Sabbath.

Wm. M. Jones followed with remarks in support of this resolution:—

> Resolved, That in our efforts for the restoration of the Bible Sabbath, the world is our field, and the love of Christ our constraining motive.

A letter was then read by James A. Begg, of Glasgow, Scotland; the receipt of which the Corresponding Secretary was instructed to acknowledge, expressing to Mr. Begg the Christian sympathy and regard which the members of this Society cherish towards him in his labors of love.

We give the letter of Mr. Begg to-day, and we hope in due time to be able to give sketches of the addresses mentioned.

Letter from Mr. Begg.

To the Directors and Members of the American Sabbath Tract Society:—

Dear Brethren,—I desire to express thankfulness on your account, and prayer in your behalf. I give thanks to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, that he hath put it into your hearts, and afforded to you the means and opportunity, of being fellow-workers with Him in recalling men to the enjoyment of the blessing that there is in truly remembering the Sabbath day to keep it holy; and I pray that grace may be given unto you all, enabling you to approve yourselves unto those for whose enlightenment you have combined, as "a band of men whose hearts God hath touched."

When Israel was faithful in the observance of the Sabbath, it was "a sign" that the Lord did sanctify them. It still remains so in regard to "the sons of the stranger that join themselves to the Lord, to serve Him, and to love the name of the Lord, to be His servants, every one that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it." More is thus demanded of us than acquiescence in the soundness of the argument, or the clearness of the evidence, by which the truth concerning it is established. Even the truth may be held in unrighteousness, through men's practice not according with their convictions. The blessing is in keeping the Sabbath from polluting it. It is this which makes it the sign, as it is this which constitutes it a test. In regard to the belief of doctrine which makes no immediate demand upon the external conduct, when the judgment is convinced, there is nothing to prevent an immediate avowal. But the keeping of the Sabbath aright is an evidence of faith and love, their possession being requisite to enable a man to submit himself to the practical influence of God's commandment, so as to be sanctified by Him.

It is to this, dear brethren, let us ever bear in remembrance, that all our efforts must be directed, while endeavoring to lead men to a knowledge of the truth. Faith must, however, be based on the word of God, as practice must follow or accompany faith. An intellectual perception of the will and purpose of the Most High may be aided by a clear exhibition of the Scripture statements on the subject of the Sabbath; and remonstrance may be addressed wherever there is the unfaithfulness which the neglect or perversion of the Sabbath implies. Some err from ignorance only; others are obstinately wedded to the error they have adopted. Yet, in all, conscience hath place; and the Spirit that inspired the Word is still capable of making it effectual in the human heart. Christ Himself, and Peter, and Paul, and all the holy men of God, reasoned out of the Scriptures, and when this is rightly done, we are still encouraged to hope that with us as with them, some will attend to the things spoken, the Lord opening their hearts thereunto.

As of old, when the law of God was made void by human traditions, so is it still, even among the people of God. In some cases, so inveterate is the evil, that the distinction between the law of the Lord and the tradition by which it is overlaid and concealed, is wholly destroyed. Men have come to receive the word of their fellow-men as if it were the word of the living God; and, often unconsciously, they expose themselves to the threatened work of judgment by the Lord upon those of whom He says, "Their fear toward me is taught by the precept of men." And yet, not only is the imagined change of the Sabbath a mere tradition, but the tradition itself is that of a confessedly corrupt church. Still more remarkable, and still more reprehensible is it, that the warning of an inspired Apostle—and he the Apostle of the Gentiles—that there should come "a falling away"—should have so failed in putting the church upon her guard against resting any thing on such tradition. Surely, in such circumstances, the friends of the Redeemer ought to have been more upon their guard against the danger to which their faith and practice were exposed by the too ready reception of the traditions of a church on which inspiration has thus placed the brand of apostasy. But the warning was little heeded, and has had little influence on the practice of those for whose guidance it was designed.

Apart even from the apostolic warning, it might well have excited doubts and fears as to the acceptance of the traditionary Sabbath, to find that even the less faithful Ecclesiastical Historians of a subsequent age distinctly intimate that the churches of Rome and Alexandria were the first to abandon the divinely-appointed Sabbath—Rome and Alexandria having been the grand nurseries of most of the heresies with which the church of Christ was so early overrun! Ecclesiastical Councils of a later date authoritatively legislated for the perpetuation of this and other errors; and as Rome attained that place of power and influence, over the west especially, to which her ambition had so long aspired, the memorial of God's creation rest was decried as Jewish, while Sunday and saints' days were exalted to a place to which, according to the word of God, they have no rightful claim. Thus these days of human appointment, first put on terms of equality with the Sabbath of the Lord, afterwards usurped its place, and anathemas were uttered against all who, in reverence of the law of their Lord and example of their Saviour, refused to allow tradition to thrust aside eternal truth.

Ages of superstition confirmed the false position which had thus been assumed; and the Council of Trent, looking back upon what Rome had done, declared (Catechism, Quest. xviii.) that "it hath pleased the Church of God, in her wisdom, that the religious celebration of the Sabbath day should be transferred to the Lord's day." "We also learn from the sacred volume," they indeed add, as one of the reasons of transference, but without citing chapter or verse, "that the first day of the week was held sacred because on that day the creation of the world commenced." The sacred volume speaks of the Sabbath in connection with the finishing of creation, not its commencement; but such was the "wisdom" of a General Council of a Church under "strong delusion, that they should believe a lie," because they received not the love of the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness. Other days, accordingly, says the Council of Trent, besides those in honor of the mysteries of our redemption, were instituted, the first of which are "those dedicated to the most blessed virgin Mother; and also to the Apostles, Martyrs, and the other saints reigning with Christ." (Buckley's Translation, pp 398,399.) The example and admonition of saints are despised, while their names are used to sanction evils against which they protest!

Imperfect was the Reformation towards which the faith and devotedness of Luther so signally contributed. With his whole heart bent on restoring to its place the doctrine of justification by faith, the Sabbath of the Lord had little other place in his creed, than it had received in that of the Church which he denounced as otherwise so corrupt. Calvin followed, in the aim at reformation. More strict in some respects, and more distinguished for logic than for love, he also failed to discover the delusions which had prevailed as to the day and design of the Sabbath, and was as little disposed to return to the position regarding it from which Rome had so sadly swerved. Neither he nor Luther recognized any day as now specially sanctified and blessed of God. Any day, in their estimation, was equally good with that which alone the Lord had chosen, for the edification of the Church and preaching to sinners—and to these ends alone, irrespective of the glory of Him who made the world, did they confine their contemplation of its purpose.

The inconsistency of allowing such scope to human caprice in dealing with a divine appointment, was too obvious to escape attention; and at a still later period, England gave consolidation to the apostacy by misapplying to the day of the Church's adoption all the sacred sanctions of God's law. Affirming that divinely the change had been made, and calling Sunday the Sabbath, the injunction of the Fourth Commandment is now read in connection with the first day of the week instead of the seventh. The promises of God to Sabbath observance, and the terrors of the Lord dissuading from Sabbath desecration, are used unhesitatingly in the present day to sustain a self-evidently false proposition.

Under the air of confidence with which this is done, however, the intelligent observer can scarcely fail to perceive that there are misgivings of the soundness of the law and the logic enunciated. There is an unwillingness to argue on the subject of the alledged change; a confession of the want of direct evidence in its support, a pleading of general practice, or the assumption that it matters not which day we observe—and all this by men zealous for the maintenance of a day unsanctioned by the Word. "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this Word, it is because there is no truth in them." In the light of the Lord, and the might of His grace, be it our aim and prayer, my dear brethren, to be enabled to rend away the veil from many hearts. A wide-spread confederacy has been robbing the Redeemer of His glory, under a plea of exalting His name. He who on earth exclaimed, "Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets," hath not the less love to either, that He is now in glory. In his word and by his providence he again inquires, "Who is on the Lord's side?" Be it our part to be ever willing to be yielded to His hand, and to avail ourselves of all opportunities for the advancement of his truth. The printed page, composed in prayerful spirit, may be read in secret, and be meditated in silence, and be given effect to in the heart, when the ear has been closed against the preacher's voice. The message of love and truth may be borne, too, beyond the reach of your own observation, watched over by Him who distinguishes between the chaff and the wheat, and the fruit of all your labor may never be seen until the day of the appearing of the Lord we love and serve. That it may then be accepted and abundant, is the prayer of, dear brethren,

Yours in the love of the truth,

J. A. BEGG.

Church Action for Temperance.—The Executive Committee of the New York State Temperance Society, deeply impressed with the importance of securing the coöperation and support of the several religious denominations of the State, in the present juncture of the cause of Temperance, unanimously passed, at a recent meeting, the following resolution, for which they beg leave to bespeak the favorable consideration of the numerous Presbyteries, Associations, Classes, Conventions and Synods, about to hold their autumnal meetings:—

Resolved, That the Corresponding Secretary be instructed to address the several ecclesiastical bodies about to meet in different parts of the State, and respectfully request them to take such action as shall seem, in their judgment, best fitted to advance generally the Cause of Temperance, and to secure specially the adoption of the Maine Law by the Legislature of the State at the next annual meeting.

HENRY MANDEVILLE, Chairman of the Com.
William H. Burleigh, Cor. Sec.
Albany, Aug. 16, 1852.

Dr. Bridgeman on China.—Rev. Dr. Bridgeman, who has been for twenty-three years a missionary in China, was one of the speakers at the meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, held in Troy last week. He said that when he went to China, there was but one missionary laborer in that country, while it was a capital offense to preach the Gospel. Now the country is open to a great extent, and seventy missionaries are in the field. Dr. Bridgeman estimates the population of China at 400,000,000. He appealed most earnestly to members and officers of the Board in behalf of those perishing souls. In October next he expects to return to his field of labor.

Salaries of Clergymen.—The Providence Journal states that the clergymen of Connecticut are complaining of their salaries, as altogether inadequate to the comfortable support of themselves and families. A pamphlet has been issued by the clergymen of the Episcopal Church, setting forth their grievance. It states that the average salary of the clergy, is not over $450.

The North-Western Association.—The next session of the Seventh-day Baptist North-Western Association is appointed to be held at Albion, Dane Co., Wisconsin, commencing on the 29th day of September, 1852, being the fourth day of the week before the first Sabbath in October.

An Affecting Narrative.

We copy from the Erie Commercial Advertiser the following interesting and affecting narrative of the escape from death of Mr. Carley and his sister, a delicate girl, by the sinking of the Atlantic. Mr. Carley is a young man in delicate health. The Advertiser says the narrative was given with great emotion, and brought tears to the eyes of many in the large assembly who listened to it. Mr. Carley said in substance:—

"If any one has cause for thankfulness on this occasion, it is myself. I am from Vermont; and, with my sister, a poor consumptive, was on board the Atlantic. I was traveling with her for her health. It was not without great fears of its perils that we undertook the journey. We went on board the Atlantic at Buffalo on Tuesday evening, and found her already crowded with passengers. I went to the steward to get a state-room for my sister. He told me they were all taken in the upper cabin, but he thought he could get her one below. We went down and found that all the rooms in the lower cabin were also taken. He, however, prepared as comfortable a bed as possible on a sofa. She tried to sleep, but found the air so close and suffocating that it was with difficulty that she could breathe. We again went to the upper cabin; and the steward then told me that he could furnish my sister a berth in the upper part of the cabin. I took her to it, and afterward myself found a berth in the forward part. It was the lower one of the three, and the two above it were already occupied. Being much fatigued, and now satisfied that my sister was in comfortable quarters, I was soon asleep. I was suddenly startled from my sleep by a tremendous crash, and awoke to find the outer side of my state-room broken in, and the two upper berths, with their occupants, on top of me.

"As soon as I could extricate myself, my first thought was for my sister. I went immediately to her room and found her awake. I told her that something had happened to the boat, but I couldn't tell which it was; but that I thought we had better be prepared for any danger. I went back to my berth and put on the rest of my clothes. I was in no haste, as there had been no alarm given. I went back to my sister's room; she had already dressed herself, and putting on her bonnet and mantilla, met me at the door, with her carpet bag on her arm. Just then a man came to the cabin door, and, looking in, told us that the boat would sink in ten minutes; and he exhorted us to pray for the forgiveness of our sins, and look to God for mercy. This was the first serious intimation we had of the extent of our danger. We went out on the deck, and had been there only a few minutes when the water began to rise around us. It was soon up to our knees. I was calm and collected. I was not afraid to die; all my care was for my poor slender sister. I could not swim. We therefore looked around for some means of sustaining ourselves in the water, should we be compelled to leave the boat.

"We found a couple of chairs, and took each of us one in our hands. The stern was the only part of the boat out of the water. We went to the railing, and my sister asked me to lift her up on it. I tried to, but was too weak, and called some men who were near to my assistance. We raised her up, and then there was another woman who wanted us to raise her up. We did so, and afterward I got up myself. My sister and I still kept hold of our chairs. Every moment we expected the boat would go down with a sough, and that the water would swallow us all up. We still clung to the railing, locked in each others' embrace. Soon we saw the propeller coming to our assistance, and a cry of joy burst from every lip. Shortly she was alongside of us. We all rushed to get aboard of her. I made an effort to raise my sister over the side, but was too weak. I made as powerful an effort as I was capable of, but my feet slipping, I fell between the two vessels, and sunk beneath the surface of the water. Grasping about I caught hold of a rope, by which I raised myself to the surface. But I was too weak to raise myself any further; and was every moment becoming still more exhausted. I saw nothing of my sister after I fell, and supposed, of course, she was lost. I was so weak I could not for a long time make my cries heard. I had been in the water about half an hour, and was about giving up all hope of being rescued, when I was discovered. Another rope was thrown me, and I was drawn up on the boat. What was my joy—the first female I met was my sister!"

Awful Tragedy.

Two brothers, Hiram and Warren Francisco, residents of this county, and well known in this community as respectable and peaceable citizens, have been for some time selling clocks in Jackson County, in this State. They usually travel different routes, but make a practice of meeting each other frequently. They agreed to meet at a public house in the vicinity of Brownstown last Friday night. One of the brothers reached the tavern about 9 o'clock, and inquired if his brother had arrived, and was informed by the landlord that he had not. After eating his supper, he called for a light and asked to be shown a bed. The landlord informed him that he had no candles about the house, but that, if he would follow him, he would take him to a bed. Francisco followed the landlord into a dark room, and undressed himself and retired to rest.

The bed seemed to be wet, and having some matches about him, he struck a light. Upon examining the bed, he found that it was wet with blood. Discovering a candle on a table near by, he lit it, and, looking under the bed, saw the body of his brother, with his throat cut from ear to ear, and perfectly lifeless. Fastening the door immediately, he proceeded to load a revolver, which he had, but before he could do so there was an effort made by several men to enter his room. Pretending not to be alarmed, he asked them to wait until he dressed himself. As soon as he had finished loading his pistol, he opened the door, and the landlord and two other men rushed on him, when he fired two barrels of his pistol, immediately killing the landlord and one of his accomplices, after which the other man fled.

We further learn that Francisco went before a Justice of the Peace in Brownstown and surrendered himself up, but, after an examination of the case, the Justice released him.

Some of the above statements may be exaggerated, but in the main we believe them to be true.

Shocking Accident.

We find the following account of a shocking accident on Casadaga Lake, on the 2d inst., in the Fredonian Advertiser. It is drawn up from the editor's personal inquiries and observations:—

It appears that a large number of young gentlemen and misses, from the villages of Sinclearville, Delanti and Casadaga, had assembled at the latter place for a pic-nic party on the island in Casadaga Lake. The principal portion of the party, consisting of twenty-four persons, embarked in two boats, (five in a skiff and nineteen in a scow,) for the purpose of rowing to the island, while the remainder passed around by the shore. A stiff breeze was blowing from the south, and when about midway across, one of the row locks of the skiff suddenly broke, and such was the alarm produced by this mishap as well as the gale, that in the frantic movements of the girls, the boat was capsized and the occupants thrown into the water. While this scene was transpiring in full view of the other party, the same spirit of alarm and confusion was communicated to the scow, and that was also capsized and its passengers plunged into the lake. The disaster then became complete. Those belonging to the skiff, however, were soon recovered, but the scow was less fortunate. Eight of its occupants, notwithstanding the exertions used by all able to render assistance, were drowned.

European News.

The steamer Europa, and Humboldt, with one week later news from Europe, have arrived at New York.

There is a great dearth of news by these arrivals.

From the number of ships advertised for Australia, it would appear there is no falling off in the demand for either freight or passage. The tunnage likely to sail between this date and the end of September, from English and Scotch ports, is estimated at little under 80,000 tuns.

The town of Wasa, in Finland, was destroyed hy fire on the 11th; only the Court House and four houses being left standing. The town was founded in 1606, by Charles IX. of Sweden, and contained about 3,200 inhabitants.

A letter from Warsaw of the 17th says that the origin of the cholera, at present committing such ravages in the neighborhood of Kalisch, arose from making some excavations in the cemetery of Lask, near Kalisch where the victims of the cholera of 1832 were buried. Almost immediately after leaving work, several of the workmen, employed in the excavation, were seized with the epidemic, which has since spread with great malignity.

Macaulay's health is so feeble that it is doubted if he will be able to take his seat in the new Parliament, to which he has been elected for Edinburgh.

The agricultural accounts from Scotland are highly satisfactory, and are no less so from most parts of England.

The Irish flax crop this season, promises to be very abundant, especially in the province of Ulster.

Underground Railroad.—One evening last week, a family of fifteen fugitives, (including children and grand-children,) came into this village (says the corning paper) by the mail train, and stopped over night. Their fare had been paid to Dunkirk by the liberality of some friends along their route from the South. Notice was soon given to those who eagerly embrace the opportunity of speeding on the panting fugitive, and further means raised to carry them to Canada. It was deemed prudent to send an advance to Dunkirk, lest the slave-catcher might lie in wait for his moveable "chattels," and accordingly M. F. Lucas and Daniel Deming went on in the morning to guard against surprise. Providentially, all was safe. The family left in the afternoon, reaching Dunkirk at night, and were soon safely housed in one of the up-lake steamers, Mr. Lucas accompanying them. The noble Captain, on reaching Detroit River, took occasion to wood and water at Malden, on the Canada side, thus enabling the fugitives to avoid the risk of a recapture at Detroit. Language cannot express their grateful feelings when their feet trod upon the free soil of Canada.

Railroad Accident.—An accident occurred on the New Haven Railroad on Fourth-day, Sept. 8th, which, for a moment, threatened to be of a very serious character. It appears that the switch tender at the Housatonic Bridge, near Bridgeport, on going to his dinner, neglected to adjust the switch at that point; and when the morning express train from Boston reached that place, the locomotive, tender, and baggage car, were precipitated over the side of the bridge. Fortunately, the connection between the baggage and passenger cars either broke or was loosed by some one—otherwise all the passengers would undoubtedly have been dragged over into the river, and the result would have been a dreadful loss of life. The engineer and fireman, on discovering the approach of danger, sprang from their posts, and escaped with slight bruises. Our friend Maxson Rogers, of Williamsburgh, was on board with his family, and describes the scene as one of great excitement, and the escape as very narrow.

The Freeholder (Anti-Rent) anticipates its usual publication to inform the tenantry of the Patroon that Judge Harris, after considering the arguments between one and two years, has finally given his opinion in the suit commenced by Attorney General Chatfield in behalf of the People vs. William P. Van Rensselaer. It says that Judge H. has decided that Van Rensselear's paper title is illegal and void; that with regard to the lands which have been occupied for forty years under the title from Van Rensselaer, possession is a bar against the claim of the State, but that in respect to unoccupied lands of the Manor, Van Rensselaer has notice.

The brave and talented Col. Freaner, whose letters, under the signature of "Mustang," were so justly admired during the Mexican War, has probably fallen a victim to savage barbarity, near the southern boundary of Oregon.

SUMMARY.

One of the most diabolical attempts at wholesale murder that has ever come to our knowledge, was perpetrated Monday night, on the line of the Hudson River Railroad, in the vicinity of Burnham's Hotel, at Bloomingdale. It appears that some villain or villains, embedded one end of an iron rail in the earth to the depth of two feet, with the upper end slanted off in the northern direction, so that the Evening Express train from Albany, on reaching the point, shortly after ten o'clock P. M., ran at full speed against it, staving in the front of the locomotive, and completely disabling it. Fortunately, and miraculously, however, no person was injured.

We have a report of another Anti-Rent outrage at Berlin, Rensselaer County, and the death of one of the disguised parties, on Saturday night. Several persons, disguised as Indians, went to the house of Mr. Shaw, and after arousing him, called on him to come out, which he refused to do, and they threatened to burn his premises. He ordered them off, and told them if they persisted in their attempt he would fire upon them. They, however, made demonstrations of carrying their threat into effect, when Mr. Shaw fired a revolver, killing a man named Joseph Wilbeck, of Nassau, and wounding two others.

Hon. W. A. Gorman, member of the House of Representatives from Indiana, and one of the Committee to investigate the causes of explosions and disasters on the rivers and lakes, was among the passengers on the Reindeer, and just previous to the explosion was standing on the upper deck, almost directly over the boiler, conversing upon that subject. While the landing was made at Bristol he went out on the promenade deck, and, like the others there, escaped without injury. Mr. Johnson, of the House, was also on the boat, and escaped uninjured.

On Tuesday night, the Oregon for Mobile, landed several passengers at East Pascagonia wharf, but in consequence of the heavy wind and rain, they concluded to stay at the warehouse on the pier-head until morning. After breakfast, some of them who had families on shore started up the wharf and reached the shore in safety. About 11 o'clock, the gale increased, and in a few minutes the warehouse, pier-head, and the entire wharf were swept away, together with the three persons who had remained in the warehouse.

The Postmaster of West Killingly, in this State, has been arrested and held to bail by Judge Judson, for detaining for a number of days, a package of postage stamps sent from the department at Washington, in the mail, and addressed to another Postmaster, with the design to embezzle the said stamps. It appears that other packages of stamps had been missed, which should have passed through the West Killingly Office; and the special agent of the department laid his plans so as to know.

We learn, (says the Watertown Jeffersonian, 6th,) that a fire broke out in the red-cedar swamp in that part of Henderson known as Six Town Point, on Sunday week, and that some 1,000 acres of land, valuable for its timber, had been burned over up to Saturday last. Fears were entertained for the safety of the light-house; and, but for timely assistance, that structure would have fallen a prey to the flames. The damage is immense, but of the amount we have heard no estimate.

The Woman's New York State Temperance Society will hold a meeting at Seneca Falls on Thursday the 14th of October next. Societies auxiliary to the State Society, and all Women's Temperance organizations, are requested to send Delegates, to take part in the deliberations of the meeting. All men and women throughout the State interested in this new movement of Women in the temperance cause, are earnestly invited to attend.

William Trotter and Isaac James had a difficulty at a ball in Steubenville, Ohio, two weeks since, which led to various hostile demonstrations. On the evening of Friday, the 27th ult, they met at the corner of High and Market-sts., high words passed between them, which led to blows, and this to the use of a weapon by Trotter. James fled, was pursued, received five stabs, fell, and died about seven hours afterward. Trotter was arrested on Saturday, 28th, and also James Shouse and C. C. Cable, who are alleged to be in some way implicated.

A dispatch dated Buffalo, Saturday, Sept. 11, 1852, says: Wreck of the steamer Atlantic, in marine armor, was made yesterday. The diver went down 105 feet, and experienced no difficulty; but the pressure on the air pipe was so great as to cause a fear of its bursting, and the man was consequently pulled up. A stronger hose is being constructed, and another attempt will be made on Monday, weather permitting. M. Maillefort feels confident of success.

The steamboat Reindeer was discovered to be on fire at the Bristol Landing at 4 o'clock, Friday morning, and by 5 she had burned to the water's edge, nothing being saved from the boat. No lives were lost. There are many conjectures as to the probable cause of the fire. Some think it to have been the work of an incendiary, but there is nothing to justify this conclusion. The general impression is, that it took fire from a spark from a passing boat, or from a cigar carelessly brushed, or even by spontaneous combustion.

A dispatch dated Fort Plain, Friday, Sept. 10, 1852, says: Last night, as a Polish pedler, named N. Franklin, was returning from the State Fair, he was followed by two men, and, while on his way from the depot to the village, they seized him and made off with his box, which contained jewelry to the amount of $200, and $75 in cash. This occurred at about 8 P. M., and within twenty rods of some houses.

The Colored People of Ohio held a Convention at Cleveland on the 9th, which was attended by some five hundred of their number. They discussed the means of improving their own condition, especially by instruction in the Mechanical Trades, to which they have now great difficulty in gaining access, owing to the bitter prejudices against them. Their proceedings were orderly, pertinent, and dignified.

The Mount Vernon Bank, of Foster, R. I., was entered some time between Saturday afternoon and Monday morning, and $10,300 in bills of the bank stolen. About $7,000 were of the denomination of $50, and were numbered mostly from 400 to 500, $2,000 of which had never been put in circulation. The balance of the bills were mostly in $10, $20, $50 and $100.

The whaling bark Belle, of Fairhaven, returned to New Bedford, Sept. 10, after an absence wanting only three months of eight years, during which period she took 5,750 barrels of oil. Captain Handy states that in consequence of the desertion of nearly the whole of his crew at Sidney, he was compelled to remain there four months in 1851. He also speaks of the gold excitement in Australia as being kept alive in a great measure by grossly exaggerated statements of the success of the miners. And further says, that the sufferings experienced by the adventurers in Australia are far more severe than any thing heard of in California.

The Coroner's Jury in the case of persons lost on board the steamer Reindeer, on the Hudson River, is as follows: The Jury find that the said persons, each and every one of them, came to their deaths and wounds by injuries received on board the steamboat Reindeer, which said injuries were occasioned by suffocation and scalding occasioned by the explosion of the flue-box connection of the after boiler in said boat; and said persons further find, that said explosion took place on board said boat at Malden, in the town of Saugerties.

The Ogdensburg News says that at the late fire in that town, one very remarkable fact occurred, creating a good deal of alarm, by the explosion or bursting of the flagying in front of the burning buildings. A Year of Music for Nothing!—almost.

THE object of this work is to furnish, 1.—A weekly supply of new and choice music. 2.—A complete and unusual Course of Musical Instruction. 3—Fearless and trustworthy Criticisms of Musical Pieces, Works, and Performances, and 4—Entertaining Musical Reading, together with a comprehensive Synopsis of events and things Musical, as they shall transpire; all to be furnished in a style of taste and elegance in harmony with the subjects treated of, and the refined minds of those to whom such topics are addressed.

The Size of The Musical World and Times is that which is most conducive to convenience and beauty; being a Royal Quarto of sixteen pages, ten by fourteen inches in size, or more than double the size of the pages of magazines. It is printed on handsome paper and clear type; and its appearance is such as to render it an appropriate ornament of the Pianoforte, or Parlor table.

Music.—Each number of the Musical World and Times will contain at least FOUR PAGES of superior and popular music, making over TWO HUNDRED PAGES OF MUSIC YEARLY; which, bought at Music Stores would cost, at least, $25.

Sacred Music.—Particular attention will be paid to this department, and the wants of country choirs and families will be carefully studied and met.

Secular Music.—The best possible variety of Secular Music, Vocal and Instrumental, will be regularly given, to supply which, the most eminent composers will render service.

Music for Little Fingers.—Young children and learners will also be cared for. The world and the interests of Art will hardly progress without them; therefore, in our selection of music, we shall always bear them in mind, and often furnish a page for their especial benefit.

Musical Instruction.—A complete course of Musical Instruction will be given; including Elementary Instruction, Harmony, Thorough Bass and Composition, Musical Form, or the Architecture of Music, and Instrumentation. Musical exercises will accompany this instruction, and the student will be able to correct his own examples by the rules afforded. In short, the student may become, by this course, master of the whole subject of music.

Criticisms.—These will be impartial, truthful, and perfectly independent—just what is needed in this age of indiscriminate and unlimited puffery.

Musical News.—Our facilities for obtaining both foreign and domestic musical news of interest are unequalled; and all events of importance will be recorded.

Musical Reading.—Musical literature—a class of reading as interesting as it is difficult to furnish—will always be found in our columns. We are enabled to do this by our facilities of translation, and by the access, which we have lately gained, to unusually rich artistic materials

Important.—The subscribers announce with pleasure, that they have the active co-operation and practical assistance of Lowell Mason, Wm. Vincent Wallace, Thos. Hastings, Wm. B. Bradbury, Geo. J. Webb, Jonas Chickering, Oliver Ditson, Geo. F. Root, Firth, Pond & Co., Wm. Hall & Son, Mason & Law, Newman & Ivison, and other parties long and favorably known to the musical public.

Miscellaneous.

When I was Young;

Or, What the Old Woman said to her Daughter.

One summer eve I chanced to pass, where by her cottage gate,
An aged woman, in the sun, sat talking to her mate.
The frost of age was on her brow, its dimness in her eye,
And her bent figure to and fro rocked all unconsciously.
The frost of age was on her brow, yet garrulous her tongue,
As she compared "the doings now" with those when she was young.
When I was young, young gals were meek, and looked around kind of shy,
And when they were compelled to speak, they did so modestly;
They staid at home, and did the work, made Indian bread and wheaten,
And only went to "singing school," and sometimes to night meeting.
And children were obedient then, they had no saucy airs,
But minded what their mothers said, and learned to say their prayers,
But now-a-days they know enough, before they know their letters,
And young ones that can hardly walk, will contradict their betters.
Young women now go flirting round, and looking out for beaux,
And scarcely one in ten is found, who makes or mends her clothes.

But there! I tell my daughter,
Folks don't do as they'd oughter,
They had not oughter do as they do—
Why don't they do as they'd oughter?

When I was young, if a man had failed, he shut up house and hall,
And never ventured out till night if he ventured out at all,
And his wife sold all her shiny plates, and his son came home from college,
And his gals left school, and learned to wash and bake, and such like knowledge.
They gave up cake, and pumpkin pies, and had the plainest eating,
And never asked folks home to tea, and scarcely went to meeting.
The man that was a bankrupt called, was kinder shunned by men,
And hardly dared to show his head, among his town folks then.
But now-a-days, when a merchant fails, they say he makes a penny,
His wife don't have a gown the less, and his daughter just as many.
His sons, they smoke their choice cigars, and drink their costly wine,
And she goes to the opera! and he has folks to dine!
He walks the streets, he drives his gig, men show him all civilities,
And what in my days were called debts, are now called liabilities.
They call the man unfortunate who ruins half the city—
In my days, 'twas his creditors to whom we gave the pity.

But there! I tell my daughter,
Folks don't do as they'd oughter, &c.

When I was young, crime was crime—it had no other name,
And when 'twas proved against a man, he had to bear the blame.
They called the man that stole—a thief, they wasted no fine feeling,
What folks call petty larceny, in my day was called stealing.
They did not make a reprobate the theme of song and story,
As if the bloodier was his hands, the brighter was his glory.
And when a murder had been done, could they the murderer find,
They hung him as they would a crow, a terror to his kind.
But now-a days, it seems to me, whenever blood is spilt,
The murderer has our sympathy, proportioned to his guilt.
And when the law has proved a man to be a second Cain,
A dozen jurors will be found to bring him in "insane."
And then petitions will be signed, and texts of Scripture twisted,
Until the man who's proved to be as blood-thirsty as Nero,
Will walk abroad like other men—only a greater hero.

But there! I tell my daughter,
Folks don't do as they'd oughter, &c.

A Broken Heart.

The interesting case of a literally broken heart we subjoin, was related by Dr. J. K. Mitchell, of the Jefferson College, Philadelphia, to his class last winter, while lecturing upon diseases of the heart. It will be seen, on perusing it, that the expression "broken-hearted," is not merely figurative.

In the early part his medical career, Dr. M. accompanied as surgeon a packet that sailed between Liverpool and one of our southern ports. On the return voyage, soon after leaving Liverpool, while the doctor and the captain of the vessel, a weather-beaten son of Neptune, but possessed of uncommon fine feelings and strong impulses, were conversing in the latter's state-rooms, the captain opened a large chest, and carefully took out a number of articles of various descriptions, which he arranged upon a table. Dr. M., surprised at the array of costly jewels, ornaments, dresses, and all the varied paraphernalia of which ladies are naturally fond, inquired of the captain his object in having so many valuable purchases.

The sailor, in reply, said that for seven or eight years, he had been devotedly attached to a lady, to whom he had several times made proposals of marriage, but was as often rejected; that her refusal to wed him, however, had only stimulated his love to greater exertion; and that, finally, upon his renewing his offer, declaring in the ardency of his passion that without her society life was not worth living, she consented to become his bride upon his return from his next voyage. He was so overjoyed at the prospect of a marriage from which, in the warmth of his feelings, he probably anticipated more happiness than is generally allotted to mortals, that he spent all his ready money while in London for bridal gifts. After gazing at them fondly for some time, and remarking on them in turn, 'I think this will please Annie,' and 'I am sure she will like that,' he replaced them with the utmost care. This ceremony he repeated every day during the voyage, and the doctor often observed a tear glistening in his eye as he spoke of the pleasure he would have in presenting them to his affianced bride.

On reaching his destination, the captain arrayed himself with more than usual precision, and disembarked as soon as possible, to hasten to his love. As he was about to step into the carriage awaiting him, he was called aside by two gentlemen who desired to make a communication, the purport of which was that the lady had proved unfaithful to the trust reposed in her, and married another, with whom she had decamped shortly before. Instantly the captain was observed to clap his hand to his breast, and fall heavily to the ground. He was taken up and conveyed to his room on the vessel. Dr. M. was immediately summoned; but before he reached the poor captain, he was dead. A post-mortem examination revealed the cause of his unfortunate decease. His heart was found literally torn in twain! The tremendous propulsion of the blood, consequent upon such a violent nervous shock, forced the powerful muscular tissues asunder, and life was at an end. The heart was broken.

Fast Passages.

The Albany Evening Journal, commenting upon the fact, recently stated, that Capt Nye, of the Pacific, not long since ran close upon the rocks near Cape Broyle, speaks of him as celebrated for his short passages—to make which, however, great hazards are sometimes taken—and adds the following judicious remarks:—

"In the competition that exists between the noble ships of the Collins and Cunard lines, there are more perils than even passengers dream of. So far, life has been wonderfully preserved. And while all is safe we can say, without offense to any, that a fearful responsibility rests upon the officers of these vessels. For the sake of gaining a few hours on a voyage, not only these ships, but the lives of all on board, have been often jeopardized. In these cases, the officers have been as watchful and vigilant as was possible under such circumstances. There are dangers enough of an unavoidable character, to which others are superadded by efforts to make 'the shortest passage on record.'

"The speed of these ships has been fully tried and ascertained. That speed is all that is or should be required. Henceforth, the object should be to make safe voyages. The struggle to cross the Atlantic in less than ten days involves too much hazard of life. True, it has been safely accomplished, and may be again. But the effort is not made without infinite peril.

"Generally, the passengers on board our Atlantic steamers are more to blame for the racing than the officers. The moment a steamer leaves New York or Liverpool, passengers begin to settle upon the day and even the hour of her arrival. A. expects to take such a train on a given day for London or Manchester, or for Philadelphia or Boston. B. wants to breakfast or dine with his family on such a day. C. and D. have written to their friends or agents that they will meet them on a day or hour named. And these reasonable people, all impatient to fulfill their engagements, are quite nervous and unhappy if the steamer does not work out her daily three hundred miles. And worse than this is a vicious system of betting among the passengers, not only on the hour of the steamer's arrival, but upon each day's work. This is carried to dangerous lengths, for the sums bet are frequently so large that, if the engineers were capable of being tampered with, there would be no security for their steadiness and prudence. As it is, we know that the mates, pilots, and engineers of steamers get their feelings more or less interested in the bets of their friends, and there is danger in that, even if they are not to win or lose themselves. This species of gambling among steamers' passengers, upon the speed of the vessels, is fraught with danger, and ought to be broken up."

The Tomato.

To many persons there is something unpleasant, not to say disgusting, in the flavor of this excellent fruit. It has, however, long been used for culinary purposes, in various countries of Europe, and become a general favorite in this country. Dr. Bennett, a Professor of some celebrity, considers it an invaluable article of diet, and ascribes to it very important medical properties. He declares:—

1. That the tomato is one of the most powerful deobstruents of the Materia Medica, and that in all those affections of the liver, and other organs where calomel is indicated, it is probably the most effective and least harmful remedial agent known in the profession.

2. That a chemical extract will be obtained from it, which will altogether supersede the use of calomel in the cure of disease.

3. That he has successfully treated serious diarrhea with this article alone.

4. That when used as an article of diet, it is almost a sovereign remedy for dyspepsia or indigestion.

5. That person removing from the east or north to the south or west, should by all means make use of it as an aliment, as it would, in that event, save them from the danger attendant upon those violent bilious attacks to which almost all unacclimated persons are liable.

6. That the citizens in ordinary health should make use of it, either raw, cooked, or in the form of a catsup, with their daily food, as it is the most healthy article in the Materia Alimentaria.

Professor Rafinesque, of France, says, "It is every where deemed a very healthy vegetable, and an invaluable article of food."

Dungleson says, "It may be looked upon as one of the most wholesome and valuable esculents that belong to the vegetable kingdom."

Razors.

Barbers often tell us that razors get tired of shaving, but if laid by for twenty days they will then shave well. By microscopic examination, it is found that the tired razor, from long stropping by the same hand, and in the same direction, has the ultimate particles or fibres of its surface or edge all arranged in one direction, like the edge of a piece of cut velvet; but after a month's rest, these fibres re-arrange themselves heterogeneously, crossing each other, and presenting a saw-like edge, each fibre supporting its fellow, and hence cutting the beard, instead of being forced down flat without cutting, as when laid by. These and many other instances are offered to prove that the ultimate particles of matter are always in motion; and they say that in the process of welding, the absolute momentum of the hammer causes an entanglement of orbits of motion, and hence a re-arrangement, as in one piece; indeed, in the cold state, a leaf of gold laid on a polished surface of steel, and stricken smartly with a hammer, will have its particles forced into the steel so as to permanently gild it at the point of contact. [Scientific American.

Plums and the Curculio.

Two or three years since, it was announced in the agricultural periodicals, that syringing plum trees with lime water, so as to cover the fruit with the lime, was a certain remedy against the curculio. It was tried in numerous experiments, and the final conclusion was that the practice was of little service. It is now said, that if a portion of sulphur be added, the mixture will be effectual for the purpose. Thomas W. Ludlow, Jr., of Yonkers, says:—

"Pond's Seedling Plum I have succeeded in raising for the second year, as well as several other later and finer varieties, by syringing the trees with a mixture of lime and sulphur, just after the fall of the blossom, which I repeated three times a week for four weeks. The mixture was made in the following way:—Having a barrel upon wheels, I had a thick whitewash made, such as is generally used for whitewashing walls; to this I added eighteen double handfuls of flour of sulphur. After it was thoroughly mixed, it was applied to the trees with a valved syringe, having a spout with a lip to it, which flattened the stream as it passed out, and was thus dispersed over the tree. The sediment of the barrel furnished sufficient strength to have it filled twice more with water only."

Dutch Delicacies.

A letter-writer in the Boston Transcript thus describes some of the sights he saw in the streets of Amsterdam. It will be perceived that our New Amsterdam has greatly degenerated from her original pattern, through the disasterous irruption of the Yankees:—

Some of the Dutch delicacies are certainly very extraordinary. People eat pickles as the French eat peppermints. All about the streets may be seen little stands, upon which are temptingly displayed pickled cucumbers, beets, onions, and other vegetables, soaking in vinegar, and cut up into little tit-bits for the refreshment of the passers by, who, for a stiver, can set their teeth on edge most admirably. Diminutive eels, salted and steeped in vinegar, form an article in traffic for divers old ladies at the street corners. I do not know that children cry for them, but probably the youthful Mynheer yearns for a pickled eel as a young Yankee longs for a stick of candy. A stranger might wonder at seeing such gastronomic enormities hawked about the streets like lozenges, till he heard the dissonance of the language, when he would perceive that a people who speak such a jargon, need some such diet as sourkrout and pickled eels to keep their vocal organs in proper tone.

Embarrassing, Very.

The exclamation of Dick Swiveller, when he discovered that the "Marchioness" had disposed of his clothes during his illness, and that he was left without even an umbrella in case of a fire, is familiar to our readers. Not less awkward was the predicament in which Mr. Jones was placed, the morning after his marriage, when on his way to Niagara, with his blooming bride. That gentleman was exceedingly cautious, and ever evinced the greatest dread both of fires and robbers. Having stopped for the night at one of the principal hotels in Washington, he charged his wife, before she retired, to "leave nothing about," and carefully deposited his own inexpressibles, the pockets of which contained his valuables, (including the door key, which he had prudently withdrawn,) in his new trunk with a patent lock. As he intended to take the early train at 6 o'clock, he awoke betimes, but, to his dismay, discovered that he had neglected to remove the keys from his pockets, and that they were within the trunk, which closed with a spring. This was sufficiently provoking, but, to add to his perplexity, Mrs. J., in her anxiety to "obey" literally the injunctions of her husband, had placed her own garments in her trunk, and given him the keys for safe-keeping, which he had secured with his own. It was not until after repeated knocks at the door, and when the cars were far on the way, that Jones could summon resolution to reveal the cause of his tardiness. The chambermaid, with an extra key, relieved him from his imprisonment, but the attendance of a lock-smith was necessary to procure the pair presentable suits.

The recollection of that day's involuntary detention never fails to elict from Jones a hearty anathema against all new fangled notions in the way of trunk-locks, which he classes with man-traps and other devices of the enemy. [Journal of Commerce.

New Virtue in Coffee.

The London Medical Gazette gives the result of numerous experiments with roasted coffee, proving that it is the most powerful means not only of rendering animal and vegetable effluvia innocuous, but of actually destroying them. A room in which meat in an advanced degree of decomposition had been kept for some time, was instantly deprived of all smell, on an open coffee-roaster being carried through it, containing a pound of coffee newly roasted. In another room exposed to the effluvium occasioned by the clearing out of a cess-pit, so that sulphuretted hydrogen and ammonia in great quantities could be chemically detected, the stench was completely removed within half a minute, on the employment of three ounces of fresh roasted coffee, whilst the other parts of the house were permanently cleared of the same smell by being simply traversed with the coffee-roaster, although the cleansing of the cess-pit continued several hours after.

The best mode of using the coffee as a disinfectant is to dry the raw bean, pound it in a mortar, and then roast the powder on a moderately heated iron plate until it assumes a dark brown tint, when it is fit for use. Then sprinkle it in sinks or cess-pools, or lay it on a plate in the rooms which you wish to have purified. Coffee acid or coffee oil acts more readily in minute quantities.

STARTLING SCENE IN A CHURCH.—On Sunday afternoon, August 22d, in the "First Congregational Church" in North Chelsea, during the singing of the second hymn, a rabid dog of enormous size rushed up a side aisle, and commenced an attack upon the pew of Mr. Jonathan Harrington. Failing to effect an entrance, he sprang with a spasmodic leap to the pulpit, beating furiously against the doors, until he fell upon the head stair exhausted, and frothing with impotent rage. The audience were instantly thrown into a great confusion, and a general, and perhaps fatal, rush for the door seemed likely to ensue. They were somewhat re-assured, however, by a caution from the pastor, Rev. Norwood Damon, "to be composed, and remain in their seats, as the surest means of safety." At this crisis, Mr. Ephraim Pierce, a youth of 18, and a son of captain John Pierce, stepped from his place, seized the animal by the back of the neck, and notwithstanding several attempts to bite, succeeded in dragging him from the house unharmed. The doors were closed, and the dog fled to the adjoining grave-yard where he was subsequently shot.

Grafting Evergreens.

The French nurserymen are very successful in grafting evergreens, and practice it as follows: "The proper time for grafting pines is when the young shoots have made about three quarters of their length, and are still so herbaceous as to break like a shoot of asparagus. The shoot of the stock is then broken off about two inches below its terminal bud; the leaves are stripped off from twenty to twenty-four lines down from the extremity, leaving, however, two pairs of leaves opposite and close to the upper end of the shoot so headed back—which leaves are of great importance for drawing up the sap. The shoot or stock is then split to the depth of two inches, with a very thin knife, between the two pairs of leaves left; the scion is then prepared—the lower part being stripped of its leaves to the length of two inches, and is then cut to a wedge and inserted in the ordinary mode of cleft grafting. The graft is tied with a slip of woolen, and a cap of paper is fastened to a stake, and firmly fixed over the whole graft, to protect it from the sun and rain. At the end of fifteen days this cap is removed, and the ligature at the end of a month." Some evergreens, grafted in this way, make a second growth of five or six inches the first year, but most sorts do not start till the next year. [Horticulturist.

Gooseberries with Tan-Bark.

I have made an experiment with mulching gooseberry beds with tan-bark, and so far as one year's experience is worth any thing, I am well satisfied with it. The great difficulty with the gooseberries here, seems to be with the heat and want of moisture. My bushes are planted in quarters three feet and a half apart each way, trained to single stems. I have hitherto lost quite half the crop by mildew. Early last November, after pruning the plants and dressing the borders, and digging in plenty of stable manure, I hauled several loads of tan with my team, and spread it uniformly all over the bed, six inches thick. There it remained all winter, and still remains. The foilage of the bushes is more healthy than I ever saw is before; the fruit is almost entirely clear, and very large and promising. [Horticulturist.

AN APPALLING POSITION.—On Saturday, August 28th, a citizen of Rochester was on a visit to Canada, and about the time the storm of that evening was coming on, started in a carriage to return to the American side. When about midway of the suspension bridge, the storm struck them with appalling fury. The wind blew a perfect tornado, while the air was densely filled with driving hail and rain, and so potent was the wind that the bridge swayed laterally to and fro, ten or a dozen feet, making one giddy with its vibrations. So appalling was the commotion, that the horses stopped, and finally fell upon their sides on the bridge, while the driver, in the extremity of his terror, seemed incapable of making the least effort to move from the perilous spot. The inmates of the carriage could with difficulty keep their seats, and for a short time expected nothing else but to be precipitated into the surging waters. A situation like this is too appalling for description.

SWINGING OF BUNKER HILL MONUMENT.—An immense pendulum, hung within Bunker Hill Monument, has led to the knowledge of a variety of interesting facts. Among them is one which we see given on the authority of Prof. Horsford, of Harvard College, stating that the Monument swings backwards and forwards like a pendulum, every day! By an apparatus, which it is unnecessary to describe, it has been ascertained that there is a very slight but perceptible movement, in the morning to the westward, at noon to the northward, and in the evening to the east. It is caused by the unequal expansion of the sides of the Monument by the heat of the sun. What confirms it is, that a shower suddenly cooling one side, also produces a movement.

A BUSINESS WOMAN.—The Lexington Sentinel says, that there is now living in Holmes County, Miss., a woman who married her first husband in September, 1823. She subsequently parted with him; and from time to time married three others, with all of whom she separated. On the day twenty-five years from her first marriage, she parted with her fourth husband, attended the funeral of her second, was married to her first, and the marriage ceremony was performed by her third husband. She is now living with her fifth, or rather her FIRST husband, and doing well.

Rev. Orin Fowler, M. C., from Massachusetts, just deceased at Washington, was born in Lebanon, Conn., in 1791, and was 61 years old. He graduated at Yale College in 1815, and was ordained as a clergyman at Plainfield, Conn., soon after. He thence removed to Fall River, Mass., where he was Pastor of the First Congregational Church over twenty years, until he was elected to Congress. He married the daughter of Rev. Dr. Payson, who survives him. Their only child died in infancy. He was an upright, conscientious, industrious man, and very highly esteemed.

A great earthquake occurred at Santiago de Cuba on the 20th ultimo, causing a terrible destruction of property. All the houses were more or less injured, and the city is blocked up with the fallen buildings. Three shocks were experienced in the course of a few hours, and many others followed during the next two.

Gibson, the celebrated pedestrian, is now engaged in a most remarkable feat and one that has never been attempted by any person in this or any other country. He is walking 1,250 miles in as many successive hours, 1,250 ½ miles in as many half hours, and 1,250 ¼ miles in as many quarter hours. The whole time occupied is 10 weeks, 2 days, and 10 hours.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

PUBLISHING SOCIETY'S ANNIVERSARY.

Address of Thomas E. Babcock.

Resolved, That the Board of Managers be encouraged to commence, as early as practicable, the publication of Religious Books, with a view to supply the wants of our Sabbath-Schools and Families.

MR. PRESIDENT: When such a resolution as this is presented for the action of the Publishing Society, it may be expected that it should be followed by some remarks; as well to examine the grounds upon which the proposed action is urged, as to bring before those interested, a view of the nature and extent of the responsibility which would be incurred in its passage.

There are two evils, of fearful magnitude and prevalence, among our youth—the class around whom cluster the principal hopes of every philanthropist. One is an extreme aversion to reading at all; the other is a clamorous appetite for the light and corrupting emanations of the secular press. One or the other of these evils stalks forth to infest the ground, and oppose the success of almost every form of Christian exertion; and it is difficult to determine which of them is likely to result in the accumulation of the most loathsome corruption of the moral sensibilities, or render its victims most unmanageable and hopeless as subjects of religious effort.

An early and ample supply of such reading as is contemplated in this resolution, would be equally valuable in its tendencies to prevent both of these evils; and its usefulness as an auxiliary to every other means of promoting the interests of the kingdom of God, can scarcely be overrated; its influence co-operating alike with the faithful labors of the Minister, the Sabbath-School Teacher, and the Christian Parent.

The value of such books cannot be properly estimated, without taking into account their influence, both in the conversion of sinners, and in enlightening the mind, and establishing it upon correct principles, and favorably and thoroughly developing the religious character of the disciple of Christ. Neither can the importance of the agency which, when brought to bear at a proper period, tends to either of these results, be fully estimated, without a review of the lamentable consequences that follow a neglect of its application. None but the most indifferent has failed to observe the difficulty of leading those to Christ who have reached the meridian of life without the influences of religious reading, or those of a kindred character. More frequently than otherwise, with all that can be done for them, they go heedlessly on, "treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath, and the revelation of the righteous judgment of God," until they are thoroughly "fitted for destruction."

Instance, again, the motley aggregate of professors of religion who unrelentingly oppose, not only every work of reform, but many of the established dictates of the gospel; who have to be carried on the backs of the friends of progress and order; many of them, not contented to remain passive, go kicking and struggling, like a refractory child in the arms of a patient and forbearing mother.

Whenever the history of such persons is examined, it will be seen that few if any of them have devoted much time to the perusal of religious books. But, on the other hand, many of those who have become eminent in piety and usefulness, are vastly indebted to the agency of such books in the formation of the character which has rendered them objects of gratitude and admiration to the Christian world.

Such books are not only an auxiliary to other means of improvement, but they can frequently be made to serve a good purpose where others are not in operation. And such instances are by no means rare. Where the religious instruction of the young is neglected by parents, or where they are situated remote from Sabbath-Schools, and places of public worship, their influence may become invaluable, not only resulting, in some instances, in the conversion of souls, but in the establishment of those means of grace for which they were introduced as a substitute.

Again, religious books can often be made available where the living teacher, however competent, could not. Cases of this kind may occur, where instruction is needed, and greatly desired, but cannot be had for the want of a competent instructor. But the investment of a few shillings in a well-written book upon the subject, will furnish a companion always accessible. The habits and disposition of many, are such as to render the personal presence of an adviser so embarrassing as to preclude the prospect of success—an obstacle not at all encountered in the use of books. There are subjects and points, of vast importance, upon which persons could not be approached by others, without arousing a spirit of resistance, which would blast every hope of reaching the confidence; while a book will often stealthily thread its way to the goal, without encountering a single shot; but if, under a momentary suspicion of the approach of an enemy, a gun is fired, the entire absence of resentment and alarm soon pacifies the panic of the guard, and it passes noiselessly on, without further opposition, to the citadel; and, as an evidence of conquest, its flag is soon seen streaming from the topmost spire.

Who, then, under the inspiration of the many-tongued eloquence with which they commend to us their utility, can be indifferent respecting the publication of religious books? If such a state of feeling is disposed to escape, pray do not pursue it, though you should be provided with a law for the recapture of fugitives, more rigorous than that of 1850; and, aroused from the ennui which has been induced by its pestiferous presence, let us make strong the boiler, put a lubber-lift upon the valve, throw pitch into the furnace, lubricate the machinery, and let on the steam!—not to repeat the disaster of the ill-fated "Henry Clay," but to multiply the issues of the religious press, until, like the "bread of heaven" upon Israel, they may fall at every door.

But it may be said, that other denominations are publishing books enough, and that we may have them made ready at our hands, without the trouble of producing them. This is true; be it said to their credit, for the zeal with which they have held up the truth as they understand it, and to our shame, for the want of that zeal which would have prompted us to do likewise. Tenacious as we may be of those principles which constitute our peculiarities, and separate us from the rest of the Christian world; and sanguine as we may be that they are points of interest and consequence to the navigator exploring for truth, who, that takes observations from the current religious literature, would be likely to discover their position? While other denominations, that have come into being long since we, in this country, assumed the reponsibility of a separate organization, are scattering their productions as the winds of autumn scatter the falling leaves, we have scarcely made our mark upon the world. This is one of the strongest reasons why the truths which we represent are so unpopular. Those whom we address upon the subject say, "Where are your authors and your books?" This interrogation is, by no means, always the signal of contempt; but is frequently made by those who have been so accustomed to regarding such means as among the indispensables of religious effort, that it seems to them, that to identify themselves with a people who neglect their use, is equivalent to throwing themselves away. A knowledge of the fact that we have remained in this condition more than one hundred and seventy years, has, beyond a question, served to throw a suspicious appearance upon the whole subject, and leave the inquirer to doubt whether there may not be some mistake about the truth of a matter which otherwise looks so perfectly plain and clear. Lightly as any may be disposed to treat the matter, and low as they may estimate the worth of those who have stumbled upon such points, making it the ground of dismissing the whole subject, if they could have been got over them, and induced to become fellow-laborers with us, our affairs, no doubt, would have borne, at this time, a very different aspect.

Again, it may be said, that we are not able to publish books. With some, probably, who would be glad to see the work go on, this objection has great weight. They see the missionary enterprise, as it seems to them, still trembling under the support of those who have scarcely felt safe in relinquishing their hold for the purpose of taking breath from the time it was set upon its feet, and lament the poverty that has doled out to it so scanty a support. But the truth is, these alarming indications are principally the result of not having sufficient scope for the development of our resources. We have been like a man trying to walk a wire stretched at a high elevation, who, if he walks at all, goes with a trembling step. At the outset, such a difficulty is not the want of strength, but the want of room. An understanding of the trouble will suggest the remedy.

It is next to impossible to concentrate the strength of a denomination upon a single enterprise. There is every conceivable shade of variety in the character of men, from those who are "thoroughly furnished unto every good work," to those whose tastes and attachments have so exclusively fed upon the material, that they are scarcely capable of conceiving of an equivalent for money, except in something that gives unmistakable evidence of possessing the essential properties of physical matter. Even such persons as these may be induced to buy a book, and they will read it to get the worth of their money, and allow their children to read it, and perhaps all will be made better by the operation.

The want of definite and proper objects upon which to bestow those means which the purest dictates of Christianity would have labeled "surplus," and sanctified to the promotion of its own interests, has been a greater obstacle in the way of our prosperity, than all our poverty. Much of the means which ought to have been thus appropriated, has been worse than wasted in the cultivation of habits, tastes, and style, which have prepared the descendants of those who have cultivated them to become an easy prey to those seductive influences which have tempted them to forsake the principles which have been poorly taught them, and more poorly exemplified, by their unfaithful parents.

We have sowed sparingly, and gathered a sparing harvest; but God, long ago, announced that such a result would follow such a course. He has also said, "There is that scattereth and yet increaseth." We have found by experiment that one statement is true; and others have demonstrated the truth of the other. The Methodists, Baptists, and others, may be mentioned as illustrations in point; but the Free-Will Baptists furnish an encouraging example of recent date. The tears are scarcely dried away, whose fountains were opened at the death of him who prematurely wore himself out in laying the foundation of their publishing interest, and persuading a reluctant people to come to its support. But they have responded, and their publishing establishment has become a respectable concern, and its issues are exerting their benign influence throughout the denomination. In the mean time, they have repeatedly recruited their missionary forces in the foreign field, and multiplied the facilities for education, and yet their means are increasing in proportion to the increase of their outlay.

It may be said, that after a favorable disposition is made of all these objections, there is still another perplexing difficulty, as to who shall write the books. But where there is a will, there is a way. Let it be definitely settled, that we are to enter upon the work, and proper exertion put forth, and the men and the women will be found who are qualified and willing to serve the interests of religion in that capacity. God has had greater care for us in this respect than we have had for ourselves. Besides, there are many books, already extant, which, with proper revision would be admirably adapted to our wants.

In conclusion, let us look, for a moment, at the question as to how much is involved, when we say we encourage the Board of Managers to commence this work. We do not simply say that it would be proper for them to give their attention to the subject, or that we would be glad to have them do so; but we say, "Brethren, go on! and whatever draft duty may execute upon us, we are prepared forthwith to walk up and cancel it." In short, it is not a mere statement of what we believe, but a pledge of what we will do.

Now, brethren, shall this resolution pass—spirit and sentiment—to parts unknown, to be followed by the last, lingering, sickly hope of our success? Or, shall it pass into a living, pervading rule of our action, under the inspiration of which, we shall dig deep, and lay broader and firmer the foundations of our prosperity? In the light of all that is dear and precious in our beloved Zion, let the response be made.

Substance of Remarks by James Bailey.

Resolved, That the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society commends itself to the patronage of the denomination as a medium of usefulness second only to the ministry of the Gospel.

Sanctified thought is rendered immortal by the Press. The preacher lives, and speaks, and dies, and his arguments cease to convince, and his eloquence to persuade, as the voice that uttered them ceases to speak. The Press steps in and rescues from oblivion, and imprints on the tablets of a thousand hearts, those thoughts that moved the masses when uttered by the living speaker, rendering emphatically true the oft-repeated saying, "He being dead yet speaketh." The number of laborious, energetic, philosophical thinkers, is few. Whatever such minds originate or develop, may become a rich legacy to the world, and should not be lost upon the ear. He who works into the mysteries of religion, and develops truth in a new light; or by some wise illustration of it, brings it home to the heart, and then commits it to the care of the Press, renders it as lasting as the world. The minister toils in his study till he brings into a proper shape the thoughts by which he hopes to move the minds of his audience, consecrates those thoughts with prayers and tears, and with an anxious heart goes to his congregation with his message; but, alas! how often does he repeat in his closet, "Who hath believed our report? and to whom hath the arm of the Lord been revealed?" His message may be received by some, but it is forgotten by many, and perhaps is unheeded by more. The Press takes up his message, and gives it an immortality of existence, and places it, at a trifling cost, in thousands of hands, where it shall germinate, and yield in the end an abundant harvest.

With us, the Publishing Society is the chosen guardian of sanctified thought—the collector and preserver of developed truth. It is our only hope of rescuing from oblivion the clear, well-sustained, and conclusive arguments, by which it is shown that truths neglected by all the church beside, have found a home and lovers with us. So it stands, with its power to give a wide-spread and ever-living existence to whatever shall receive its imprint. The Press has placed in living characters the revealed word of God, the holy gospel of Jesus Christ, and the inspired teachings of the Apostles. It has clothed with immortality the pure and intelligent thoughts of a Bunyan, and a host of other lovers of truth. It has placed beyond the rust of time, the expositions of Scripture truths and gospel doctrines of many who have given their time and giant intellects to their study. It has given life and vigor to those happy illustrations of truth, which have simplified and made it plain. It has multiplied, a thousand and a hundred thousand fold, the copies of a single argument, and given the author an audience of hundreds of thousands of attentive and admiring auditors, thus extending indefinitely, and almost world-wide, the thoughts that would otherwise have remained embosomed in the soul that gave them birth. All must admire and honor the piety of "Uncle Tom," and loathe and detest the incarnate, fiendish, soul of Legree. Thousands of souls throb and beat with honest indignation as the graphic pen of Mrs. Stow delineates in living characters the domestic institution of the South. Forgetfulness shall never blot from the soul the thoughts that she has imprinted there.

The Publishing Society is destined to harmonize and embody in a system of divinity the sentiments of the denomination. From Rhode Island on the east, to Virginia on the south, and California on the west, there is with us a uniform sentiment upon the Sabbath. The Sabbath has brought and bound us together. From the Baptists, Methodists, and others, have the original Sabbath-keepers received accessions. These have brought with them to some extent their denominational peculiarities. Thus, on many questions, we have no acknowledged denominational views as a standard. The harmonizing power of the press, in the hands of the Publishing Society, is to take the heterogeneous mass of sentiment, and frame from it a pure system of divinity, around which we all are to cluster, rejoicing in our unity. While our weekly, monthly, and quarterly publications, are to teem with the shorter articles, the bound duodecimos and octavos are to embody complete, clear, and satisfactory arguments, that all shall receive. We are yet to have, perhaps, B. on the Moral Law, M. on the harmony of the Law and Gospel, H. on Exegetics, B. on family religion, and one, another, and another, now nameless, on the several doctrines, theoretical and practical, of religion. Ranged side by side with these, on the shelves of each private library, bearing the imprint of this Society, may we yet see the poems of Mrs. C., the devotional works of Mary, the metaphysics of Miss Sarah, and in each church the series of Sabbath-School books by one and another. With all these as a guide, and the Bible as a standard, the Publishing Society is yet to harmonize the sentiments of the denomination, and throw in the pathway of the busy, bustling world, the pure, the sublime, the unadulterated word of life. All this, and more, shall it do, under the fostering care of those to whom it commends itself.

It is thus that we are yet to have, and must have, what we never have had, a denominational literature; and until we have such, we have not in full, vigorous, active use, the medium which is second only to the ministry of the Gospel for extending the truth. A few bound volumes of a denominational character are to be found in our libraries. These are cherished ones. But the progress of the age calls for more; the claims of truth, and inquiries for truth, demand more, and these must be supplied. What parent is there among us who has not felt the need of a chaste, instructive, attractive volume, to place in the hands of his child, as he sees him idling away his time, or turning away after error and sin? With glad emotions has the volume of "Tracts on the Sabbath" within a few months been laid on many a center-table, as a safeguard to the family against turning from God's holy Sabbath. Ah! often has the heart of the faithful pastor been chilled, as he has found, in his "family visits," the volume of doubtful or vicious character; and full oft has he felt the degeneracy of the times, as he has been told that our denominational paper costs twice as much as another paper twice as large. And it has been even difficult for him to convince some, that pure, simple truth surpasses error as much in value as a barrel of flour surpasses in value a boat-load of the sweepings of the streets. O! how effectually would a denominational literature remove the inducements to error, and guide the unoccupied mind into truth; while, at the same time, it should overleap denominational barriers, and call to our embrace the lovers of God, and the lovers of his truth.

The Publishing Society is to be a medium for the development of latent piety and talent. Jesus Christ instituted the Ministry of the Gospel. Piety and talent have sought this as an open door for usefulness, to a limited extent. There reposes in the churches intelligent piety, and sanctified intellect, that is ill suited to the pulpit. There may be no so appropriate sphere for its development as is furnished by this Society. ~~This offers to such~~ encouragement. It proposes to take the secret workings of the soul, in its communion with truth, and breath into them the vitality of active life. It says to the latent genius, Spring into life. It says to the fire shut up in the soul, Break forth, and cause the heart of the ignorant to throb and glow with the pulsations of intelligence and truth. It says to truth, Speed your way in the earth, to enlighten and save; and wherever man has made his habitation, there find a resting place. Thus the brother and sister, in the privacy of their retirement, may give shape to myriads of minds that shall live after them, and cause intelligence and truth to spring up and flourish in the hitherto uncultivated moral wastes of this world.

Once the denomination was small, uneducated, and circumscribed in its influence. Now we have strength of numbers, intelligence, education, and mental vigor and sagacity equal to the work assigned us in the church. Once we cowed before the uplifted steel of our opponents. Now, as it glitters, brandished over us, we bid them who wield it strike, and interpose the shield of truth to shiver it into fragments, and then pour upon the weaponless warrior an avalanch of argument and of truth, that shall quite prostrate and bring him under its powers, through which he must have a resurrection, if at all. Once the minister, single-handed, stood alone in the contest. Now from almost every church and family there comes forth the intelligent, well-armored champion, ready for the defense of truth. If error now seeks the covert of ancient languages, as a dernier resort, to hide itself and obtain a seeming victory, the closited student of languages comes forth to the rescue, and with his Greek meets Greek in the tug of war. In metaphysical disquisition, in classic lore, in clear scriptural exegesis, we are prepared to defend our cause. And since it has become so, the Goliaths of former times choose to save their heads by less proudful boastings and arrogant assumptions of superior education. Once it was difficult to get, in a permanent form, our arguments before the world. Now the Publishing Society wields a mighty engine of its own, and seeks to pour its publications in the lap of every inquirer. And these publications have been enriched, and are to be enriched, by the offerings of brethren and sisters in private life. Such opportunities to give vent to the pent-up throbbings of the soul, and the workings of sanctified intellect, commend themselves to the patronage of the denomination, and to all who would aid in the advancement of truth in the world.

The Publishing Society is the chosen medium to aid in any denominational enterprise. If our missionaries in China wish to build a chapel or dwelling, or publish tracts, or educate a Chinese child, they speak through the Publishing Society's publications, and a kindred feeling is awakened through the whole denomination; and from Rhode Island to Wisconsin comes the needful response. If the cause of education needs a new impetus, the appeal is made through the press, which prepares the way for the attainment of the desired end. And so there is no denominational interest but is served through this agency. And all feel that it is the heart of the body, by its beatings to send pulsation through the whole, and keep it harmoniously active. Once I stood where this Society now stands. From that position I could survey the denomination, and understand the tone of its feelings, the nature of its wants, and the character of all its operations. So the Society sees the whole, and is best of all prepared to serve it. And what has not already been done by the press in the denomination? There is not a church or society but has felt its healthful influence. There is not an operation but has been sustained and strengthened by it. And while it is working, we shall be gaining continually in all that is good and useful. When it ceases to work, ignorance and superstition, dark and drear, like the pall of night, shall rest upon all that is lovely and dear among us, and the cherished truths of which we are the sole guardians, shall have no lovers, and be lost in forgetfulness. Let the denomination rally, with the spirit of its zeal, the might of its purse, the power of its prayers, the strength and intelligence of it sanctified thought, and the high purpose of its inspired souls, and the Publishing Society shall be known and felt as a medium of usefulness second only to the ministry of the Gospel.

The Association then adjourned to meet at the Meathouse Fork, Doddridge Co., Va., on the sixth day of the week before the first Sabbath in September, 1853, at 10 o'clock A. M.

Report on the State of Religion.

The Committee on the State of Religion within the bounds of this Association, report, that from the communications received from the different churches, we have occasion to rejoice in the evidence presented that God has not entirely forsaken us. We have had some tokens of divine favor. God in his mercy hath blessed us with some additions to our numbers of those whom we trust have been born of the Spirit, and will prove a blessing to the churches, by their steadfastness in the faith, and their unwearied perseverance in the way of well doing. It appears, as a general thing, that union and harmony exist among the brethren in the different churches; yet we believe it to be our privilege and duty to occupy higher grounds, in order that we may let our light so shine before men that they may see our good works, and glorify our Father which is in heaven. We believe that it becomes us to humble ourselves before God, and endeavor to cultivate all the graces of the Holy Spirit, in order that God may bless us as a people, and save us at last with an everlasting salvation, in Christ Jesus.

EXCURSION AND PIC-NIC.

On Sunday, Sept. 5, the Sabbath-School of the Pawcatuck Seventh-day Baptist Church, accompanied by the members of the schools connected with the First and Second Hopkinton and Westerly Seventh-day Baptist Churches, and others, were conveyed to Osbrook Grove, by the steamer Water Lily, for the purpose of joining a pic-nic celebration. After leaving a part of the passengers at the place of destination, the steamer proceeded to Mystic Bridge to take on board the Greenmanville Sabbath-School; after which it was intended to proceed to Waterford to take on board the School connected with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in that place; but after taking on board some ninety or a hundred at Mystic Bridge, it was thought advisable to land them before proceeding to Waterford. On gaining the shore, the children with their teachers and friends proceeded to the grove to prepare for the festivities of the day, while the boat was dispatched for the Waterford School. While some of the friends were engaged in setting out the tables with the bounties provided for the occasion, the children, under the direction of Mr. Charles Potter, Jr., sung a number of beautiful pieces; after which a meeting was organized by choosing T. S. Greenman, President, and E. G. Champlin, Secretary. The following named persons were chosen Vice Presidents: T. M. Clark, of Greenmanville Church; P. L. Berry, of Waterford Church; H. Clarke, of 2d Hopkinton Church; N. H. Langworthy, of Pawcatuck Church; W. A. Langworthy, of 1st Hopkinton Church; D. Larkin, of Westerly Church; C. M. Lewis, of Rockville Church.

It was voted that each of the schools represented should select one of their number to compose a Committee on Resolutions. The following were chosen as that Committee: G. H. Greenman, of Greenmanville; Chas. Maxson, from Pawcatuck; Jos. D. Spicer, from 2d Hopkinton; John J. Babcock, Ashaway.

Voted, That when this meeting adjourns, it adjourns to meet at the call of the President.

Some very interesting remarks were then made by Eld. A. B. Burdick, Eld. S. S. Griswold, T. M. Clark, and E. Stillman, after which the meeting adjourned, and each one went his way to seek enjoyment till the arrival of the friends from Waterford.

At about half past 2 o'clock the boat arrived with about 120 persons from Waterford, when the whole number, consisting of about 450, immediately repaired to the tables, which were bountifully supplied, to partake of a collation, after a blessing being asked by Eld. S. S. Griswold. This being dispatched, the meeting was called to order, when, after singing by the children, the Report of the Committee on Resolutions was called for, and the following resolutions were read, spoken to, and adopted:—

Resolved, That this numerous and joyous gathering of Sabbath-Schools inspires us with fresh interest in our good work, and we will try during the coming year to make greater advancement in the knowledge of God's Works than heretofore.

Resolved, That our humble thanks are due our Heavenly Father for his kindness, manifested to us as Sabbath-Schools, during the past year, and that our future prosperity depends upon his gracious smiles.

Resolved, That, while we enjoy the exalted pleasures of this festive gathering, our hearts are saddened with the reflection that there are millions of children in our own and heathen lands whose minds have never been illuminated by the blessed Bible, and who know nothing of the blessings of enlightened Christianity.

Resolved, That we tender our hearty thanks and sympathies to our Pastors, Teachers, Parents, and Guardians, for the deep interest which they have manifested in our religious instruction, and we will endeavor to so improve the lessons imparted to us, that we may be virtuous and useful in life, and finally reap the reward of the righteous in heaven.

Resolved, That, as Sabbath-Schools, we feel an interest in the spread of the gospel in the earth, the dissemination of truth relating to God's holy and sanctified Sabbath, and will try, by our contributions and prayers, to aid our brethren and sisters who are laboring in foreign lands.

Resolved, That the high-toned moral sentiments set forth by the Sabbath-School of Adams Center, N.Y., at their celebration on the 25th of August last, relating to Slavery, Temperance, &c., meet with a cordial response in our hearts.

Resolved, That it is with inexpressible pleasure that we learn of the increasing prosperity of many of the Sabbath-Schools in our denomination.

GEO. H. GREENMAN, Pres.

J. DENISON SPICER, Clerk.

Voted, That the Secretary request the publication of the resolutions in the Literary Echo, and forward a copy of the same to the Sabbath Recorder.

The time having arrived when it was thought advisable to disperse, it was voted "to adjourn to one year from this time." The Greenmanville and Waterford schools having taken their departure in the Water Lily, the others took "scow" and set sail for Westerly, all feeling that it had been a day pleasantly and profitably spent.

"DENOMINATIONAL SINS."

The thoughts which we have given to our readers under the above caption, especially those which set forth the sin of neglecting family prayer, seem to have stirred no little feeling with some of our readers. We are glad of it. It is painful to find, however, that so much of the feeling is that of opposition; but better that than entire apathy. If we have set forth God's truth, opposition will only serve to render the ultimate triumph of that truth more marked; and there is even hope, that the agents of this opposition themselves will see, that nothing is to be gained by the course they are pursuing.

One thing, however, we regret; that is, that whenever we would begin in right good earnest to search out, and expose, the sins of the people, there are always found some who are ready to proffer apologies, and to make it appear, if possible, that the reproved ones are no worse than the generality of Christians—on the whole, a worthy, good class of people, as deserving of our fellowship as those who are more punctilious in duty. This readiness to apologize for their erring brethren may spring from very amiable motives, but we submit, that the effect of it is bad. Its tendency is, to destroy that sense of guilt which plain, outspoken, uncompromising reproof have created. It makes the guilty feel less guilty, so that they begin to think, that though they cannot be accounted the tallest specimens of piety, they are nevertheless in a pretty fair way for heaven. And what hope, then, is there of reformation?

Could we succeed in fastening a sense of guilt upon the consciences of our brethren; could the wound produced by a well-merited reproof remain unhealed, and unmeddled with, we should begin to hope. For is it not uniformly the fact, that when one begins to feel the stings of a wounded conscience, the first promptings of his proud heart are to seek some sort of justification? Is he not always ready to give such a turn to the case as will, at least, palliate his guilt? We know that he is. But if this self-justifying disposition could be left to itself, and not ministered to, and encouraged, by those who have a good reputation for piety, it would soon expend itself, and be followed by a healthy reaction. Brethren should think twice, therefore, before they come forward with apologies, which only tend to perpetuate the evil complained of.

We solemnly aver, that what we have written in regard to the delinquencies of our people has not been prompted by any spirit of unkindness. It was not that we desired to hold the denomination up to reproach; far from it. On the contrary, we wanted to contribute something towards saving it from that contempt which must inevitable be its fate, if we continue to neglect high and holy duties. We were, and still are, desirous of seeing our people "ride upon the high places of the earth." The bosom of him who pens these remarks could not swell with greater pleasure than it would to hear the Seventh-day Baptist denomination spoken of as an upright, God-fearing community, and to know that the commendation was well deserved. But it is as certain as the truth of God's word, that if we despise Him, we shall be lightly esteemed. 1 Sam. 2: 30. We have written, in the hope that God's blessing would follow our poor effort; and while we have been writing, we have endeavored to take a view of ourselves, lest we also be tempted.

There is, however, a morbid sensitiveness with regard to the honor of our denomination, which serves only to precipitate the reproach we would avoid. Akin to the foolish fondness of parents, who take offense when the faults of their children are set before them, it takes unnecessary alarm when denominational sins are spoken of, and fears that the exposure will only tend to impair our influence over community. But what if, in the endeavor to save the reputation of the denomination before the world, we compromit the honor of God? What if, in trying to secure ourselves from censure, we do but cherish that corruption which, if persisted in, is sure to be our downfall? We think such morbid sensitiveness might better be dismissed.

But it may be, that all we have said, and all we can say, will do but little good. Verily, it would seem so; and we confess that we are sometimes sick at heart, when we see so many overwhelming proofs of the unwillingness of men, even of brethren, to deny themselves for the truth's sake. It is not merely our little influence that is disregarded, but the combined influence of many of our most respected ministers. Did not Conference, at its late session, discuss and re-affirm its conviction of the duty of Seventh-day Baptists to do all in their power to impress the public mind with the sinfulness of violating God's holy Sabbath? Did it not urge upon all Sabbath-keepers the importance of keeping aloof from whatever would weaken the influence of their testimony in its favor? And yet the ink that recorded that resolution was scarcely dried, when some that were there from a distance, and heard all the discussion, began to make their arrangements for starting on their journey homeward before the close of holy time, and afterwards, as we learned, actually put their purpose in execution. Not only so, but some, who made their appearance there on Sabbath day, in time for worship, had consumed about two-thirds of the Sabbath in getting there. And again we hear of some, professing to recognize the obligation to keep the Sabbath holy, who have just passed through our city, journeying, and consuming almost the whole of the sacred season in so doing, even to the neglect of making a passing call at the house of God. And must we keep silence under such a state of things? Must we whisper that all is well, or, at all events, grow mealy-mouthed, and mince the matter, lest our denominational reputation should suffer?

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

GLASGOW, September 3, 1852.

Our Queen, with her family and suite, reached her Scottish Highland Home two nights ago. She travels with an ease, and caring less for pomp than crowned heads often do, while there is a punctuality to appointments and arrangements that is rarely seen in dependents. She left London on Monday morning, and, resting one night by the way, arrived at Holyrood Palace, Edinburgh, on Tuesday afternoon. Starting in the morning of Wednesday, she reached Balmoral at night—the whole distance, except that of the last few hours in the Highlands, being accomplished by Railway. Her mother, the Duchess of Kent, who also has purchased a place in the Highlands, proceeded thither three weeks ago.

We have noted the promise of the Government to grant a charter to the new Crystal Palace Co., with the distinct proviso, that it is to be opened to the public on Sunday afternoons, having trains running between it and the metropolis. The direct encouragement thus to be given to Sunday profanation, as it is called, is obvious enough; while those who prefer Sunday to the Sabbath naturally expect, as a consequence, that additional license will be thereby given and taken for other Sunday amusements. The religious newspapers, (at least the London Record, and Glasgow Scottish Guardian,) call for farther efforts to prevent the accomplishment of the design. Vain are likely to be such efforts; a multitude of men are now busy erecting the building, under the pledge already received from the Earl of Derby—himself, by the way, the author (though anonymously, and about ten or twelve years ago,) of a good little volume in elucidation of the Saviour's parables. Some of the Sunday observers, seeing no prospect of their being likely to prevent the Sunday exhibitions at the Palace, propose to add to them the preaching of the Gospel there, by the most eloquent of the ministers—which they hope the Directors would connive at. Even if those whose hope and desire of gain is the only motive for their embarking such an amount of capital, in the hope of large returns of interest, could be induced to mar their purpose by commingling such discordant elements, surely those who propose such plans—and one of them subscribes himself "a once-beneficed clergyman"—forget that the cross of Christ and the foolishness of preaching will have little interest for those who have left the Capital in search of pleasure and amusement. Of the tens of thousands who may be congregated there on Sunday, professing the while to regard it as the Sabbath, a very small proportion, we apprehend, would be induced to listen to any eloquence that really made a demand for the crucifying of the flesh with its affections and lusts.

In London itself, a number of butchers, provision-dealers, shoemakers, and clothes-brokers, were charged at the police bar lately with transacting their ordinary business on Sunday at prohibited hours. Of these, a broker was fined 4s. 6d. for selling goods at 11 o'clock, as the magistrate did not see any necessity for prosecuting then such business, although there might be for the sale of bread, meat, and other provisions. Sunday trains, however, excite the greatest apprehension for the continued sanctity of Sunday. A Memorial has, accordingly, just been presented to the Directors of the South-Eastern Railway, signed by about 100 clergymen, praying them to discontinue the running of trains on Sundays, after half-past six o'clock in the morning, and before the hour of half-past five in the evening. A curtailed Sunday, sanctioned even by the clergy! The Secretary, in reply, intimated that "the Memorial has been considered by the Directors," and "that it will receive their farther attentive regard." Meanwhile, the trains run, and are likely to continue also to receive the farther attentive regard of the Directors, so long as dividends are thereby increased.

We have next to note Irish Sunday tomfoolery. A week ago the newspapers contained the following paragraph:—

THE KING OF DALKEY.—Sunday being the anniversary of the crowning of Mr. Henry Hughes, turner and blockmaker, 12 City Quay, his Majesty proceeded, as is customary on these occasions, in the steam vessel Mona, from the Quay to visit his loyal subjects in Dalkey Island, where he was received by some hundreds of them with the greatest fealty and enthusiasm."

Another such paragraph, of the same date, informs us that "Sunday being what is called 'The Walking Sunday' of Donnybrook Fair, 'The Green' was visited by a good many of our citizens, and a huge swarm of the 'gamins' of the metropolis."

The Sixth Annual Conference of the British Organization of the Evangelical Alliance, commenced its sittings in Dublin last week. A letter to one of the members, from Sir C. E. Eardley, dated Paris, Aug 12, says that "all Protestants in France expect days of fiercest persecution." The ground of this fear is indeed not confined to that country. The case has been mentioned of the Madiais, husband and wife, severely punished for reading the Bible and Protestant books at Florence. An appeal for the reversal of the sentence was taken to the Court of Cassation, which was rejected by that Court on the 7th August. Appeal was next made to the Grand Duke of Tuscany in their behalf, and he has just declared, that it would be against his conscience to modify the finding of the courts of law! The Hanoverian Government also has issued an order "forbidding all meetings of Anabaptists." The principality of Waldeck, too, has ordered the expulsion of teachers of those views.

On the other hand, however, Mr. Oncken, a Baptist minister, and agent at Hamburgh for the Edinburgh Bible Society, who was expelled in March last from Prussia, while circulating the Bible and preaching the Gospel, has been honorably reinstated, with express approval, by the King of Prussia, and liberty to travel and sojourn in any part of the monarchy.

MORE TESTIMONY FROM JERUSALEM.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Will you please insert in your forth-coming paper the following extract of a letter from Mr. Finn, the British Consul of Jerusalem, to Elijah Meshullam and Charles A. Minor; also, the letter of Bro. Charles A. Minor to the editor of The Presbyterian?

J. L. BOYD, Agent.

PHILADELPHIA, Sept. 16, 1852.

Extract from the Letter of Mr. Finn.

JERUSALEM, 29th June, 1852.

Few travelers have visited Jerusalem of late years, whose attention has not been drawn to the Valley of Artas, situated between Bethlehem and Solomon's Pools, where cultivation has been undertaken, and extended with surprising and satisfactory results, by John Meshullam, a Jewish convert to Christianity. For many years previous he had been a resident in Jerusalem, where, from 1841 to 1850, he had kept the only English Hotel, and for the past seven years he turned his attention to agriculture in the aforesaid valley, where there was a ruined village, a few patches of ground wretchedly cultivated, and a copious, unfailing spring of water, the whole bounded by stoney hills. There he leased a patch of ground from the poor peasants. In process of time, he leased another and another; built rough walls around them, sowed kitchen vegetables and grain for the support of his family, and for sale in Jerusalem. The valley began to asume a new aspect. After this, he erected a stone cottage, and brought his wife and seven children to reside there permanently in 1850, adding stable and poultry house, &c.

He had trying difficulties to encounter from the hostility of the wandering Arabs, who had been accustomed to water their flocks at the spring, who would sometimes steal his property, &c. These annoyances are now ended, he having conciliated the Arabs, by bringing down a supply of water for their flocks beyond his fields, and on various occasions stood their friend, as a mediator in disputes with others.

A peculiar feature has characterized the proceedings of Mr. Meshullam through his career in Palestine, especially while engaged in this undertaking—his pity for the poverty and degradation of the Jewish people. He is a sincere Christian, and, though he never considers himself a missionary for their spiritual interests as a teacher, yet he practices hospitality and Christian charity to his nation to a large extent. When he first commenced farming at Artas, he has been known to carry sacks of produce to the Jewish Quarter of Jerusalem, on purpose to sell them to the wretched, starving Jews, at prices very far below the common price—and in many instances giving them without price. Jews are constantly going to Artas, to beg, and obtain, measures of corn or grain a sack of kitchen vegetables, and a good meal; their wives and children frequently go also, as Artas is not far out of the road from Jerusalem to Hebron. But he is anxious to do something more permanently beneficial for them, and connected with agriculture. This brings us to notice the fact, that during last year some benevolent persons in the United States of America—having seen a pamphlet published in Philadelphia, describing his character and enterprise—sent him donations of seeds and agricultural implements, and some sums of money.

In March last, several persons arrived in Artas from the United States, with stores of seeds, tools, &c., and some money, to co-operate with and assist him in his benevolent task. There they still remain, living mostly in tents, and laboring in cultivation.

Of late, a considerable feeling has been roused among the Jews in Jerusalem of dissatisfaction at the oppressions of the rabbis, and of a desire to earn their bread out of the ground—the land of Israel; on which last point, they quote numerous apt passages from the Hebrew Scriptures. And it is determined, that public notice be given in England, Germany, and the United States, that subscriptions and donations will be thankfully received by Meshullam & Company, for carrying out the object of promoting agriculture in Artas by Jews, for their own support and sustenance.

JAMES FINN.

Letter of Mr. Minor.

ARTAS, (near Bethlehem,) July 30, 1852.

MESSRS. EDITORS,—I take great pleasure in addressing you from this land, and, after a residence here of nearly five months, I can truly say that our hearts are more devotedly attached to the land which the Lord hath chosen above all others. True, it is now desolate, and its hidden beauties and buried resources are almost entirely unnoticed by the passing traveler, as he hastily glances over its surface; but to the active resident, each day presents new evidences of the glory which once covered, and may again, with the Divine blessing, easily adorn this afflicted inheritance.

In the varied positions of this land, each fruit, vegetable, and nearly every plant and flower of every clime, may spring forth and bear in the greatest luxuriance. The continued experiments of Mr. Meshullam, as well as our own brief efforts on the capabilities of the soil and climate, have been followed with the most promising results. There is scarcely a mountain or hill, however barren in its appearance, which will not produce a large growth of the best of grapes, which, as a staple article of food one-third of the year, besides raisins and wine, yield a good profit. The olive, fig, almond, pomegranate, quince, and other trees of use, will grow every where on the most rugged hills; while on the wide terraces, in the valleys, and on the plains, the best qualities of grain are grown, embracing some varieties wholly unknown in America; and in those situations which can be irrigated, several successive crops of vegetables may be raised annually. Mr. Meshullam has raised three successive crops of American Indian corn during the summer months, as it requires less than fifty days from planting until harvest. We have already planted, and gathered, several kinds of vegetables since our arrival. The sweet potatoes (which we brought) have grown remarkably well, and promise, like our Indian corn, to furnish an excellent staple food for this country.

But I wish to speak of the present state of its inhabitants, especially the children of its ancient possessors, the Jews. If you could witness the reality of their sufferings—their abject poverty and extreme helplessness, being without means of employment, and, considering their great anxiety to learn and help themselves whenever the least opportunity is offered them, your most tender feelings would be touched, and your strongest energies engaged, to send without delay to their aid; especially were you duly to consider the feasible and permanent means of their relief, and future enlightenment in the knowledge of the truth, afforded by their being employed, under Christian example, in tilling the soil of their fathers, and particularly at the present time. A great change has recently taken place in the feelings of those who reside in Jerusalem; they have given up their strong prejudices, and, disregarding a law of the Talmud, which forbade them to labor in the soil, and having their minds opened to the benefits of agriculture, and seeing the safety with which Mr. Meshullam and ourselves reside in the open country, and also stimulated by the fact of our coming from our distant land to instruct and assist them, they have come out to Artas during the last month in large numbers, with letters of recommendation and entreaty from different rabbis, begging (in some cases with tears) for employment for themselves, and also for scores of their poor brethren. On being informed by Mr. Meshullam, that we were unable to employ at present but a very few, they again came out, requesting permission to write an appeal in Hebrew, which large numbers would sign before any authority, expressive of their great desire, and pledging themselves to engage in cultivation, and desired us to send it to our friends abroad, to assist with funds, in order that we may obtain sufficient land, implements, &c., to enable large numbers at once to proceed in the happy work of rearing "their own vine and fig tree" in their own land.

It is a well known fact, that numbers in the holy city have their minds partially enlightened, through the secret reading of the gospel; and it is undoubted, that this class compose those most anxious to escape from the bondage and charity support of the rubbis to the freedom of self-maintenance in a country life. Some may question their willingness and ability to labor; but all those which we have employed, have proved industrious and desirous to learn, and are often men of intelligence, and, in all cases, willing to accept the lowest wages. From Mr. Meshullam's experience of the capabilities of the soil, he is convinced, that were only a moderate capital invested in securing land and erecting cheap dwellings, and the first expenses defrayed, any number, according to the extent of land employed, might be sustained from the products of their own industry.

Providence has opened the way, for, during the last few years, great obstacles have been removed. The wildest Arab tribes are in the most complete terms of friendship, and will now assist rather than hinder. The rains have fallen in quantities unknown before, causing a great and permanent increase of water, while new springs have appeared in places entirely desert before; and the roaming Bedouin shieks earnestly desire cultivation around.

The present favorable state of affairs in this land, together with the recent change in the feelings of the Jews, form to the friends of Israel a most interesting and important "sign of the times." See the heart of the Jewish world stirred to seek and accept aid from and under the direction of Christians. It calls loudly at the hand of every believer—"through whose mercy they may obtain mercy"—to render the aid which they so much need. But we submit their own appeal to the people of Christ, and must leave the responsibility of their case with them, only reminding them that suffering numbers wait with patient hope for the result. In the mean time, we shall devote the feeble means in our power to encourage and assist them.

We are happy to state, that just at this needful moment we have received the sum of $420, through our agent, Mr. J. L. Boyd. Our prayer is, that God will abundantly bless and reward the kind donors, among whom we are gratified to notice the names of several of your readers. We beg they will accept the gratitude which we truly feel is their due, and desire that they cease not to remember, at the throne of grace, our and their humble effort in behalf of Israel.

The health of our little number, with one exception, has been remarkably good, and all are surprised to find the climate here far more pleasant and healthy than they had anticipated. Although engaged in toils and trials, yet their hearts are daily rejoiced with the rare evidences before them, that the promised day of blessing is dawning on this land, and on its ancient people; and their only and fervent desire is, that while the Lord is now hastening it "in his time," all his people may be co-workers together with him.

I herewith submit a copy of the translation of the Hebrew Petition of the Jews of Jerusalem, which they desired Mr. Meshullam and his American friends to send to the public, and which sixty-three Jews signed before the English Consul, which number might have been indefinitely increased, if desired.

"This shall be for a faithful witness in the hands of the bearer, the benevolent, who follows after righteousness, mercy, and multiplied goodness. Is not this the excellent Signor Meshullam, whose residence is in the holy dwelling place, the land of Israel, the most holy of all lands, (near) the holy city Jerusalem; may it be built and established speedily in our days, amen. Upon the land which is newly restored is the possession of him who buildeth the old waste places, having gardens, fountains, and springs, which ran among the valleys and hills from before even the ancient time of King Solomon, (peace be upon him,) the name of this place is now called Artas. And we, the poor sheep, came to the benevolent above-mentioned with bitter hearts—for our souls are bowed to the dust—and we said unto him, 'How didst thou come to this?' and he answered us, saying, 'Ye are as I am; if ye will labor in the ground as I do this day, then shall you also eat of her fruit, and be satisfied from her goodness; for he that tilleth his land shall be satisfied with bread.' When we heard this, we greatly rejoiced, as one that findeth great spoil. The same Signor Meshullam, who is above mentioned, promised us that he would exert himself on our behalf, and would write letters to the four parts of the earth, to all his acquaintances, and those who have encouraged him in this enterprise, that they should help us, and be a shield for us, and sustain us, for he cannot support such a number of souls and families from his own means; that they may show mercy, truth, and great righteousness unto us and our households, our children and little ones, that we may be enabled to buy land, make us gardens and vineyards, and labor in the ground; that we may walk in the ways of our forefathers, and be fed from the labor of our own hands, as our holy and pure fathers have done, (may their righteousness cover us;) and the land that shall be bought by the help of God (blessed be his name,) shall be unto us and our children for an everlasting inheritance, and they (the benefactors) shall obtain an everlasting name by comforting the souls of the seed of Israel, and fulfilling the commandment towards the children of our holy fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, (may their righteousness cover us,) that they may send unto us the free gift of their good hearts, and just what seemeth good in their own sight, through the means of an upright and faithful messenger. 'For the eyes of the righteous shall behold uprightness, and unto all that exceed in showing mercy, even upon them shall good blessings come, and in their days and our days shall Judah be saved, and Israel dwell safely, and the Redeemer shall come to Zion. Amen. So be it."

Very truly yours, in Christ,

CHARLES A. MINOR.

MISSIONARY SOCIETY'S ANNIVERSARY.

Substance of Eld. Maxson's Remarks.

I feel grateful to God, that we have a Report from the Executive Board of this Society, which gives unequivocal evidence, not only that the Society still lives, but that its operations are extending more widely over the moral wastes of our world. I am grateful to God, that he has enabled us to make false the prediction uttered by a missionary of another denomination, when leaving the shores of the United States, in company with our beloved brethren and sisters, for their future home, the field of their missionary toils, namely, that a people so small in numbers, and weak in wealth, would find themselves unable to sustain a foreign mission as expensive as they would find this to be. I say, I am glad, and feel grateful to God, that He has enabled his people to prove this prediction to be false. The mission has been sustained thus far, and I trust that, by the continuance of the Divine favor, it will continue to be sustained.

As a missionary organization, with all its weakness, this has received evident tokens of the favor of God. When, a number of years since, the subject of a foreign mission was presented for the consideration of the Society, at an annual session, the whole body seemed to be moved with the conflicting sensations of hope that they would be enabled to enter into this important department of evangelical labor and successfully prosecute it, and of fear that it would fail (as some of the efforts of our people had done) for want of suitable means and agencies to accomplish it. We had not the necessary funds to begin with, nor were our friends supposed to be sufficiently endowed with wealth to make it an easy matter to obtain from them what would be needful for such an undertaking. Nor had we, as we feared, the persons fitted for this work, who would feel disposed to sacrifice themselves, their kindred, and their country, and all their pleasant associations of Christian society, to live, to labor, and to die in a foreign, and probably a heathen land. But as soon as this Society resolved, by the permission of Providence, to engage in this work of a foreign mission, in addition to their domestic missionary efforts, God provided for them, not one devoted couple only, as had been contemplated, but two, and such as have given proof of their fitness for the work.

The first foreign field contemplated by the Society was Palestine—to evangelize and save the lost sheep of the house of Israel. But vascillating in regard to this, we thought for a time more favorably of Abyssinia. Finally, forbidden by the Spirit, as we thought, to go there, China was resolved upon as affording an ample field for our brethren to labor in the work of the Lord, without conflicting with differing missionary brethren. God, in his kindness, united our hearts in sending our beloved missionary family to China. And when a call was made for funds in order to carry out this arrangement, our brethren throughout the denomination responded to the call, and the Board was enabled to send them forth comfortably supplied with the means of support. Nor should we be unmindful of God's protecting kindness in their preservation during their long and perilous voyage, and bringing them safely to their desired haven. Thus we can say, Hitherto the Lord hath helped us. And has not God continued to favor this mission? He has been a sun and shield to our missionaries, delivering them from disease and death, and blessing their labors of love in the conversion of some precious souls, whom God has rescued from the influence of their pagan friends, by calling them to sit with Christ in his kingdom, and others who are now their fellow-laborers in their good work. Our brethren at home offered willingly to build for them a house of worship, and dwellings to shelter them from the scorching sun of summer, and the chilling storms of winter. Surely, God has looked with favor upon this missionary enterprise.

And now what do we hear? The Macedonian cry comes to us from the interior of the Chinese empire, to go to the help of a large colony of the lost sheep of the house of Israel. Palestine is sending to us a cry for missionary help. On the North, the way is open to Canada for the labors of our missionaries. In the West, also, where our domestic labors have been performed, does our labor increase upon our hands. Surely, God does not design that we should be an idle people. He has assigned to us our work; He has committed to us an important trust, viz., to restore the Sabbath of Jehovah to its honored place in the ark, from which it has been cast out by an erring church.

It is important that the church, and the whole church, recognize her appointed and appropriate work; that she consider herself as having been organized by her divine Founder, as a purely missionary organization, for the express purpose of going into all the world, and preaching the gospel to every creature; and teaching them all things whatsoever He has commanded. The church that is unwilling to labor in this department, cannot reasonably hope for the commendation of the Lord. And he who will not work, nor by his contributions aid others in working, for the glory of God and the salvation of perishing sinners, shall not eat of the precious fruits of the heavenly Canaan.

May our brethren be not weary in well doing. As a people, we have but just begun our appropriate work. It is our duty, unquestionably, to labor, and to make personal sacrifices, in order to enable the Executive Board to meet all these claims upon them. None are impoverished by what they have hitherto done. The more we do, the more we shall be enabled to do. God will multiply the seed sown. Let us put our hands to the work in earnest. Hitherto our labor has not been in vain in the Lord; nor will it be, while we willingly come to the help of the Lord in this great and good work. I hope this report will be not only adopted, but published, and sent forth on the wings of the wind to our distant brethren and sisters, and that it will be the means of invigorating and en[illegible]ging them to the increasing labors of mis[illegible] benevolence.

"THERE WAS NO MORE SEA."

There is apparently a disingenuous mode of argument, which, for want of knowledge or candor, is too frequently adopted, even by good men. Commencing their subject by inaccurately stating the views of their opponent, they very adroitly improve the advantage to offer their own logical and profound objections. For instance, "There was no more sea," is said to be ascribed to that state of the earth which shall first succeed the gospel dispensation; and the absurdity of this belief, in connection with the views of the more literal expounders of the word, is quite ironically enlarged upon. If the writer will inform himself more diligently, he will discover his own mistake. The Millennarian believes that the thousand years begin when the gospel proclamation ends. During that happy season of universal peace and holiness, the sea, as at the present time, is very prominent, her great waters still rolling on in all their suggestive sublimity. The ships of Tarshish are borne upon the ocean wave, "bringing his sons from afar, and his daughters from the ends of the earth." "After this," in the order of things—for order is Heaven's great law—"the sea gives up the dead that are in her," the earth and the heavens flee away before the face of Him who sat on the great white throne, and "there was found no place for them." As it is written, "Behold, I make all things new," the new earth appears, receives the nations of them that are saved, where they dwell in everlasting righteousness and bliss, walking, not in the light of the sun, or of the moon, but illuminated with the effulgent splendor of the New Jerusalem. There is too often a light manner of handling this sacred and deeply-interesting subject; but how dangerous to take away any part of the prophecy of this book, or to add thereto! This outline, suggesting questions and answers, may be profitably occupied. Careless reader, search the Scriptures as, did the noble Bereans, and see of these things are so.

THE AMERICAN BOARD.—The Annual Meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, recently held at Troy, was one of uncommon interest and pleasure, arising in part, probably, from the large number of returned missionaries in attendance, and the fact that during the past year the Board has been freed from debt. It appeared from the Treasurer's Report, that the receipts for the year ending July 31st, were $301,723 70, and the expenditures, exclusive of the debt, $257,727 95. The debt had [illegible] canceled, and there remained in the treasury a balance of $5 35. The Annual Report of the Board stated that fourteen ordained missionaries and 23 assistant missionaries, in [illegible] 37 persons, have been sent out, for the [illegible] time; and 5 missionaries and 4 assistant missionaries, in all 9 persons, have returned to former fields of labor; making a total of 46 missionary laborers who have been sent into the foreign fields during the year. There are now under appointment in this country, 14 males and 13 females, in all 27 persons, expected to take their departure as soon as their arrangements shall have been completed. We shall endeavor to find room next week for a general view of the missions of the Board.

FOREIGN MISSIONARIES.—Two young men, named Nesbet and Whittaker, recent graduates of Rochester University, have been conse[illegible]ed to the work of foreign missions. Mr. Whittaker has since married a daughter of Cephas Bennett, long a missionary at Tavoy. She was born in Burmah, but brought at an early age to this country, where she received her education, and in a revival in Homer, obtained a hope in the Saviour, and now returns back to the place of her nativity as a coadjutor with her husband in the good cause in which her father and mother have spent the greater portion of their days. Her mother, who is making a visit here for her health, will return in November, delightfully associated with her daughter on her voyage, and in the sweet hope of rejoining her husband under most gratifying circumstances.

ELD. ELIAS BURDICK requests us to say, that he has settled with the Church at Truxton, and that his post-office address is DeRuyter, Madison Co., N. Y.

Evangelization of China.—Within the last four or five years it has been the aim of some of the Christian missionaries settled in the free ports of China to carry the Gospel, as opportunities offered, to the natives of the interior. One of the most diligent and successful laborers in this field has been the Rev. Mr. Lobschied, who was sent to China by the Rhenish Missionary Society. He has found his knowledge of medicine of great value in procuring for him facility of access into remote towns and villages, from some of which he received urgent requests for visits. In all sorts of situations—in the market-places, in shops, and in family circles, he found abundant opportunities of preaching the Gospel. There were many respectable listeners, and a few who sought, in private interviews, to learn more perfectly the things of the kingdom of grace. Mr. Lobscheid is about to return to China as the agent of the Chinese Evangelization Society of London, accompanied by the Rev. Dr. James Thomson.

The Contrast.—Several years ago the National Era was started at Washington, to advocate the cause of Freedom. It has, we believe, been a paying concern from the first, and now circulates some twenty thousand copies weekly. A little more than two years ago the Southern Press was started at the same place, to advocate the cause of Slavery. At the end of two years it was discontinued for the following reason, as stated in the closing number:—

"The main cause of this result is the delinquency of its subscribers. There are now forty thousand dollars due to the paper for subscriptions, and this is only the beginning of its third year. And if this sum were now paid in hand, it would not indemnify the proprietor and senior editor for his pecuniary advances, liabilities, and services in the undertaking."

Liberal Bequests.—The late Dr. John Wiley, of Brooklyn, made the following bequests in his will:—

Brooklyn Protestant Orphan Asylum,	$500
Brooklyn Asylum for Indigent Aged Females,	500

Jewish Festival.—The New Year Festival of the Jews occurred last week, commencing on the evening of Second-day and closing on the evening of Fourth-day. Most of the stores kept by Jews were closed. They appear to be as tenacious in the observance of their feasts now as their fathers were in the days of the Hebrew Commonwealth. Any other people, scattered as the Jews are, would have become denationalized and lost as a distinct people, centuries ago; but the Jew remains a Jew still, and will continue to remain so "until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in."

Cumberland Missions.—The Cumberland Presbyterian Church has an incorporated "Board of Foreign and Domestic Missions." Its receipts the past year have been larger than before, and yet have but little exceeded $2,000: its mission churches embrace about 300 members—63 added during the year; its missions, tion far, are confined to "Home;" the only status occupied beyond Kentucky and Missouri is Oregon. California, Texas, and the Choctaw country are contemplated as fields.

Liberal Contributors.—There are at the present time two hundred and fifty-seven individuals who contribute $150 each to the American Tract Society annually, for the support of a Colporteur. More than one hundred of these generous donors are residents of New York and Brooklyn, several of whom pay the salaries of more than one Colporteur.

The New York Daily Times.—This racy and reliable diurnal entered upon its second volume September 18th. Heretofore, each number has furnished four six-column pages for one cent; but hereafter its size and price are to be doubled, while its value will probably be trebled. It will be difficult to find a better paper for the same money. Edited by H. J. Raymond, Esq. Published by Raymond, Jones, & Co., at No. 113 Nassau-st., New York.

The Musical World weekly newspaper, published by Dyer & Willis, is rapidly gaining an enviable distinction among our popular hebdomadals. It is conducted with ability and spirit, and not only presents an agreeable artistic miscellany, but promotes the interests of education by its practical instructions in the rudiments of music.

The Church in Truxton.—Eld. Elias Burdick is laboring with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Truxton. A recent letter from him says: "Our prospects here are somewhat encouraging, and I hope that the church will arise and live. Formerly, diversities of opinion in regard to discipline, and distracting movements, well-nigh destroyed this church, as well as many others. But that subject is now harmoniously disposed of, and we have good meetings and an increasing congregation."

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

At the annual church meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Church, held at Lincklaen, Sept. 12, 1852, Eld. Sebeus M. Burdick was restored to his original ministerial standing and office; and, by a vote of the church, was requested to exercise his talents and gifts by laboring in the capacity of a minister, in good and regular standing in the church; and it was farther resolved, that the above be forwarded for publication in the Sabbath Recorder. Done by order and in behalf of the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Lincklaen, this 12th day of September, 1852.

European News.

The U. S. Mail Steamship Pacific, with European news to Sept. 8th, arrived at New York last Sabbath afternoon. The following summary embraces the principal items of news brought by her.

He has promised a million of florins to those magnates who are suspected of being in correspondence with Kossuth if they will assist in the recovery of that crown.

The first prize, a splendid state carriage, with equipments, was drawn by two coffee girls in the refreshment room of the Freiburg Railway station. The King of Prussia drew a piece of cloth and a pair of boots.

An electric time ball is to be put up on a prominent spot on South Foreland Point, near Dover, which will act simultaneously with the electric clocks at the Greenwich Observatory. The falling of this ball, and the simultaneous firing of a gun by electricity, will enable all vessels within ten miles, and those in the Downs, to regulate their chronometers to a second.

Religious communities are extending in an extraordinary degree throughout France.

Another Railroad Accident.

A sad accident occurred on the N. Y. and Erie Railroad, at Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., on Tuesday evening, Sept. 14, about 10 o'clock. The accommodation train, running east, was just starting from the depot, near a minute before its time, when it was run into behind by a freight train, which was said to be running by telegraph, off its regular time. The locomotive plowed its way through the passenger car of the accommodation train near its entire length, and of the 11 or 12 persons, including passengers and hands, on that car, no one escaped unhurt. One, named Saxbury, of Hornellsville, was instantly killed. Jas. McElroy, brakeman, of Canada, and Thos. McCallen, oilman, of Dunkirk, expired in a few minutes. Matthew Stillman, of Friendship, Allegany Co., and J. E. Greek, from Addison, died about 8 o'clock next morning. Several others were badly bruised and scalded. The engineer of the freight train squat by the furnace door, and escaped unhurt. The fireman jumped off soon enough to save himself. The scene, as described by the inhabitants who heard the screams and cries of the scalded passengers, was heartrending beyond degree. All the dead that were not killed by the concussion were scalded by the escaping steam from the locomotive. The skins of several hands with the nails on, were picked up next morning.

And now, who is to blame? One conductor waited a moment for his time to leave—the other, (it is said,) though off the regular time, was running by telegraphic orders down a grade of fifty feet to the mile, with a heavy train, at a tremendous speed, and by orders was to reach Hornellsville, four miles distant, about ten minutes from the time of the collision. These are the reports.

Public Education in Prussia.—The N. Y. Tribune gathers the following statistical informatiom from a German paper, and gives it, with a hint to the reader to remember that the Kingdom of Prussia, including all its provinces east and west, is only as large as New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey combined, though possessing a population of near 17,000,000.

According to official reports, there are at present in Prussia 24,201 common schools, with 30,865 teachers, and 2,453,062 scholars; 505 Burger schools—the pupils pay a small sum for tuition in these—with 2,269 teachers, and 69,302 scholars; 385 girls' schools, with 1,918 teachers, and 53,570 scholars; 117 gymnasia, with 1,664 teachers, and 29,474 scholars. The 46 normal schools, or school-teachers' seminaries, count 2,411 pupils; in the seven universities, at the end of last year, were 4,306 students, and in the six theological seminaries, 240. The budget for 1852 grants 349,228 thalers—about $262,000—for the support of the Protestant Church, while the expense of the State for the Catholic Church reaches 725,401 thalers, or $550,000.

Cholera in Western New York.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune, under date of West Bloomfield, N. Y., Sept. 10, says:—

There have been three or four undoubted cases of cholera at Genesee—originating there—all traceable to bad personal habits, and exposure to the fumes and stench of a very offensive slaughter-house in the vicinity of the residence of the deceased.

At Portage and vicinity there have been several cases of cholera among those who attended the bridge celebration, some two weeks since. Those who have the best opportunity to know, charge the subsequent sickness to the food, drink, heat, and exposure of that occasion. There had been several deaths by cholera among the laborers on the works at and near the bridge before the celebration, rendering it, perhaps, not altogether prudent to call 15,000 or 20,000 people together for the celebration referred to.

At Nunda village, a Dr. Warner and his father-in-law, residing in the same family, died on Saturday and Sunday, 4th and 5th inst., of disease called cholera by attending physicians. But in the doctor's case death might have ensued from like exposure, at any season, and in any locality.

A Court convened at Genesee on Monday, 6th inst; but although pressed with a great array of criminal and other business, adjourned, on account of apparent or anticipated disease among those attending, until the 3d week in October next. In fact, the panic as to the public health absorbs all other topics of thought, and it is quite impossible to divert the current at present.

New Settlers in Potter Co., Pa.—The Coudersport Journal of Aug. 10th says: Our quiet village was suddenly quite excited on Sunday evening last, by the announcement that the world-renowned Ole Bull had arrived in town. As no intimation of his visit had reached us, most of our citizens were at first exceedingly suspicious about the matter, but the presence of John F. Cowan, Esq., from Williamsport, soon dissipated all doubts, and we began to realize our good fortune. But our astonishment was greatly increased, on learning that this celebrated man had purchased of Mr. Cowan one hundred and twenty thousand acres of land in this County, with a view to its speedy settlement by his countrymen. Ole Bull's reputation, genius, and wealth, will enable him to settle as many of his countrymen on his new purchase as he may desire; and we therefore look upon this movement as the most important that has ever occurred in the history of this County. As a further evidence of the reality of the change that is taking place in our affairs, and of the intention to settle our South-eastern wilderness, there arrived on Monday evening some thirty fine-looking, robust, and determined sons of Norway, on their way to Ole Bull's new purchase. As we understand it, this is the vanguard of the army which is to follow—and to follow just as fast as these pioneers can make arrangements for others to live.

The Henry Clay Catastrophe.—At 12 o'clock, on the 15th inst., the Grand Jury came into the United States District Court, and presented a true bill for manslaughter against Thomas Collyer, James F. Tallman, John Germain, Edward Hubbard, James L. Jessup, James Elmendorf, and Charles Merritt. The indictment contains fifteen counts, is a very voluminous document, occupying twenty-eight pages of foolscap, closely written. It alledges that, within the jurisdiction of the Court, the defendants were engaged on board the steamboat Henry Clay, and that by their negligence and inattention to their duties, on the 28th of July, 1852, the lives of Stephen Allen, Abraham Crist, A. J. Downing, and divers other persons, were lost, on the navigable waters of the United States, to wit: between the ebb and flow of the tide on the Hudson River, &c., &c., &c. In the course of the week, the defendants will be brought up to plead, and a day will probably be named for the trial, which may be set down for the October or November term.

Frightful Railroad Accident.—As the freight train of the Michigan Southern Railroad was passing over the Calumet Bridge beyond Ballytown, on Monday afternoon, Sept. 13, the axle of one of the freight cars broke, and the car was thrown off the bridge, carrying with it three other cars, among which was one filled with emigrant passengers. They fell bottom up, and were almost entirely demolished, as the distance was some fifteen or more feet. It was supposed that the passengers were nearly all killed. As soon as the locomotive could be detached, it went to La Porte, and in about two hours returned with all the physicians that could be obtained. Drs. Meeker and Higday amputated the leg of a man whose ankle was crushed, and dressed the wounds of all others who were injured. They were then placed in the cars and brought to Chicago, and placed under the care of competent persons, at the expense of the Michigan Southern Company.

A Teacher for the West.—The Boston Chronicle says: "Among the women now at Hartford, Conn., preparing to leave as teachers for the West, under the auspices of Gov. Slade, there is one young woman worthy of special mention. An orphan and penniless, she resolved to educate herself and move in a higher sphere. Amid poverty and toil, she began her labors. She entered a factory to earn her bread, and obtain means to educate herself. Her nights she devoted to study. Her aim has been reached. Her work is done and well done. She is a fine scholar. She can teach French and Latin; she is a fine performer and instructor of music, and is now ready for the field before her—the illimitable West.

Precocity.—In allusion to the late Bishop Henshaw, a writer in the Banner of the Cross says that he received the degree of A. B. at the remarkable early age of sixteen years, and his bacheloric degree was followed by those of A. M. and D. D. He officiated as lay reader in the church at Cambridge, while yet a youth, and before he had attained his nineteenth year, he had founded two new congregations in Vermont. He was ordained a deacon on the 13th of June, 1813, the day he attained his 21st year; and on the 13th of June, 1816, was admitted to the priesthood by Bishop Hobart, the earliest day allowed by the canons.

The American Board received more than $300,000 the past year, an amount altogether beyond that of any preceding.

SUMMARY.

The Montreal Herald narrates this affecting instance of patriotic enthusiasm: "We regret to state that a man, named Mackenzie Rose, fell a victim to his loyalty, in the town of Brockville, on the 29th ult. We learn from the Recorder, that on that day the deceased observed a boat at anchor in the river, on the mast of which the "Stars and Stripes" floated above the "Old Union Jack." This irritated poor Rose's feelings, and he resolved to put the Union Jack in its proper place—above the other flag. No boat being at hand by means of which he could reach the flags, he went into the river for that purpose, but was suddenly seized with an apoplectic fit, and drowned.

Mrs. Mary Gregg, wife, of Ephraim K. Gregg, of Munnsville, Madison Co., N. Y., was shot through the body Thursday evening, Sept. 6, about 8½ o'clock, as she was washing dishes before her pantry window. The shot came from the outside, and was evidently fired within a few feet of the window. The unfortunate woman expired about 3 o'clock next morning. At the time the gun was fired, Mrs. Susan M. Gregg, sister-in-law of the deceased, was standing beside her, assisting her in the work. No traces of the murderer have been found, and no cause can be assigned for the commission of the deed.

An attractive feature of the present exhibition of the Pennsylvania Horticultural Society, is a display of models of nearly one hundred varieties of pears, apples, and other fruits, the production of the genius, taste, and skill of Messrs. Town & Glover, of Fishkill Landing, New York. The models are executed in wax, and the imitation of the most minute particle of the interior and exterior organization of the natural fruit is so perfect as to deceive the very best judges. Every shade of coloring, and every defect even, are wonderfully counterfeited.

A dispatch dated Springfield, Friday, Sept. 17, 1852, says: A fatal railroad accident occurred this morning at Cabotville, just as the excursion train was leaving for this place. The engineer, in letting on the steam too suddenly, caused such a concussion of the cars as to throw all the passengers from their seats, two of whom, Mr. Stone, from Northampton, and another (name unknown) from Holyoke, were killed.

The General Ticket Agent of the New York and Erie Railroad, in reply to a letter asking for a Reduction of Fare to Delegates to the Anniversary of the Bible Union, and Baptist State Convention, says that tickets will be sold to such delegates from Dunkirk, Hornellsville, Elmira, Owego, Binghampton, Deposit, Delaware, Middletown, Goshen, Chester, Cuba, and Narrowsburg, to New York and return, at single fare. Tickets to be good from the 6th to the 18th Oct.

The boats of the Southern Michigan Railroad line on Lake Erie are to be fully furnished with large India Rubber life-preservers. They are each furnished with life ropes and are capable of sustaining forty or fifty people. They are now being manufactured by one of our leading India Rubber Companies. This attention to the safety of passengers is creditable to the Michigan Southern Company.

A pickpocket on one of the steamboats between Albany and New York last week, stole from N. M. Rowe, of Oswego, money, notes, and drafts amounting to $2,000. The drafts, however, proved not to be available, and the thief probably feared that they might be traced to him, returned them by mail to Mr. Rowe. They amounted to about $1,650.

Adams & Co.'s Express recently added a feature to its facilities, by forwarding a female child, seven years old, from Washington City to its parents at Dayton, Ohio. The child had been separated from its distressed parents for a year, and no means were afforded for its return until the agent of this Express company was applied to, and generously demonstrated the availability of this means of transportation.

We learn that Barnum, the Napoleon of managers, has concluded an engagement with Catharine Hayes, to give sixty Concerts under his direction, in California, Mexico, Cuba, and the U. States, and British Provinces of N. A. Mr. Barnum pays her $50,000, and one half the net profits. Sig. Mengis and other artists are also engaged, and the party sails for California in November.

Some of our exchanges seem to feel no little pride that a couple of live German Princes have seen fit to visit us. One is probably a brother or cousin of the Duke of Nassau, the independent Monarch of an immense territory on the Rhine, 55 miles long by 33 wide; the other is from a little principality, which was given to Nassau in 1806, and to Prussia in 1814.

Other victims of the Reindeer calamity have been added to the list of the dead. On Tuesday morning Miss Lockwood expired at Malden; and on Wednesday morning Mrs. Williamson, wife of Rev. Geo. R. Williamson, also died. The recovery of Miss Quigly is despaired of. The list of deaths by this calamity now numbers 33.

A great fire occurred at Ravenna, Ohio, on the morning of the 15th inst., which burned down 12 stores and several private dwellings, but little of the contents being saved, so rapid was the spread of the flames. The loss is estimated at from $40,000 to $60,000 in buildings alone, the insurance on which is partial. The town presents a deplorable sight.

In the village of Lockport, Sept. 13, as Mr. Flynn, a farmer, was driving with his wife, child, and father-in-law, his horses ran away and upset the vehicle, killing Flynn and breaking the arms of his wife. The horses then ran into a buggy in which were T. L. Ely, Esq., and Mr. Harvey, of Lockport. Mr. Ely was seriously, if not fatally, injured.

An elegant quarto volume has been prepared by Mr. Charles H. The division of the estate of John Randolph, in the County of Charlotte, known as Middle Quarter, or Roanoke, was sold, Monday, 5th inst., at Charlotte Court-house, for something less than $25,000. Wood Bouldin, Esq., of the city of Richmond, was the purchaser.

More than fourteen thousand persons were carried over the Eighth-avenue Railroad, on Sunday last.

The Cincinnati Commercial mentions the trial of a life preserving trunk in the Ohio River, on Thursday, 26th ult. In the trunk was placed a lot of clothing and a variety of articles. From the mouth of Deer Creek the inventor started, seated upon his diminutive craft; when opposite the foot of Main street he met the steamboat G. W. Sparhawk, and rode the waves safely, not a drop of water entering the trunk. On the Kentucky shore, below Covington, he landed, and upon inspection the contents of the trunk were found to be free from even dampness.

One day last week, three brothers—all boys, and living in Buffalo—went into an orchard and ate freely of unripe apples. The next morning they all lay dead in a room together, having been attacked with cholera in the most virulent form.

A Year of Music for Nothing!—almost.

The object of this work is to furnish, 1.—A weekly supply of new and choice music. 2.—A complete and unusual Course of Musical Instruction. 3—Fearless and trustworthy Criticisms of Musical Pieces, Works, and Performances, and 4—Entertaining Musical Reading, together with a comprehensive Synopsis of events and things Musical, as they shall transpire; all to be furnished in a style of taste and elegance in harmony with the subjects treated of, and the refined minds of those to whom such topics are addressed.

The Size of The Musical World and Times is that which is most conducive to convenience and beauty; being a Royal Quarto of sixteen pages, ten by fourteen inches in size, or more than double the size of the pages of magazines. It is printed on handsome paper and clear type; and its appearance is such as to render it an appropriate ornament of the Pianoforte, or Parlor table.

Music.—Each number of the Musical World and Times will contain at least four pages of superior and popular music, making over two hundred pages of music yearly; which, bought at Music Stores would cost, at least, $25.

Sacred Music.—Particular attention will be paid to this department, and the wants of country choirs and families will be carefully studied and met.

Secular Music.—The best possible variety of Secular Music, Vocal and Instrumental, will be regularly given, to supply which, the most eminent composers will render service.

Music for Little Fingers.—Young children and learners will also be cared for. The world and the interests of Art will hardly progress without them; therefore, in our selection of music, we shall always bear them in mind, and often furnish a page for their especial benefit.

Musical Instruction.—A complete course of Musical Instruction will be given; including Elementary Instruction, Harmony, Thorough Bass and Composition, Musical Form, or the Architecture of Music, and Instrumentation. Musical exercises will accompany this instruction, and the student will be able to correct his own examples by the rules afforded. In short, the student may become, by this course, master of the whole subject of music.

Criticisms.—These will be impartial, truthful, and perfectly independent—just what is needed in this age of indiscriminate and unlimited puffery.

Musical News.—Our facilities for obtaining both foreign and domestic musical news of interest, are unequalled; and all events of importance will be recorded.

Musical Reading.—Musical literature—a class of reading as interesting as it is difficult to furnish—will always be found in our columns. We are enabled to do this by our facilities of translation, and by the access, which we have lately gained, to unusually rich artistic materials

Important.—The subscribers announce with pleasure, that they have the active co-operation and practical assistance of Lowell Mason, Wm. Vincent Wallace, Thos. Hastings, Wm. B. Bradbury, Geo. J. Webb, Jonas Chickering, Oliver Ditson, Geo. F. Root, Firth, Pond & Co., Wm. Hall & Son, Mason & Law, Newman & Ivison, and other parties long and favorably known to the musical public.

Miscellaneous.

An Editorial Aeronaut.

The Paris correspondent of the Washington Republic states that M. Coste, one of the late editors of the Avenment, had deserted journalism for æronautics. The third ascent of this gentleman was the most perilous in ærostatic annals. The wind had been violent all day, and at 5 o'clock in the forenoon, the hour of departure, the balloon, instead of being of the form of a pear, looked like the letters S. M. Goddard advised his pupil not to venture; all the gentlemen who had engaged places in the car refused to embark; and the audience were upon the point of opposing the ascent, when M. Coste, taking advantage of a lull in the wind, jumped into his place and gave the order to let go. His departure could not have been called an ascent; his upward motion was so slight that he barely escaped the roof sheltering the Hippodrome; but his speed horizontally was terrific. In less than thirty seconds he was out of sight, and the universal belief was, that he never again would be seen alive. He soon found himself in the midst of the clouds that were causing all the commotion; and knowing that it was impossible to descend, he determined to soar above them. He threw out thirty pounds of ballast, and was soon conscious that the balloon was ascending rapidly. But so extended were the clouds, that it was only at an elevation of 22,000 feet (four miles) that he came in view of the sun and left the wind below him. He speedily found that he could not remain in so rarified an atmosphere; his ears hummed, his breathing was difficult, and pieces of paper that he threw over fell like lead. It became indispensable to descend, and to brave the fury of the elements as best he might.

His strength was so reduced, and friction was so remarkably increased, that he could not, until after repeated efforts, raise the valve and allow a portion of the gas to escape. At such an altitude the ascension force of gas is doubled, and when the valve opened, a quantity was discharged that at once destroyed the balance, and the balloon began to descend furiously. M. Coste threw out every thing he could dispense with, and lashed himself to the car. The earth began soon to appear, and approach at a frightful rapidity. The balloon struck sideways, and ploughed up the field for some twenty yards. The æronaut freed himself from his cordage, and jumped ashore unhurt. The balloon, of a hundred or more lbs., was off again in a twinkling, but M. Coste caught hold of the anchor-rope, which is always allowed to hang, and suffering himself to be taken up a dozen yards, brought the balloon back. By this time assistance had arrived. A party of stout peasants bound the frantic machine to a tree—where it was disinflated. M. Coste arrived at the Hippodrome the next morning at 10 o'clock, and was received as a man risen from the dead. He had been given up as lost by all who saw him start. Nothing daunted, he has made ascensions since, and has seen nothing yet, he says, to dissuade him from adopting the career of an æronaut.

The Volcanic Eruption at the Sandwich Islands.

The annexed very interesting notice of a visit to the scene of the late eruption is copied from the San Francisco Pacific:—

You doubtless have seen already in the Polynesian an account of the recent eruption on Mauna Loa; but as it was my privilege to be a near eye-witness of it for twenty-four hours, when its action was the most magnificent, I will send you a brief description of what I saw and heard. The first eruption on the summit of Mauna Loa, about 14,500 feet above the level of the sea, I only saw in the far distance, it being on the Hilo side, and opposite from us. That outbreak was very sudden, and, as seen at Hilo, was most magnificent, where, though some sixty miles distant, the light was so great as to awaken the slumbering inhabitants. This was early on the morning of February 17th. It continued its action only about twenty-four hours; then all was quiet again, and it was supposed that the internal fires had sufficiently disgorged themselves; but, early on the morning of the 29th, it burst out again with great fury, half way down the mountain, in the very direction of Hilo. It sent forth a liquid stream of great depth and width, which flowed at the rate of several miles an hour, threatening ruin to the village and bay of Hilo, thirty-six miles distant. This stream continued to flow, with diminished activity, for more than three weeks. It ceased to flow entirely before it reached Hilo, ending the painful suspense so long felt there.

The light of the volcano at night was very great, illuminating the surrounding country for many miles distant, and giving to the overhanging clouds the appearance of an immense body of fire. After witnessing this for several nights, my desire to visit it became so strong that I resolved to make the long and tedious journey, to take a near view of this grand display of the Almighty's power. Accompanied by Mr. Fuller, I set out on the first day of March. After traveling through woods and over wide districts of naked lava, we arrived at the vicinity of the eruption on the forenoon of the third day. Its deep, unearthly roar, which we began to hear early on the day before, "waxed louder and louder," as we drew nearer and nearer the action, until it resembled the roar of the ocean's billows when driven by the force of a hurricane against a rock-bound coast; or like the deafening roar of Niagara.

We first reached the deep channel through which a wide stream of liquid lava had flowed down the mountain, desolating an area of vast extent; it had ceased to flow in this direction, but was flowing still at a little distance, at which we gazed with delight. The main stream was still beyond, which we could not approach, on account of the great heat; but at night we had a fine view of the fiery river, at no great distance from our encampment. Though the lava gushed out in several places like water springs, yet the main fountain was one of indescribable grandeur. In the midst of a forming cone, with a base of two or three hundred feet, there shot up a jet of clear liquid lava to the height of from four hundred to eight hundred feet, combining, in its ascent and descent, all the beauties of the finest water-fountains. Jet after jet ascended in constant and regular succession, day after day; descending, it mostly fell back into the crater, but sometimes it fell spattering on its sides, and flowed down, uniting with the main stream. The outer portions cooled to a blackened mass while in the air; the upper and lighter portions were carried by the propelling force to the regions of the clouds, and fell in showers over the surrounding country.

The intense heat of the fountain and streams of lava caused an influx of cool air in every quarter; this created terrific whirlwinds, which, constantly stalking about, like so many sentinels, bade defiance to the daring visitor. These were the most dangerous of any thing about the volcano. Sometimes we were compelled to prostrate ourselves for safety. Once we ventured within about a quarter of a mile of the great jet; soon one of the most terrific whirlwinds formed at the crater, and advanced straight towards us, threatening us with instant ruin; but, fortunately for us, it spent its force and turned to the right, leaving us to make a rapid retreat.

We saw a similar one whirling round the jet, and concealing it with a dense cloud of ashes, as if engaged in a furious combat. The two contending elements presented a most wonderful spectacle. When the strife ceased, the fountain appeared in constant action, as though nothing had occurred. Clouds approaching the volcano were driven back, and set moving in wild confusion.

The glare of the liquid fountain was very great, even when the sun was shining; but at night it was vastly more so, casting the light of nearly a full moon in the shade, and turning night into day. Spending the night near the eruption, during its greatest action, we felt ourselves highly privileged.

Very few mortals have had the opportunity of hearing such a deep, unearthly roar, and of witnessing such a molten river, such a lofty fiery fountain, such terrific whirlwinds and agitated clouds, all at the same time, and within a little space. Such a scene is calculated to fill one with feelings of awe and reverence towards the great Author of nature's wondrous works. With great reluctance we left a spectacle so rare, and retraced our steps. That day we reached the old volcano Kilauea, and spent the night on the brink of the crater. There is not much action there at present.

Time will not permit me to add more.

Sincerely yours, H. KINNEY.

The Perils of the Sea.

From the Boston Times.

The steamship Pacific, Capt. Nye, left Liverpool on the 28th of July last bound for New York, with about one hundred passengers, besides engineers, sailors and servants, about 120 more. On the outward passage to Liverpool, Capt. Nye discovered a difference in his compasses—the one in the binnacle differing from the one on deck. On leaving Liverpool, an allowance was made for this difference, and which proved correct; as the ship passed the Tuskar Light and Cape Clear at about the distance intended. The first 24 hours' run was very favorable, being 327 miles—the second equally so, being 300 miles. On Friday, the third day out, being then entirely clear of Ireland and on the broad Atlantic, a thick fog set in, which lasted until Monday, when we were enabled to get a good observation, and found the ship nine miles north of the great circle or latitude intended. The ship's course was then altered so as to place her on that circle line, and which would carry her about five or ten miles south of Cape Race.

On Wednesday morning, at 6 o'clock, it was supposed we were about abreast of the Cape, and the officers and men forward were told to keep a good look-out for land. At half-past 8 the same morning, the sea being smooth, the fog thick, a sudden call was made of "A boat alongside." The engines were ordered to be stopped, but before this could be done, the boat in which were two men, was swept under the paddle-wheels, and the two men instantly killed, fragments of the boat only being seen floating on the surface. By this time the engine was stopped, and the ship's headway deadened; when, about the length of the ship ahead, a rock rose up, as it were, out of the ocean, the top of which could not be seen. The helm was ordered to the star-board, the ship rounded to, almost as it were on a pivot, our paddle-boxes coming within about twenty feet of an immense rock, supposed to be from three to five hundred feet high, and about as long.

Another boat, in which were five men, was soon seen around the projecting rock, which soon came down to us and told Capt. Nye our position—which was, Cape Broyle, on the western end of Newfoundland, and twenty miles north of Cape Race. Our ship's head was then put to the southward, and after running on that course about thirty miles, it was changed to the westward. The imminent danger that we thus so providentially escaped, caused many a heart to beat with gratitude to the great Disposer of events; so many lives, together with that noble ship, having been saved by the sacrifice offered by the two men so suddenly called to eternity.

Composting Muck.

The following is the method of composting muck or peat, practiced by Prof. Mapes, of New Jersey. He says, "The chloride of lime and carbonate of soda is made by slacking three bushels of shell lime, hot from the kiln, with one bushel of common salt dissolved in water. Common salt being composed of chlorine and soda, the lime combines with the chlorine, forming chloide of lime, which in turn receives carbonic acid from the atmosphere, and becomes carbonate of soda. The mass should be turned over every day for three days, at the end of which time it is ready for use. Four bushels of this mixture, thoroughly divided through one cord of muck, will decompose perfectly in ninety days in winter, and in a proportionately less time in summer. When this muck cannot readily be procured, any organic matter will answer the same purpose; pond-scrapings, river mud, decayed leaves, or even head-lands, with one-twentieth its bulk of stable manure or weeds, will answer well."

Prof. Mapes is economical of the liquid droppings of his stable, and using stables for his cattle without floors, he is enabled thus to bring his muck into direct contact with them, and thus save all the manure they are capable of making. His method is this: "Under the oxen, cows, &c., the earth is removed to the depth of eighteen inches, making a space capable of holding half a cord of muck for an animal. This muck is covered at night with salt hay for bedding, and the liquid manure voided by the cattle, is absorbed by the muck, and rapidly decomposes it. This decomposition is assisted by the warmth of the animal while sleeping upon the bedding. The solid manure is removed from the bedding each morning, and after being mixed with twenty times its bulk, is placed under cover. The muck containing the liquid portions of the manure is removed every four days, and is also placed under cover; after ten days the manure head is turned over and wetted with a weak solution of nitrate of soda, after which it is permitted to remain until sufficiently decomposed for use—thirty days. All the weeds of of the farm are daily thrown into the hog-pen, and the hogs are induced to root among them and will keep the weeds in constant motion until decomposed. About once in ten days the pen is emptied, and after salting the weeds, to prevent the possibility of their again germinating, they are mixed with twenty times their bulk of muck, and four bushels to the cord of salt and lime mixture, and placed under cover, where the mass readily heats and after twenty days is ready for use. * * * "The amount of manure I am enabled to make by these methods," says Prof. Mapes, "and the assistance of six oxen, three cows, three horses, and twenty hogs, is about fifty half cords per week."

Prof. Mapes is one of the best scientific and practical agriculturists in the country, and his method of composting with muck may be depended upon as a good one. [Far. Visitor.

Labor of Authors.

Performances of true value are less indebted to any imagined inspiration, than to hard work. True it is, that men of intellectual vigor have occasionally performed at a sitting, a labor which might seem, to the uninitiated, herculean. The crowd gape and stare, and clapping their hands, cry genius! But they do not consider the years of preparation and hard training of which this is only an incidental result. They overlook the period spent in imbuing the mind with the subject, in clearing away obstacles, in becoming acquainted with the necessary facts, in constructing the plans and reconstructing them; and when the soul comes up all dripping from the fountains of inspiration, and fired with its theme, pours forth its burden as if with the furor and rapidity of a Delphic priestess, they think it is all the work of a moment. Genius, indeed! But if there were more love of patient discipline, and slow, laborious work, in this world, we believe the amount of genius displayed might be increased an hundred fold. Hume wrote over his History of England three times before he sent it to the press. Sir Walter Raleigh's unfinished History of the World was the work of eleven years. Gibbon was twelve years in completing the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. Adam Smith required twelve years to complete his Wealth of Nations. It cost Lord Littleton twenty years to write the Life and History of Henry II. Diodorus Siculus devoted thirty years to his History. One of Pascal's Provincial Letters occupied him twenty days. John Foster retouched and polished his works to the last degree. The manuscript of Paul and Virginia was copied nine times by the author, that he might render it more perfect. Robertson wrote all his sentences first on small slips of paper, polished and rounded them, and then copied them into a book, which also underwent much revision. Let no one be deceived by the idea that genius is a substitute for labor. Let no one imagine himself a genius, and therefore abjure labor. The order of this world is work, work, and few may hope to escape from the common lot of man. But the fruits of labor are always sure. Sow, and you will reap.

Galvanism in Asthma.

Perhaps in no disease is galvanism of greater value than in cases of asthma. Dr. Wilson Philip particularly recommends it for this complaint. In nearly every case of asthma I have had, I have been successful. A lady of Torquay was brought to me in a carriage, so dreadfully afflicted with the asthma that her friends imagined every moment she would be suffocated; indeed, it was enough to make one's heart ache to witness the agonies she was enduring. I placed her under the action of the galvanic apparatus, administering it so weak, that she was scarcely aware I was galvanizing her at al. In ten minutes her anxious friends, as well as myself, noticed that the breathing was getting easier; in five minutes more she exclaimed, "Thank God, I am relieved!" She was now breathing quite freely, and told me that she wished she had tried it years ago, and had not listened to the advice of her medical attendant, who was continually ridiculing galvanism. In one month she left me, quite free from the complaint! I have lately been informed that she mounts a hill with the hilarity of a young girl. [Halse.

The Wonder of Surgery.

We have been attracted by a long article which we find in the Pittsburgh Journal, descriptive of one of the wonders of Surgery, in shaping and fixing a perfect nose where before there was nothing but a cavity. The subject of this extraordinary operation was Edward Clarke, a master roller at the Kensington Iron-works, in Pittsburgh, well known for several years as a skillful workman, a man of successful thrift, and much sterling worth of character. About fifteen years ago, he lost his nose by mercurial disease, resulting from an attack of billious fever. A single cavity only was left, where there should have been a nose. Hearing that there was means of restoring this important and long lost member, he resolved to try them, and accordingly he proceeded to Philadelphia for the purpose. The operation was performed, and he has returned to Pittsburgh, with a nose perfect in all its functions, natural in its appearance, as sensitive to the touch and comely to the eye, as any other plain man's nose. The operation was performed by Joseph Pancoast, M. D., Professor of Anatomy in Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, assisted by Dr. Charles P. Turner; and the account is so curious, and so eminently creditable to the professional gentlemen, that we cannot refrain from copying the material parts of Mr. Clarke's statement:—

On the 4th day of February last, at the College, in the presence of Dr. Charles P. Turner, House Physician, and of all the students there assembled, Dr. Pancoast operated upon me. He began the operation by detaching from my forehead a portion of flesh of sufficient size to make the nose; he then pared down the edges and sewed the flesh taken from the forehead into the orifice left by the destruction of the original nose, the cheeks in a kind of groove, and dressed the same much after the manner of a common cut or wound. I had tubes of gold made to form the nostrils and enable me to breathe; these were removed immediately when the Dr. thought the healing far enough advanced. I had also a mould made of gutta percha, modeled on my father's nose, which was fastened over the new nose with straps, giving it exactly the shape I wished. On the fifth day the stitches were removed, and in little more than seven weeks I was discharged from the Infirmary, needing no further treatment. And now I have a new nose, sound and well formed, with all the sense of feeling, and smelling equally fine and perfect as I ever recollect possessing previously. The new nose, I should mention, is the exact counterpart of my father's, so that even the shape of the nose is under the control of Dr. Pancoast in this operation.

I am thirty-five years of age, in full health, and feel greatly rejoiced and thankful that I look my former self again.

The Way to make Good Workmen.

The facts in the annexed paragraph from the Tribune deserve the widest publicity:—

"For the past three years, the Messrs. Hoe and Co., the eminent printing press manufacturers, have maintained, at their own expense, an evening school for the instruction of their apprentices and employees in mathematics, the exact sciences, mechanical drawing, the French and English languages, etc. Every one of their many apprentices is required to give a punctual attendance at the school, which is also open to such adult members of the establishment as choose to attend. Two teachers, Messrs. O'Gorman and Diak, are regularly employed, and Professor Hyatt has just been engaged to give a course of lectures on Experimental Philosophy, which are now being delivered, and will close the winter term. They are attended by nearly all the workmen as well as all the apprentices. We mention these facts because we consider them worthy of being imitated by other large employers of laboring men. And while we have not the slightest doubt that the Messrs. Hoe established this school without a thought as to whether they should gain or lose by it, pecuniarly, we cannot but think that they reap an advantage, in the increased intelligence of their workmen, and their increased regard for the proprietors of the establishment, which more than compensates for the considerable outlay which this school involves."

California Items.

Statistics show that 51,000 people have arrived at San Francisco since the first of Junuary last. It is fair to estimate the arrivals by sea during the remainder of 1852, at 35,000, making 86,000 increase of population from that source for the current year. From present indications, the overland immigration cannot be less than 40,000, which will swell the number of people who will visit California during the season to 126,000. Allowing for the number who will leave the State, it will still be within bounds to estimate the increase of population the present year at about 100,000.

The enormous tide of emigration setting from Canton River and Shanghai, China, across the Pacific Ocean to San Francisco, arrests the notice of the most casual observer. A table made in the early part of May last, giving an estimate of the number of Chinese supposed to be in California at that time even, exhibited startling facts. But the last three months have developed a more astonishing state of things still, and according to statistics compiled with great care and labor, it appears that since the 1st of May the emigration of Chinese into California equals that from all other parts of the world, and is nearly three times that of the previous quarter from China.

From a recent estimate, believed to be correct, it appears that there are 4,330 houses in San Francisco, which are presumed to contain seven persons each—making the population of that city about thirty thousand. Five years ago the little town of San Francisco contained a few houses built of sun-dried brick, and had a population of less than four hundred. Four years ago the population was still less than one thousand.

The number of French people in California is estimated at 22,000. In San Francisco they are numerous enough to sustain a tri-weekly newspaper of fair proportions, in the French language.

An Arab's Notion of Vinegar.

I carried with me some vinegar in case of return of fever; and mixing a little of it with the dirty water to make it less unpalatable, asked the Arab if he would like to taste. He looked at me archly, and said, "You should not ask me—it is against the prophet; and yet I can't refuse—but I never touch those things." I replied, "Nonsense, this is vinegar, not wine; it is heating liquor, but produces quite a contrary effect." With much difficulty he overcame his scruples, and drank it; but so strong was the conviction on his mind of its being an intoxicating liquor, having never heard of vinegar, that he stroked himself down complacently, and said, "How good!" Next day I offered him some more; he winked his eyes, and said, "It's very wrong—but it's your fault; you know I can't refuse; you taught me." He objected this time to my putting any water to it, and tossed off so much that it gave a twist to his inside; and yet stroking himself down, he cried, "How good, how good!" and for the next two or three hours was under the firm impression of being intoxicated. [Capt. Peel.

CATCHING A ROGUE.—Constable Clapp, of Boston, has a peculiar way of astonishing the rogues who fall into his hands; on Saturday, at the Providence Depot, he stepped up to a young man, and with great familiarity, said: "How do you do?" "Pretty well," returned the person addressed; and, after looking at the Colonel a moment, continued: "But I don't recollect you." "Your name is George Curtis, ain't it?" "Certainly." "I thought so," said the Colonel; "and where are you going?" "Oh! I am going to New York," said the man. "Well, I guess I wouldn't go to-night;" and, without further preliminary, walked him to the lock-up, there to await the arrival of the City Marshal of Providence, who had given information by telegraph that Curtis had committed a larceny. This is what they call "being struck by lightning."

HOW TO SOFTEN HARD WATER.—A half ounce of quicklime dipped in nine quarts of water, and the clear solution put into a barrel of hard water; the whole will be soft water as it settles clear. This is a practicable and practical recipe or direction. But the precipitate will not be chalk, as the Scientific American states, unless the hardening substance is lime or chalk, which is seldom the case. Common hard water contains gypsum as well as carbonate of lime or chalk, both of which will be removed by [illegible] as above.

NEW PROCESS OF MAKING BUTTER.—Mr. James Stubbs, of Cuttyhunk Island, informs us of a new and simple process of making butter from cream, which promises to supercede the labor of the churn, at least during the warm season. At his dairy, recently, a quantity of cream that had obstinately refused to become butter under any reasonable or unreasonable amount of "agitation" in the usual mode, was at length emptied into a clean "salt bag" of coarse linen, and deposited in the ground at a depth of about 12 inches below the surface to cool. On the following morning it was found that the buttermilk had entirely separated and disappeared, and the butter remained in the bag perfectly nice and sweet. He has since frequently manufactured butter by this method, with invariable success, in from 6 to 12 hours. As an effectual preventive of any earthy taste becoming imparted to the butter, Mr. Stubbs suggests that the bag containing the cream be placed in another bag, or cloth, of the same material. The value of the discovery may be easily tested. [New Bedford Mercury.

STRAWBERRIES—Season for Planting them.—It is quite singular, that such apathy and neglect should exist in regard to the easy means by which any family may be supplied with enough and to spare of this most healthy and delicious of fruits. A very small allotment of ground, formed into beds 3½ feet wide, each containing four rows of plants, a foot asunder from each other, will be all that is required. The present is the proper period for planting them, and, if kept free from weeds for a few weeks, until the runners from the main plants begin to fill up the spaces between them, they will exact no further labor, and each family may thus enjoy, independently, the fragrant and delightful product of their own garden. Some prudence should be exercised in the selection of varieties. Among the best are the Prolific Scarlet, Le Baron, Primate, Charlotte, Superlative, Monstrous Swainstone, Cornucopia, Triumph, and Scarlet Melting.

FATTENING YOUNG LADIES IN TUNIS.—A girl, after she is betrothed, is cooped up in a small room, with shackles of gold and silver upon her ancles and wrists. If she is to be married to a man who has discharged, dispatched, or lost a former wife, the shackels which the former wife wore are put upon the new bride's limbs, and she is fed till they are filled up to the proper thickness. The food used for this custom, worthy of barbarians, is a seed called drough, which is of extraordinary fattening quality. With this seed, and their national dish, cuscusoo, the bride is literally crammed, and many actually die under the spoon. [Keating's Travels.

VARIETY.

A man named Patrick Bartlett recently committed suicide in Pike County, Ala., by hanging himself soon after his marriage. He had been in love with a young lady, but was prevented, by some means, from marrying her, and wedded another. Soon after his marriage, he carried his wife to see his parents, and there met the young lady, his former love, to whom he appeared to have been devotedly attached. Their feelings upon meeting overcame their sense of propriety, and they rushed into each other's arms, embraced, and were melted to tears. This seems to have revived, in a tenfold degree, his love for her; and after carrying his wife back to her parents, he said that the would go to Troy and mail a letter which he had written; but it appears he came to the determination on the way to destroy himself, which he did in the manner above described.

The New Haven Courier gives the following description of another invention designed to promote the comfort of passengers traveling by railroad: The invention is a very simple one, and consists merely in a connection formed between all the cars by inclosing the platforms, so that the external air, with the dust, smoke and cinders, are entirely excluded from the usual ways of ingress. The front of the baggage car is open, but protected from the smoke of the locomotive by a screen. The air rushes in through the front of the car, and circulates freely through the whole length of the train, keeping up at all times a gentle motion of the air, without the possibility of annoyance from dust, &c.

They are building a railroad in Egypt; and late accounts from Alexandria tell us, that nine or ten thousand workmen are actively engaged upon it. Think of that! Crossing the desert after a locomotive! Good bye to camels and dromedaries! Farewell to tents beneath the spacious blue firmament over head! A "long farewell" to Arab guides and Arab extortions! Railroads and steamboats will yet thread through Palestine, and paddle the sluggish waters of the Dead Sea!

We think it was Lord Kames, who, on being asked what kind of preaching he preferred, replied, "That which makes me shrink closer into the remote corner of the pew, feeling that the devil is after me!" And in this reply an important truth is intimated, though in a rough way.

A severe shock of an earthquake was felt at Bathurst, New Brunswick, on the 22d inst. The main wall of the Court-House in that borough was parted by the concussion, for nearly half an inch, in the upper story. Many panes of glass were also broken in other buildings.

Some men devote themselves so exclusively to business, as to almost entirely neglect their domestic and social relations. A gentleman of this class having failed, was asked what he intended to do. "I am going home to get acquainted with my wife and children," said he.

There is a row of eight houses in Second street, Williamsburgh, opposite the Catholic Church, containing, altogether, one hundred and twelve families, which, on an average, is fourteen families in a house. Many of these families, we are informed, take boarders.

A letter from Philadelphia says: Among the large buildings going up in this city is an extensive factory, fifty by a hundred feet, and five stories in height, to be exclusively appropriated to the manufacture of playing-cards.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

THE TRACT SOCIETY'S ANNIVERSARY.

Address of Wm. M. Fahnestock, M. D.

Resolved, That the encouraging indications of the times demand increased alacrity and perseverance, at the hands of Sabbath-keepers, in the circulation of our Tract Publications throughout the length and breadth of the land.

On rising to address a few words of encouragement to you, dear brethren, for your laudable efforts at tract distribution, I feel somewhat as Washington Irving expressed himself, some years since, when he first published his inimitable Sketch Book, in London. Jeffrey, of the Edinburgh Review, had very superciliously asked, "Who reads an American book?" Irving, in return, pertinently remarked, on that occasion, that he felt strangely on making his bow to the British public, knowing full well, that they looked rather to see a feather on an American's head than in his hand. And so with myself, in yielding to the solicitation of some of our friends to address you, my words, perhaps, would appear in better place at a clinical exposition of morbid phenomena, or in the disquisitions of a scientific lecture, than before an assembly accustomed to be electrified by impassioned eloquence; yet I ever have been, and hope ever to be, a man of duty; and as this is a duty imposed upon me, without any of my own seeking, I must even try to discharge it, whether, in the language of Robert Burns, it "turn out a sang, or turn out a sermon."

One feature of sermonizing, however, I shall carefully avoid, namely, the scolding part. I have always admired the anecdote of a plain member of a congregation, who reminded his Pastor, that it was not fair dealing, nor good policy, to be forever whipping the good horse, and requiring him to bring up a double load, and drag the lazy one into the bargain. Now, the friends present, by their presence, deserve to be spared a whipping or a scolding, for their presence implies a disposition to coöperate in all measures, to the extent of their opportunity and ability, to foster and forward this noble enterprise. And while I desire to spare them in this matter, yet I do not wish to lull them into supineness by over praise for what they have done. The Bereans were commended by the Apostles for their diligence in searching the Scriptures; and we are yet to learn, that that commendation, in any manner, interfered with their duties, or, in any wise, spoiled their usefulness; and I truly believe, that any People will work with more alacrity, when cheered and encouraged, than when driven under the goadings of a frowning brow, and the lashes of unmerited flagellation. I would, therefore, seek to excite your emulation, by a very cursory glance at your noble efforts in distributing our winged messengers, and by rehearsing the manner in which those efforts are regarded by the church and the world at large, as incentives to renewed exertions in the good cause of God and his truth.

The uniform testimony, written and oral, of the whole period that we, Sabbath-keepers, have existed as a denomination, affords unqualified commendation to our adherence to our principles, and our consistent walk, amid a perverse and gainsaying generation. Next to undaunted adhesion to the strict observance of the true Sabbath—"the seventh day—the Sabbath of the Lord thy God"—our perseverance in promulgating our belief—the perseverance of a mere handful of disciples—has been the wonder and the praise of thousands and of tens of thousands. Much intercourse with society at large enables me to speak of my brethren with much confidence in regard to the high estimate entertained of them by all classes of the community; yea, I may add, the terror with which this small handful of disciples are regarded by other denominations; because they are persuaded, that we have the truth, (although they are slow to acknowledge it,) and because we prove ourselves valiant for the truth.

I cannot occupy much of your time with such allusions, which may appear somewhat egotistical; but there is such abundant testimony to the point, that I scarcely know where to begin or where to end, in bringing a few illustrations before you.

While we may, ourselves, truly and justly lament our delinquencies and our short-comings, when such a load of responsibility rests upon us, far otherwise does the world regard our works; and from that estimate do I draw the greatest encouragement to alacrity and perseverance. Some few years since, a distinguished Doctor of Divinity remarked to me, that he regarded the Seventh-day Baptists as the most indomitable sect in the country, and ten-fold more efficient, for their numbers, than any other denomination in the Union; that they have so much direct Scriptural backing, that wherever their principles are proclaimed, they challenge profound attention, if they do not prove entirely irresistible; that he would rather encounter any thing than a discussion on the Sabbath with the weakest of our members; and that one of our small Tracts can put to defiance a hundred of their own.

Brethren, do you know yourselves? Would you not feel proud of your profession, to hear such testimony, from such a source? I did! I felt proud, that God's truth, in such weak vessels, terrified hosts in high places—yes, even to shake the modern Sanhedrim. Take courage, brethren, take courage; your work is not in vain.

Some time since, while passing along one of the principal streets in Philadelphia, I overheard an animated conversation between a distinguished Prelate of the Episcopal Church, and a prominent gentleman of this city, who had recently embraced the Roman Catholic religion; and I stepped within the door of a book-store to listen to their discussion. "Sir," said the Catholic, "the Seventh-day Baptists are the only consistent Protestants in Christendom. They repudiate our Church from beginning to end, and throw themselves entirely on the platform of the Bible; and therein they are consistent. You profess to take the Bible as the only rule of faith, but you stultify your profession—you mince and garble the Bible from Genesis to Revelation. Where do you get your First-day Sabbath from? Where do you get your Baptism from? Where do you get your holy days and your saints' days from? Not from the Bible, but from our Church! You have not the slightest shadow of evidence for them from the Bible—you derive them all and wholly from the Fathers and the Canons of our Church! Here you stultify your profession, are inconsistent with yourselves, and do yourselves and your cause infinite damage. The Seventh-day Baptist, I repeat, is the only sect that can stand with head erect, and unblushingly point to his Thus saith the Lord, for his practice. I honor that People for their consistency. They are honored throughout the world, if not always openly, yet secretly, and their influence must be felt—must tell for good."

Brethren, does not such testimony make you proud of your profession? It does me; at least, it makes me ambitious of emulating my forefathers in the faith. Let us, my friends, strive to prove ourselves worthy sons and worthy daughters of such noble ancestors.

Such praise, brethren, cannot spoil you—it may inspire holy ardor, which is profitable. One thing I have learned, and that is, the more I work for my Master's cause, the more I become interested in doing his work; and the more actively I become engaged in that work, the better I love the work, and I long the more to renew my efforts to extend his truth; and thus it is, that his yoke becomes easy, and his burden light; not that we may arrogate any merit to ourselves for our works, but, as it is His pleasure, in his own wise economy, to make works the fruit of love and obedience, and at the same time make our labors become the source of joy unto us, to cheer us in our pathway of cares and trials here below. I trust that no man's praise will ever retard me from any duty, nor his flattery render me vain and foolish—oft-times a melancholy evidence of human weakness. So far as it encourages alacrity and perseverance in well doing, it is legitimate and wholesome. I have found it to be a spur, to myself, on more than one occasion, to be certified, that a lone and isolated disciple may accomplish something for his Master's cause, if he have a heart to put forth his energies; and I hope, therefore, to be excused for making a personal allusion to the point.

Soon after the publication of our Tract No. 13—The Bible Sabbath—I sent it to some particular friends. One of those friends, a distinguished gentleman of Boston, a man much engaged in the cause of religion, and who, perhaps, has done as much for the cause of missions as any man living, thanked me for it, the first time he met me. On inquiring of him, How he liked it? (for I wanted his candid opinion,) "Why," said he, "you certainly have the correct theory." "Well, deacon," I returned, "that is very good, so far, but how is it about the facts in the case?" "I hoped," he replied, "that you would be satisfied with that expression; but if you insist upon it, I must acknowledge, that the facts are all on your own side." From another distinguished friend, a Presbyterian Minister, (an LL. D.) a favorite among the Princeton clique, I had an equally gratifying reply. On handing one of the same tracts to him, he said, "I am rejoiced that you have given me an opportunity to reply to you—I shall review it in our Review." I encouraged him to do so; but after waiting eight or ten months, I reminded him of it, and his reply was, "It is an easy matter to promise much, but a much more difficult task sometimes to perform little."

Are not such concessions, (and dozens of others might be introduced,) sufficient to excite your emulation, brethren, to enter the field, if not the arena, and aid to overcome the great error of the times, by working with alacrity and perseverance for God's truth and for God's holy law, when you find the great and the learned bow to the force of God's testimony, when driven home upon their consciences, and when you have scarcely any thing to do but place one of our Daguerreotypes of God's truth into their hands to confound them? Thousands of those set in the Church to teach, will endeavor to evade the subject when pressed upon them by their own people, from a consciousness of their inability to maintain themselves when driven to Scriptural testimony; and while they give a negative support to the sacredness of the first day of the week, there is not any thing that they dread more than to face one of our Tracts—our Daguerreotypes of God's truth—or have them circulated among their members. Then, brethren, who among you is not ready to emulate David, and with your little pebble of Divine Truth slay the giant Sabbath Desecrater! God Dethroner!

You have, my friends, in your midst, this afternoon, several illustrious examples of the power of God's Truth, in constraining the prejudices of man—the prejudices of education—to yield to the requirements of Jehovah, in regard to his holy Sabbath, and particularly two trophies of the potency of Divine Truth, under the most trying circumstances.* I allude to the learned gentleman who has just preceded me, and to the one who is to follow me—two noble brothers, truly, joining hands most valiantly, like veteran champions, to aid in rolling on the Car of Truth, over the craggy steeps of Idolatry, and the heavy quicksands of Sunday superstition.

Brethren, our Daguerreotypes are not only sufficient to confound an individual, but they have actually excited the fears of whole Bodies of those in power, who have attempted to crush us; and have, thus, given the most indubitable proof of the truth of our profession, and of the irresistible potency of our exposition of Divine Truth.

Pending the application to the Legislature of Pennsylvania, by my brethren of that State, for relief from the unequal and oppressive Sunday laws, at the request of one of the Senators, I forwarded to him five or six hundred of our Tracts, which were distributed among the members of both Houses, as an offset to the homilies on the "Observance of the Christian Sabbath," that had been pealed, simultaneously, by arrangement, from every pulpit at the Seat of Government, the next Sunday after those Petitions were presented. Very soon afterward several of the members of both Houses, told some of our friends, that if they wished to succeed in obtaining their "exemption," they must not distribute any more of the Tracts; for, instead of seeking simple exemption for themselves, it looked like aiming at unsettling the minds of the community, and endeavoring to overthrow the sacredness of the first day of the week. What, brethren, accept "exemption" at the cost of muzzling ourselves? Were ever more degrading conditions proposed to freemen? Is there a Sabbath-keeper among us, who could thus barter with the Father of Lies, for any advantage? Sell or smother God's truth to gain any favor whatever? I trust not! I should blush for such a fallen renegade—such a contemptible renegade. Of all the meanest wretches upon earth is that Judas who proves treacherous to God's truth, God's holy truth, for temporal advantage. It is worth all we can suffer, and a thousand times more, from fines, from stripes, and from imprisonments; and I truly trust, that there will never be one found among us, who has embraced the truth, that will turn his back on his Master in a dark hour, however dark that hour may be. If there be one such among us, I pray God to take him from our midst, for he is not of us; and if I could be induced, for once, to ask a favor from the Prince of Rebels, I would beseech him to claim his own, and to claim him quickly, ere he contaminate the flock. Our mission, brethren, is a holy mission. We are placed here, like a city set on a hill, to let our light shine, and to shine the more particularly in the darkest places and in the darkest hour. We must, under all circumstances, prove ourselves worthy of our high calling; and I know of no employment in which we can be more usefully and more honorably engaged, than in scattering Daguerreotypes of God's unadulterated truth abroad; not only among the hoodwinked populace, but among the benighted Churches of Protestant Christendom.

Brethren, if one of our Tracts can put at bay the Doctors of Divinity, can alarm the Sanhedrim, and terrify the Secular Power, which attempts to gag us, from fear of the truth committed to our hands, do you need any thing else to encourage you to alacrity and perservance in the great duty of diffusing that truth?—which any one can do, who has a penny to spare, or a heart in the matter, to hand one of our winged messengers to his neighbor. Take courage, brethren. If we can shake the Sanhedrim, and make the Secular Power quake, what may we not accomplish, few as we are, and slender as are our means? It has been justly said, "Aim at great things, expect great things, and you shall accomplish great things." Persevere with alacrity, and we shall be rewarded.

Now, dear brethren, in view of these facts, (and a thousand others might be adduced,) if such be our influence, and I derive it from impartial witnesses, need our small band despair? Despair of what? We can do in this contest—(it is no idle boasting)—for we are doing, what the handful of Greeks did at Marathon and Thermopylæ—a lesson that will never be lost to the world—even when defeated, still victorious; and if defeated or victorious, still we are to give battle, until the last enemy who "believes a lie" shall be subdued. We may be defeated for a time, but we are not to know that we have been worsted; as the American army was three times defeated on the battle field of Buena Vista, but would not stay defeated, so we must fight on, whatever reverses we have to encounter—fight for God and his truth, and we shall eventually be crowned with victory!

Brethren, I am no Homœpath in my profession, but I am a Homœpath in religious matters; believing, and believing firmly, that the utmost infinitessimal portion of God's truth, must stand against all error, and will eventually neutralize and destroy whole volumes of lies, specious as the inventions of men may appear. It was no slanderous assault of Robert Burns, but a lamentable truth, that he uttered, when he gave the following fling at such perverters of Holy Writ:

> "Some books are lies frae end to end,
> And some great lies were never penned:
> Ev'n Ministers, they hae been kenn'd,
> In holy rapture,
> A rousing whid,* at times, to wend.
> And nail't wi' Scripture."

And I repeat, that it will take but a modicum of Scriptural truth to overthrow a thousand such perversions and prevarications.

Brethren, take courage, and buckle on your armor. That armor the Apostle Paul describes in Ephesians 6: 14—17 inclusive. And when encased in the armor of God, wield your missals valiantly, and let your missals be true Daguerreotypes of God's Word. Use these Daguerreotypes as Daguerreotypes, and not to supersede the Word of God itself—that is our strong fortress and our tower of defense—but to counteract the Tracts of other denominations; spread broadcast throughout the length and breadth of the land, on the principle, similia similibus curantur—like cures like. In this I am a Homœpath, and I wish you all to be such Homœpaths. Be not deterred, brethren, because the land is white, (or rather made dark) by Sunday tracts. One of our Daguerreotypes of God's truth, be assured, will dispel a thousand based on "the commandments of men."

Brethren, I do not wish to restrain you to an infinitessimal dose, or to Lilliputian efforts. If you have greater zeal, and I have no reason [illegible] emulate the example of the [illegible] of Artillery, in the battle of Palma de la Resaca, the first brilliant victory in the war with Mexico. On the 8th of May the American Army was employed in defending their train (three miles long) of provisions and ammunition, without attempting to make regular battle, and at night rested on their arms. At the break of day on the 9th, the regiment was in readiness for battle, and as the picket guard came in and reported that the enemy was arranged in the gorge of the Pass, in horse-shoe form, to receive and flank in on the American troops, the Adjutant, (my own brother in the flesh,) announced to the Colonel the readiness of his regiment to proceed to action; upon which the senior Captain of the regiment asked the privilege, for the soldiers, to go into battle without caps or coats. The order was given, to doff caps and coats. In an instant all caps and coats were thrown behind them; they rolled up their sleeves, gave three cheers, and rushed impetuously onward. You all know the result. That battle gave tone and color to all the rest. In a much better cause, brethren, the battle for God's truth, throw off your hats and coats, roll up your sleeves, and rush to duty and to victory.

Rushing to duty and to victory may seem too warlike for plain Sabbath-keepers, who have never been ambitious of bloody strife, although they have always proved themselves good soldiers of the Cross, in contending for the truth of the Captain of their Salvation. And as it may not comport with your feelings and sense of propriety to emulate the warrior soldier, then emulate the plain, sturdy farmer, and sling the bag of good seed, freed from tares, around your shoulders, and scatter the Word of Truth, by the wayside, as your journey through life; and the bread that you thus cast upon the waters, shall certainly return unto you, even if it be after many days. Brethren of the Ministry, go forth like good Husbandmen, and prepare the soil—blow the sure trumpet of God's unadulterated Truth, and raise the flock to their labors. Brethren of the Laity, fly to the field—the harvest is white—and like good "helps," (for an help is a scriptural appointment, and an obligatory duty on every disciple,) and cast in the seed with a liberal hand, and pray the Lord of the harvest to prosper your work, and he will crown your efforts abundantly. As disciples of the Cross, go forth and show your faith. Work with alacrity and perseverance while it is called to-day—with every opportunity magnify your God and Redeemer's law. Give your hearts to your Master, and your willing service to his commandments. Be faithful and diligent to maintain the integrity of his government, and He will vouchsafe unto you joy and rejoicing through life, in death, and at the Judgment.

THE AMERICAN BOARD'S MISSIONS.

The Board commenced operations in Bombay 38 years ago; and 36 years ago in Ceylon; 35 among the Cherokee Indians; 34 among the Choctaws; 32 on the Sandwich Islands; 29 in Syria; 22 at Canton in China; 21 among the Mahrattas of the Decan; 21 among the Armenians of Turkey; 18 in Southern India; 17 among the Nestorians; 13 among the Zulus, near Port Natal in Southern Africa; 9 at the Gaboon in Equatorial Africa; 8 at Amoy in China; 5 at Fuh-Chau; and 3 among the Jews at Macedonia.

The two missions in Africa are in their incipient state. The Zulu mission is yet at work upon the thick, tangled forest, endeavoring to get seed into the ground; and the Gaboon mission, without neglecting the maritime tribes upon the river, is gradually working its way upward towards what is believed to be a populous and salubrious interior. The climate of the Zulu mission is one of the best in the world; and that of the Gaboon, where discretion is used, is not found dangerous to life. It is far safer than was that of Cape Palmas, and, like all tropical climes, improves upon acquaintance.

The young mission among the Zulus has 16 congregations, all small, it is true, but regularly assembled and instructed; nine churches, all infantile, but increasing, fifty-seven new members having been added the past year, and there being nearly thirty candidates for admission; seven native helpers, all yet in the mere rudiments of knowledge, but comparatively educated and employed and trusted.

Near twenty years have elapsed since Mr. and Mrs. Wilson commenced their residence at Cape Palmas, in Western Africa, whence they subsequently removed, with their associates, a thousand miles eastward to the Gaboon.

Turkey in Europe and Asia is one of the most important and interesting of our great fields of labor. We are there operating on Jews, Armenians, Syrians of different sects, and, to a small extent just at present, on the Greeks.

Our oral instructions among the Jews of Thessalonica and the neighboring country, are yet in their commencement; and the mission is now meeting the first reäctionary movement from the alarmed Rabbis, which, as is usual in the early stage of progress, leaves scarcely congregation or school, for a time, to the missionary. But the field appears to be one of the best for the Jews, and our brethren ask for new stations and more missionaries. Mr. Schauffler continues the valuable literary labors, in which he has been long employed.

What shall we say of the divine favor that continues to be bestowed on the Armenian mission and reformation? When one of the Secretaries of the Board visited the Levant, in the year 1829, not a missionary labored among the Armenians; not a pious Armenian had been discovered in Turkey. No secure footing had then, indeed, been gained in Syria; and the Nestorians, now so interesting to the whole Christian world, were absolutely a lost people, wholly out of mind and forgotten! How wonderful the rise and progress of events since that time! The Reformation among the Armenians has had more evident progress the past year than in any former one. More than a hundred places give more or less evidence of a spirit of religious inquiry. At Constantinople, the great metropolis, there is increasing interest. It is hereafter to be a center for the press, which is to be removed from Smyrna, as well as for all the other evangelical influences. Books, of which nearly 8,000,000 pages were printed, are now freely exposed for sale in one of the great business streets of Constantinople, near the grand bazaars, with no restriction on the part of the authorities, except that "only Protestant books" are to be sold there. The necessity for an effective spiritual occupation of places in the interior is increasing.

Among the Syrians, a church has been formed the past year at Hasbeiya on Mount Hermon, and another at Mosul on the river Tigris. Another has probably been formed ere this time at Aleppo in northern Syria, and perhaps another at Abeih on Lebanon. In several villages of Lebanon and the region of the Hermon, in towns occupying the sites of ancient Sidon and Tyre, and in Jezirah on the Tigris, there is an encouraging spirit of strong religious inquiry. The new version of the Scriptures by Dr. Smith into the Arabic, one of the most important languages in the world, has advanced through the Pentateuch, and the New Testament is now to be commenced.

We are now come to the Nestorians. A portion of these are in Turkey, in the mountains of Koordistan, but the more important body is found on the plain of Oroomiah, Persia. The mission has been taken once more under the formal protection of the British embassy in Persia, which has also obtained an edict of toleration from the Persian government, granting equal protection to all Christian subjects, and allowing them to change their religion at pleasure. The fifty-eight village schools on the plain contain more than a thousand pupils; and nowhere can more interesting schools of the kind be found, than are the seminary for males at Seir, and the one for females at Oroomiah. In one of the larger villages, where the truth has taken strongest hold, the Sabbath-school numbers more than two hundred pupils.

Passing on to India, we must regard this as the most inviting great field for missions. Its population is at least 140,000,000; all under the government of a single Protestant nation, friendly to Protestant missions. The country is also central as regards Upper Asia, Arabia, Eastern Africa, Thibet, Burmah, and China. And each of the several great divisions of the church has undertaken the conquest of this country for Christ. The Episcopalians, Congregationalists, Baptists, and Methodists of England, the Scotch and Irish Presbyterians, the German Lutherans, and the Congregationalists, Presbyterians, and Baptists of the United States—all are there.

The missions under the care of the American Board are among the Mahrattas of western India, and among the Tamil people dwelling in southern India and Ceylon. The oldest mission of the Board is the one among the Mahrattas, and for seventeen years the labors of that mission were not allowed to extend beyond Bombay and its neighboring maritime districts. The mission among the Mahrattas of the Decan, eastward of the Ghauts, deriving its name from the city of Ahmednuggur, was not commenced until 1831. This, with the mission lately commenced at Satara, is preëminently one for the preaching of the Gospel, and it has been lately remolded with special reference to that service. If the season for harvest be yet future, it is supposed not to be distant. In due season we shall reap, if we faint not.

The Madras, Madura, and Ceylon missions, though to a people of the same language and religion, have fields differing in many respects. The Ceylon mission, being in the midst of a compact community, is working directly for the masses for the entire community of Jaffna.

In these six India missions there are nearly thirty stations, about forty ordained missionaries, about one hundred and fifty native helpers, three hundred and fifty pupils in a higher course of education, and six thousand eight hundred pupils in common Christian schools. There are also twenty-five churches, with eight hundred and seventy-five members.

We pass on to China. Here, in less than ten years after the five maritime gates of the empire were set open, and while no missionary can legally travel more than half a day's journey into the interior, all the great divisions of evangelical Christendom, some fifteen in number, are represented; and half as many Protestant missionaries are already there, as we find in India. There is a good prospect of a line of ocean steamers ere long between China and California, taking the Sandwich Islands in their route. Thirty years ago, those islands were sunk in the lowest Pagan barbarism; and the first thing claiming our attention is, that they are now no longer a part of the heathen world. They are Christian islands. Paganism is there dead, as a religion, and cannot live again. A fourth part of the inhabitants belong to the Christian Church. The people support their common schools of 15,000 pupils, their high school for the children of chiefs, and their national college at Lahainaluna, at an annual expense to them of $32,000; and they contribute almost as much money for the support of the Gospel and other religious objects, as the American Board expends on the mission.

A third thing to be noticed is the necessity of having a foreign mission sent out from the Sandwich Islands themselves, and in part supported by the native churches, in order to develop their Christian graces so as to enable them to stand alone. Such is the true origin of the mission to the numerous islands far to the west, called Micronesia, to which an exploring mission was to go from the Sandwich Islands during the past summer, composed partly of natives. Our brethren among the Choctaws have enjoyed another year of prosperity. Though they have labored in much weakness, calling in vain for help, they report the admission of more than 100 persons to their churches, making the present number of communicants about 1300. This is the twelfth year of "refreshing from the presence of the Lord." It is apparent, moreover, that these churches are growing in grace and in Christian knowledge. "I do not know a single household among professors of religion," Mr. Hotchkin says, "where family prayer is neglected;" and many are liberal in their donations to benevolent objects.

The inadequacy of the Cherokee mission to do the work which is thrown upon it, has become exceedingly painful. Unless our brethren can be largely reinforced, the dearest interests of their people must greatly suffer.

To the Dakota mission, the past year has been one of anticipation rather than of action. As five stations are on the territory ceded to the United States by the treaties of 1851, the missionaries have not expected to accomplish much at present; but they have been looking forward to the time when they might adapt their plans to the new order of things. Greatly to their surprise, however, the Senate of the United States have refused to assent to the reservation of certain lands on the upper waters of the Minnesota for the use of the Indians, and merely agree to an occupancy during the pleasure of the President; so that, instead of an estate in fee, the Dakotas are to have a tenancy at will.

The Ojibwa mission is still embarrassed by the question of removal. Attempts have been made by the Indian Agent to transfer the La Pointe band, as well as others, to the right bank of the Mississippi; but he has managed the affair in such a way as to defeat his object for the present.

The Senecas are making constant advances in civilization; but there is not the same progress in their spiritual interests.

Among the Tuscaroras the Lord has turned again the captivity of his people; so that their mouth is filled with laughter and their tongue with singing. It became evident last fall that God was troubling the thoughts of many hearts; and in the months of January and February the revival went forward with extraordinary power. The accessions to the church by profession have been 58; and the whole number of Indian communicants is 104. About one-third of the tribe, therefore, belong to the church of Christ, and about one-fifth have joined during the past year! Of the ten chiefs, seven are members of the church; and nine proclaim themselves the disciples of Christ. The condition of these Indians, in other respects, is highly gratifying. They are advancing in industry, education, morality, and benevolence; and their manners are becoming more refined and elevated.

Only three deaths are known to have occurred the past year in all the missions.

RURAL ASPECT OF ENGLAND.

There we were, right in the midst of it! The country—and such a country!—green, dripping, glistening, gorgeous! We stood dumb-stricken by its loveliness, as, from the bleak April and bare boughs we had left at home, broke upon us that English May—sunny, leafy, blooming May—in an English lane; with hedges—English hedges—hawthorn hedges, all in blossom; homely old farm-houses, quaint stables and haystacks; the old church spire over the distant trees; the mild sun beaming through the watery atmosphere, and all so quiet, the only sounds the hum of bees and the crisp grass-tearing of a silken-skinned, real (unimported) Hereford cow over the hedge. No longer excited by daring to think we should see it, as we discussed the scheme round the old home fire; no longer cheering ourselves with it in the stupid, tedious ship; no more forgetful of it in the bewilderment of the bustling and the busy town; but there we were, right in the midst of it; long time silent, and then speaking softly, as if it were enchantment indeed, we gazed upon it and breathed it—never to be forgotten.

At length we walked on rapidly, but frequently stopping, one side and the other, like children in a garden; hedges still, with delicious fragrance, on each side of us, and on, as far as we can see, true farm-fencing hedges; nothing trim, stiff, nice, and amateur like, but the verdure-broken, tufty, low and natural. They are set on a ridge of earth thrown out from a ditch beside them, which raises and strengthens them, as a fence. They are nearly all hawthorn, which is now covered in patches, as if after a slight fall of snow, with clusters of white or pink blossoms over its light-green foliage. Here and there a holly bush, with branches of scarlet berries, and a few other shrubs mingle with it. A cart meets us—a real, heavy, big-wheeled English cart, and English horses—real, big, shaggy-hoofed, sleek, heavy English cart-horses, and a carter—a real, apple-faced, smock-frocked, red-headed, wool-hatted carter—breeches, stockings, hob-nailed shoes, and 'Gee up Dobbin' English carter. Little birds hop along in the road before us, and we guess at their names, first of all electing one to be Robin Redbreast. We study the flowers under the hedge, and determine them nothing else than primroses and butter-cups. Through the gates we admire the great, fat, clean-licked, contented-faced cows, and large, white, long-wooled sheep. What else was there? I cannot remember; but there was that altogether that made us forget our fatigue, disregard the rain, thoughtless of the way we were going—serious, happy, and grateful. And this excitement continued for many days. [Am. Farmer.

QUESTIONS FOR SOMEBODY.—1. The building in which the church worship of which you are a member, cost several thousand dollars before it was fitted to accommodate a congregation. When would that church edifice have been built, if the other members of the church had taken no more interest in the matter than you have ever taken, or had left the contributions necessary to meet the expense just when you left them?

2. In order to maintain public worship, and secure the observance of the ordinances of the gospel, the church elected a pastor, and pledged themselves to support him. If all the members of the church, according to their means, had paid into the treasury as you have paid, according to your means, what kind of support would the pastor have received?

SPIRIT OF THE HEBREW CODE.

Some ministers have a loose way of speaking of the abrogation of the Old Economy, conveying to their hearers the idea, that what is commonly termed the Old Testament is a part of the Bible with which the Christian has very little concern. They speak of the New Testament as if it contained every thing necessary to be known by one who would discharge his duty to God and men, and by a most disingenuous sophistry, contrive to cover with obloquy the sentiments of those who differ from them in this respect.

Sometimes they speak of these two divisions of the Bible as analogous to two Wills, of different dates, by which a man gives away his property to his children. As his last will sets aside every thing contained in any former testament, except what is expressly specified again, so the New Testament is regarded as rendering void every precept of the Old, which is not brought over, and re-enjoined in the New; as if God were like man, and had occasion to alter his mind!

Sometimes these divisions are spoken of, as if they were nothing more than exhibitions of the two Dispensations, respectively. The duties, privileges and blessings of the Old Dispensation are regarded as being set forth in the Old Testament, and those of the New Dispensation as being set forth only in the New Testament; and then, overlooking the fact that throughout both Dispensations man is recognized as a subject of the moral law, those who would enforce a duty by a precept of the Old Testament are artfully represented as renouncing the Gospel, and going back to the Old Dispensation!

Again, these divisions are spoken of, as if they were the statute-books respectively of two different forms of government. And as, when a new government is established, none of the laws of the old government are any longer in force, except such as may be re-enacted under the new constitution, so it is maintained that Christians, being under a new constitution, are no longer bound by the laws of the Old Testament. As if God, seeing defects in the moral constitution under which he had placed man at the first, had found it necessary to make an alteration!

Now, for our own part, we believe that "all Scripture," whether that recorded in the Old Testament, or that which is contained in the New, "is given by inspiration of God;" and that the whole of it is "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness;" nay, that unless the "man of God" is well trained and instructed in the whole of it—Old Testament as well as New—he is not "perfect and thoroughly furnished unto all good works." Indeed, we cannot resist the conviction, that "the holy Scriptures" in which Timothy had been instructed "from a child," were no other than the scriptures of the Old Testament; for in Timothy's childhood, no portion of the New Testament had been committed to writing. Yet he is exhorted by an Apostle, whose evangelical character will hardly be disputed, to "CONTINUE in the things which he had learned and been assured of," and is told that these holy scriptures are able to render him "wise unto salvation," (see 2 Tim. 3: 14—17.) Has a Christian, then, nothing to do with the Old Testament?

To confess the truth, we think that a much larger portion of the laws and institutions of the Old Testament is in force than is commonly supposed. We cannot be persuaded, that laws so calculated to promote happiness, so well adapted to remind man of his equality with his neighbor, and of his entire dependence on God, were ever intended to be but temporary enactments. Laws which required the rich to lend to his poor neighbor without usury—which enjoined the reaper to leave the gleanings of his field for the poor—which required the reversion of inheritances at the year of Jubilee—which enjoined protection to the fugitive servant—which prohibited the taking of the upper and nether mill-stone in pledge for debt, with many others that might be instanced, were too well calculated to promote human happiness, to be intended merely for a few generations, or only for a single race of people. The spirit of these laws is binding still, and Gentiles as well as Jews are under obligation to regard them.

It was a beautiful provision of the Hebrew code, that if a man had become poor, and was obliged to sell his inheritance on that account, an opportunity was to be given him to redeem it. Lev. 25: 25. But how do professors of religion interpret this law, under the Christian Dispensation? Why, here is one of them, to whom God in his providence has lent much, and who has plenty of money laid up in store. But his neighbor, who owns a small farm, has become straitened, and goes to him and says, "I am greatly in need of money: I must have it, or I am ruined. Here is my little estate; it is well worth a thousand dollars, but nobody wants to buy it, and for the sake of meeting my liabilities I will sell it at a sacrifice. Give me five hundred dollars, and it shall be yours." Glad of the opportunity to become the owner of a property well worth a thousand dollars at half its value, and having the money ready, the rich Christian purchases it. But does he give the poor man an opportunity to buy it back again, within a specified time, at the same price? Does he allow any of the man's kindred to do so? No. The law has made him the possessor of it, "at a bargain;" and is he going to be such a fool as to sell it again for the same money, when he may, by waiting awhile, make a clear profit of five hundred dollars on it? Not he. He "understands business" too well for that. And if reminded that the law of God once required his people to give the poor an opportunity of redeeming his inheritance, he eases his conscience with the persuasion that that was only a Jewish statute, which Christians are under no obligation to regard.

Now, there are multitudes of such cases continually occurring, in which all the compassion, all the God-breathed benevolence of the gospel is smothered, because a miserable system of theology has determined that Christianity shall not be practically illustrated by the precepts of the Old Testament. We would to God, that such a miserable system might undergo a more severe scrutiny, than it is wont to, by those who have so long clung to it. It would then very soon be seen, that it is only sophistry of a shallow kind, which argues that Old Testament precepts are done away because the Old Covenant is abrogated.

We might extend our illustrations, but time will not permit. We will simply ask those who have always advocated the system which we oppose, to re-examine it severely, and in a deep sense of the obligation to practice mercy and justice as imposed on them by the blood of Christ, to ask whether some of the laws given to the Hebrews were not also intended for Gentiles. BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Sunday-keeping in London—The Crystal Palace—Judgments.

GLASGOW, September 10, 1852.

The Free Church Magazine for the present month contains an article on the Sunday trading of London, containing some statements of a remarkable character. At the Exhibition, last year, not a little was said of the testimony to Sunday observance which the foreigner witnessed in the fact that the Crystal Palace was shut upon that day. There is, indeed, little reason to question, that the homage paid to an untrue tradition is greater than is to be seen in any other land; but the amount of evidence for the change of the Sabbath derived from universal practice, seems weakened by the following statement of facts, as presented by the City Mission, concerning the metropolis of the most Sunday observing country on the face of the earth.

The number of shops open for Sunday trading in that half of London to which the labors of the City Mission are confined, is 14,103. These open shops would be sufficient to give a frontage to all the leading thoroughfares of London. Thus, in this one half of the city to which the Mission is confined, the shops open for doing buisness would form a continuous line of 30 miles; and, as they observe, "if the other half of London is of a like character, which it may be fairly assumed to be, it extends the line to 60 miles." The total number of shops in the observed districts is 25,812—so that considerably more than a majority are open on Sunday, and "many declare, doubtless with truth, that they do as much business on that day as on the other six days put together."

As was to have been excepted, those who prefer Sunday to the Sabbath, and who, by trying to maintain for the former its improper place, think they are doing God service, dread an increase of this desecration from the opening of the New Crystal Palace. The "Evangelical Alliance," as it is pleased to style itself, and to be styled, resolved, at one of their meetings, with unusually little stir, however, to present a Memorial to Government, a Remonstrance to the Proprietors and Directors of the Palace, and an Appeal to the People at large, against the Palace being opened on that day. The Record, this week, says that farther, "the Scripture Readers' Society, the City Mission, the Religious Tract Society, the Wesleyan Committee, &c., &c., are already in motion, and will either memorialize the Government or take such other measures as may seem more advisable," for the same purpose. We have no expectation that any or all of these will succeed in arresting the purpose of the Palace Co. The leading organs of public opinion are silent or applaud the contemplated scene of Sunday amusement; and we doubt not that, as in the case of the Sunday traders, the Proprietors will find that it yields them more profit than the other six days put together.

The half-yearly meetings of Railway Proprietors have now been nearly all held; and we have not observed at any one of them the slightest allusion to the question of stopping Sunday trains. To those who formerly made such vigorous efforts for this purpose, it perhaps appears hopeless, although the traffic has increased rather than diminished.

But while the day which has so long usurped the place of God's Sabbath, is being restored to its place among "the six working days," there is no indication of any being thereby led to think of the privilege and duty of sanctifying the day which God hath blessed for this purpose. The movement is a farther inroad of worldliness, while those who have any real concern about a Sabbath at all, seem to cling the closer to what they yet confess they have no direct Scripture to sanction. They seem to suppose, nay, some of them say, that if they let go the day which the law and practice of the Church have set apart, no other will be substituted. But surely this putting down of the authority of God, stifling the voice of conscience, is what most endangers our having the true Sabbath to enjoy. If men misuse the privileges conferred, God may be provoked to withdraw the opportunity of their enjoyment; and although the Sabbath blessing abides for him who by faith lays hold of it, it is quite possible that those who have not preferred the law of God to their own tradition, even when shown unto them, may lose the one without gaining the other. Not choosing to retain God in acknowledgment, he may suffer them to fall into delusion, to believe their lie, without reaping profit from it.

When the Judgments of the Lord are abroad in the earth, the people should learn righteousness. Again this year has He smitten us severely. Over all the country the potato is diseased to an extent beyond what it has been since 1847. Authentic accounts say that a third, or even a half, are already destroyed. And this is not confined to this country, although upon the Continent the blight has been to a less extent. There, however, their vines have been to a considerable extent mildewed; while both upon the Continent and in this country, destructive floods have prevailed. And, in addition to these calamities, and still farther bespeaking the displeasure of the Most High, and in fulfillment of his threatenings against iniquity, cholera, which, after ravaging eastern lands, and having already carried off large numbers from some towns on the Continent of Europe—20,000 in Warsaw, of whom 1660 were Jews—has reached our shores. It is reported, as in different places of Lincolnshire; and, alas! authenticated cases in Glasgow, this week and last, are loudly calling for repentance and return unto the Lord, in heart and in life, glorifying Him in all we do. May this be the fruit of His solemn dispensations in the case of many.

MISSIONARY SOCIETY'S ANNIVERSARY.

Address of Wm. M. Jones.

MR. PRESIDENT: Feelings of a peculiar kind possess my heart as I come before this Society. Two years ago, I stood before you for the first time. I had then been two years a co-laborer with you. Having just arrived from the scene of missionary toil, my heart was full of zeal for the gospel; and, thanks to the Lord of missions, I feel not less interested to-day.

Allow me to allude to a scene which comes before me as fresh as though it were of yesterday. About eight years since, on a New England winter's morning, myself and companion took passage on board a small schooner at Boston. A few brethren and sisters hastily collected together; we had only time to give the parting hand, when our frail bark, loosed from her moorings, was wafted quickly out to sea. I can still see the waving handkerchief—the last visible token of an affectionate farewell. We were on our way to the prospective field of future labor, and felt that this was our last earthly adieu to kindred in Christ. But what changes since! I think of the Haytien mission, the mission schools, and especially of the one at Port de Paix. I love to think of those fellow laborers in the cause, some of whom have fallen asleep. Their graves are there as monuments of the missionary work. There are also converts from Romanism. They bid fair to shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of our Father. Among them is an old man, whose knees are quite callous from the effect of kneeling before the cross and image of Christ at a placed called Calvary. He had there met the multitude twice or thrice a week for years, and kneeled upon the stone steps to read prayers to the Virgin and to the Saints. I gave him a Bible, and that book was the means of his conversion to God. Brethren, I wish simply to call your attention to that interesting field. It is an extensive one, and very needy. The seed of the Gospel has been sown there; the Lord's holy Sabbath has there been observed and advocated. O, pray that we may yet reap fruit from those labors; and when you remember the heathen at the throne of grace, forget not the Haytiens.

But I arose to speak of my late tour to Lower Canada. While there I was told that a man could wear just such a complexion—white, black, or red—as it had pleased the Creator to give him, and not be disrespected for it. I will here speak of Protestanism in Lower Canada. In Montreal, Quebec, and other large towns, there are Episcopal, Presbyterian, Methodist, and Baptist Churches. They are doing a good work; but on account of using the English tongue, are shut out from access to the mass of the people. There are two Protestant Missions in that country, operating chiefly through the French language. The Grande Ligne Baptist Mission was commenced seventeen years ago. It numbers about 300 communicants, who are converts from Romanism. The station of Grande Ligne is provided with a farm of 80 acres, and suitable buildings for the accommodation of the missionaries, teachers, and students. Twenty-six young men are now there, receiving instruction preparatory to the ministry, or to act as colporteurs and teachers. At St. Pie they have a school for young ladies. It now numbers twenty. All these receive board and tuition free, and in some cases their whole support is provided by the mission. They also sustain a number of primary schools, in which children are taught gratuitously. The Gospel is preached at about twenty stations. The Canadian Missionary Society (Pedobaptist) is likewise doing a good work. At Pointe aux Trembles, nine miles from Montreal, they have a school of 100 scholars of both sexes. They have other schools and preaching stations, but this is their principal one. Here, as at Grande Ligne and St. Pie, scholars are boarded, taught, and in many instances clothed, at the expense of the Society. The French Canadian, when converted, is veay zealous, active and self-denying in his Master's cause. The colporteur sometimes carries needles and thread, and other articles, for sale, which introduces him to many families where he would not otherwise gain access. His salary is small, and in the long, cold winters, often too poor to pay twelve and a half cents for lodging, he sleeps by the stove on the floor, burning one side, and freezing the other. Some of these faithful laborers are becoming quite lame from rheumatism, brought on by their exposure to the cold. One day I met one on the road on foot, carrying a basket of Bibles and tracts on his shoulder. "What success?" said I. "Oh, very good. Sometimes I am turned out of doors, and sometimes am well received. In all my labors and trials I think of my Saviour."

Romanism has a strong-hold in Canada, much stronger than I had anticipated to find it. Popery there raises its head and horns in earnest. The people are very ignorant of letters and of true religion. It seems to me that the power of the priests is in some way or other greater than that of the Government. The priests hate the light, and will not come to it, lest their deeds should be reproved. I was conversing on board a steamer, with Mr. ——, of Quebec, when a gentleman requested the privilege of making a remark, which called forth a reply. He then said, "You are after all indebted to the Catholics for collecting and preserving the Sacred Scriptures; I say this, and yet am no Catholic." Several priests and others were standing near, and commenced laughing and retreating to the quarter deck, not giving me time to reply. I waited a long while for them to return into the saloon, but in vain. Verily, "the wicked flee when no man pursueth."

A French Baptist Minister related to me the following, which took place a few weeks since: He was at dinner, and arguing with a priest who sat near him. About a dozen priests were at dinner, listening to the conversation. Soon, one of the Fathers became alarmed, and went to the captain of the boat and requested him to interfere and stop the conversation. The captain refused, saying he should not, so long as the gentlemen conversed as calmly as they were doing.

As a farther illustration of the desire of these gentlemen, the priests, the following fact is taken from the Semeur Canadien, (Canadian Sower,) Last winter, L'Institut Canadien (Canadian Institute) wishing to rent a place for its library, its journals and weekly meetings, applied to the church of Notre Dame, who had a house altogether convenient. The church wardens, thinking a great deal of the location, thought it best to consult the faculty or trustees of the Catholic College, (which is on the same property,) which latter appeared to interest themselves a good deal in the affairs of the Institut Canadien. The Superior of the establishment, M. Bilaudelle replied to the persons acting for the Institute as follows: "We will rent you the building for £50 per annum, if you will accept the following conditions. 1. Not to discuss any moral or religious subject. 2. To exclude from your reading-room all journals whose complexions do not please us. 3. To fnruish a catalogue of the books in your library to the Bishop of Montreal, giving to his highness the liberty of excluding all books which he may consider bad. I need hardly add, that the Institute sought and found a location on better terms.

In regard to the distribution of tracts: I found many who could not read, and therefore refused them. Others refused them because they were Protestant publications. One man accepted a book, after I assured him that it contained a narrative of a good man. He thrust it into his pocket in a great hurry as though he feared the observation of some bystanders. Another came into a hotel, and inquired for newspapers; the landlord came to me; I gave him a copy of the Sabbath Recorder. Soon after, I entered the bar-room, and found him reading. I offered him a tract. No, he would not receive it—never read such publications!—and yet continued reading the Recorder with apparent interest! Some are so bigoted that they will not receive a Protestant publication, and the Bishop condemns every one that comes to his knowledge, and this condemnation is trumpeted through all the parishes, and the priests thunder anathemas against heretics and their writings, all of which tends to keep the flock on their guard. But some will read when a tract or book can be read unobserved. Others, a few others, here and there, receive tracts with thankfulness.

In the course of the tour, I went to Grand Bay, on the Saguenay River, 420 miles northeast of Montreal. I visited Cacouna, River du Loup, Green Island, Quebec, Indian Lorette, Montreal, Grande Ligne, Pointe aux Trembles, St. Pie, and St. Hyacinth. The latter place is the most inviting as a field of labor. It is a village of 3500 inhabitants, located on the Atlantic and St. Lawrence Railroad, 33 miles east of Montreal. A few Protestants are there, but no Protestant preacher. A desire was expressed by some of the people for a primary and high school. There is no Protestant school in the place. The last time I preached there, several Catholics were present. One of them had that day told her mother, that she would go no more to confession, that she was going that day to hear the word of God. Accordingly, she came to hear me. I think Indian Lorette would be a favorable location for a mission. Much might be done in Montreal and other places. As to the results of tract distribution, I have not time to speak at length. A few individuals in Montreal and St. Hyacinthe have given evidence of serious impressions in regard to the claims of the Lord's Sabbath. I wished much to visit the country north of the St. Lawrence, between Montreal and Quebec, but had not time. The field is vast and very needy. It is open to us, as much as to others; but if we enter it, we must expect hard labor and several trials. Some of you may wonder why I feel anxious for our people to have a mission among Catholics. I believe we may do great good by the conversion of Protestants to the Sabbath, but I do feel that it is better to strike at the root of the tree, instead of lopping off the branches. A converted Catholic is great gain to the cause of truth, and one converted to keep the Bible Sabbath would do a great deal to arouse the attention of the Protestant community to this all-important subject. O that we were prepared to make a strong and persevering effort to bring the gospel to bear upon that benighted people!

A word before I close in regard to mission schools. In Hayti our experience taught us, that in order to succeed we must begin with the rising generation. We considered schools an indispensable auxiliary to preaching the gospel. From our missionaries in China we are appealed to for aid to support schools. They feel that they are very much limited in their work without them. The two Mission Societies in Lower Canada have gone to work wisely in this respect. In the commencement it is quite difficult to get scholars. But here and there one is found. The children of the converts, and the converts themselves, need daily instruction; they must have it, or the work is retarded. The colporteur finds, even at a great distance from the station, a parent who is anxious, or at least willing, that his child should go to the Prot[illegible]ol. The little one is soo[illegible] taught to re[illegible] the Bib[illegible] in a few years he goes fo[illegible] the Word of God in his head and heart that all the power of Rome cannot take it from him. Most of the preachers and colporteurs of those Societies were a few years since pupils in the mission schools. They are looked upon as nurseries of piety and usefulness, and it is in the school that native helpers may be prepared to work to advantage among their countrymen. The supporters of those societies are found in the States, the Canadas, England, France, and Switzerland—they furnish thousands of dollars annually to board, instruct, and clothe Canadian children. May their example stimulate us to go and do likewise. Whoever enters upon the missionary work will find that it is not all poetry, nor a bed of roses. He will meet with opposition and trials at almost every step. He should be prepared for all sorts of weather, and not shrink when winds and waves threaten to overwhelm him. I would recommend the people of that country to your favorable consideration, to your prayers, and to missionary action. Who of you, friends, is willing to consecrate himself to the work? The call is very loud and earnest. It comes to us from China, from Palestine, and last, though not least, from Canada. The country is visited with a six or seven months winter; the people are taught to look upon us as heretics; even Protestants will regard us with a jealous eye. But God, who is rich in mercy, is able to make cold hearts warm, and hearts of stone hearts of flesh. The work is to be undertaken and carried on, not by might nor by power, but by the Spirit and Word of Him who came to seek and to save the lost.

Address of Eld. A. B. Burdick.

Bro. Burdick selected as the theme of his remarks, Christian liberality as connected with Missions. He urged it from three considerations:—

1. The indispensable necessity of liberality in order to great success in this work. Missions cannot be sustained without money, or its equivalent. God does not rain down bread and clothing from heaven to supply the wants of those laboring on the missionary field. In this remark, I do not forget nor underrate the importance of the influence of the Holy Spirit. Without it, no labor or bestowment of money can be in any degree effectual. Still, money must be had for the same uses as if our brethren were engaged in any other calling. They must have food and clothing; this requires money. They must have chapels, houses, books, printing presses, and materials for making tracts, &c., with other conveniences of life and labor; these all require money. Unless these wants are promptly met by us, their efforts will be more or less embarrassed, and our missionary enterprise suffer immense loss.

2. I urge liberality in this work, in view of the benefits resulting to those who exercise it. Selfishness withers and contracts the heart, and renders it incapable of great and sublime contemplation, or pure and elevated enjoyment; while the exercise of liberality enlarges and develops the soul, and causes it to feel that it is allied to man and to God. There is nothing in which man so much resembles his Lord and Saviour, as in the religious exercise of benevolence. Liberality thus exercised gives fervor to intercession for missions. No enlightened Christian can with confidence ask God to prosper the missionary cause while he withholds from it his liberality. Who is it that we hear, from time to time, as we assemble in the monthly concert, lifting up his heart in earnest pleading for the benighted heathen? Is it the brother to whom the plea for missionary aid is unavailing? No, he is not in that gathering; or, if there, does not take a part in the supplications. It is he who has consecrated every dollar that he feels that God and duty require, to this holy purpose, who can bow with a firm and joyous confidence, and ask God to bless the offering and the cause. Liberality and prayer generally go hand in hand in this work. Prayer will either open the purse, or withholding will shut the lips. "The liberal soul shall be made fat," while withholding is the true source of poverty.

3. I will close by simply referring your minds to some examples of noble liberality in God's cause. Among these are David and Solomon, with their cotemporaries in the great work of forwarding the cause of God, and building up the institutions of religion in the world. The history of their lives is a history of active liberality. The people "offered willingly" of the good things of which they were possessed, until a surplus caused their leaders to restrain them from bringing more. Oh, may the time be hastened, when the treasuries of the benevolent institutions of our denomination may be thus supplied. Remember, brethren, that God has said, that "he that soweth sparingly, shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully, shall reap also bountifully." Remember, also, that "the liberal man deviseth liberal things, and by liberal things shall he stand." Let us therefore "cast our bread upon the waters," trusting in the immutable promise of God, that we shall "find it after many days." Let us make an effort to interest all in this good work; especially the children of our families and congregations. Would it not be well for the father, or the guardian, to train the children under his care in this good work? Let the children with their own hands present an offering to God in this way, and interest youthful minds in this momentous work. I hope that the time may soon come, that an enlarged liberality may characterize all our churches, and that the knowledge of the Lord may cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

CONGREGATIONAL CONVENTION.

A great Congregational Convention is to be held at Albany on the 5th of October. The proprietors of The Independent have chartered, for this occasion, cars of the Hudson River Railroad at a discount from the regular fares, so that they are enabled to furnish tickets to Albany, for Clergymen and Delegates to the Convention, at half the usual rates, viz: $1 50 to go and return. Tickets to be procured only at the office of The Independent, No. 34 Beekman-st., New York. A clergyman of Albany has furnished the following interesting information relative to the Convention:—

A general Congregational Convention, consisting of Delegates, lay and clerical, from particular churches, associations, or other re[illegible]rly organized bodies connected with the [illegible]mination, will assemble on Thursday, the [illegible] of October, at the First Congregational Church in this city. The object of the Convention is to collect authentic information in relation to the number, condition and prospects of the Churches; to consult in relation to the best manner of prosecuting the work of home missions, more particularly in the West; and, in general, to deliberate on the position and duties of this section of the great Christian family, in the present state of our country. There will probably be assembled some hundreds of clergymen and laymen. The sessions will be public, although the meetings will be chiefly of a business character. There will doubtless be interesting and able discussions on the various topics which come up; and in the course of the Convention there will probably be discourses preached, which will be worth the hearing of such as may be able to attend.

A MINISTERIAL CEMETERY.

A proper regard for the memory of our ancestors, and especially of those whose attachment to truth and fidelity to duty made them pioneers in reformation, is important to the well-being of society. The Seventh-day Baptists, though they call no man father, yet owe a respectful consideration to the relics of their ancient ministers, as a token of gratitude for their labors and sufferings in the common cause, under the most trying times. The name of Wm. Hiscox is dear to every intelligent Seventh-day Baptist. He contended for the truth, and contended successfully, though without precedent or a colleague in the ministry in America. He was pastor of the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in America, and labored at Newport. Where his remains are deposited, may still be known to his posterity. Should they not be rescued from oblivion?—also those of Gibson, Crandall, and others? The remains of Eld. John Maxson, Sen., the first minister of the Westerly Church, and of all the western part of Rhode Island, are now resting near the scene of his labors, and in circumstances to require attention, to preserve them, and secure them from being lost; and, in respect for his memory, should be placed in some cemetery, where his brethren and posterity lie. It has been asked, Who, among all the descendants of New England Seventh-day Baptists, has not some of his blood in his veins?—for from him have all of his name in America descended. Equally dear to memory or posterity are the names of his successors, and equally deserving of the same regard.

It has been proposed, that near the site of the Old Hopkinton Church, suitable monuments should be erected to perpetuate to future ages the memory of the primitive Seventh-day Baptist ministers; and a small contribution from their recognized posterity would, if generally concurred in, be sufficient to defray the expense, not only of covering the remains of those whose graves are known and may be found, but of a suitable notice of those that may be lost.

There is in every breast a desire not to be forgotten—to leave some memorial to remind posterity of their deeds. Not only statesmen and heroes, but Christians and philanthropists, are inspired by the same laudable desire. "To die and be forgotten," is but to have been a blank in society. Holy men have labored and toiled, amid contradiction and opposition, with the blessed consolation, that though they were not understood, and their labors and sufferings not appreciated, yet a generous and grateful posterity would bestow on their memory the deserved award, and draw from their examples and sufferings instruction and courage. If such sentiments inspired the Saviour of the world, and drew from him the memorable words, "What I do, ye know not now, but ye shall know hereafter," we may well infer that such is a prevailing hope, and that the desire of posterity, to perpetuate their memory and their deeds, is not only a privilege but a duty.

I am therefore pleased that such a thought has been conceived, and hope that not only on the consecrated grounds of the Church of Hopkinton, but of Newport, and the churches of New Jersey, suitable monuments may be erected to perpetuate the memory of their early ministers and founders, whose immediate descendants have passed away. By calling up their memories, and pointing to the history of their labors and patience, we not only encourage the Christian in private life, but also give assurance to our cotemporaries in the ministry, that they too shall be remembered, when their toils are over, and those who cannot sympathize in their motives, or understand them, shall cease to censure.

SUNDAY TRAFFIC IN BOSTON.—There has been great trouble and distress of mind in Boston, caused by the fear of losing the Sunday pot of baked beans, through the determination of the city authorities to carry out the law for the observance of the Sunday. It was feared that the bakers would no longer be allowed to deliver that necessary of New England existence on that holy day. But on Tuesday last, men's minds were made easy by a decision in the Police Court, in which it was decided that the delivery of bread, milk, and baked beans, from a shop on Sunday, does not come within the prohibition of the statute against traffic on the Lord's day, but that this kind of traffic comes under the exception of works of necessity and charity.

RESULTS OF THE PERSECUTION OF DR. KING.—Dr. King still remains unharmed at Athens, in spite of Russian interference, although he was sentenced to be banished several months ago. Twelve of the most distinguished lawyers of Greece, the majority of whom have occupied high stations under the government, have given in writing their deliberate opinion that religious liberty is undoubtedly granted by the constitution and laws of the land. The more intelligent of the common people are of the same opinion.

THE OHIO ASSOCIATION.—The Seventh-day Baptist Ohio Association will hold its third anniversary with the church at Jackson, Shelby Co., Ohio, commencing on Fifth-day, [illegible]ct. 7, at 11 o'clock A. M.

"The Queen of Song."—Madame Henrietta Sontag, Countess de Rossi, whose extraordinary vocal powers have secured for her the title of "Queen of Song," is now giving Concerts in New York, on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday evenings. The story of her life is a remarkable one. Probably no vocalist ever lived whose career was not eclipsed by the brilliancy of Madame Sontag's. Endowed with beauty, and a charm of manner which brought Barons, Counts, Dukes, and Princes to her feet, her talent and her wonderful voice early achieved for her a fortune. This secured, she accepted the hand of one of her many admirers, with whom she retired from the excitement of public life to the enjoyment of the polished gaities of diplomatic life. But pecuniary losses, occasioned by the political revolution which has just shaken Europe, have again given to the world the songstress who once turned the brains and carried captive the hearts of so many in Germany, France, and Europe.

A gentleman who attended the first rehearsal in this city, makes the following comparison:—

"The only artist we have heard in this country with whom Madame Sontag can properly be compared is Jenny Lind. They are of essentially the same school; but in all that belongs to culture, and to correctness and severity of taste—that is to say, in the art of singing, strictly considered—Madame Sontag is, we are convinced, much the superior. Jenny Lind has a remarkable voice, and a transcendant dramatic genius, and exercises a magnetic power upon her audience; but as a singer, with all her splendor, she is guilty of faults of which Madame Sontag is incapable, at the same time that she never attains that delicious perfection which is characteristic of the latter."

"Uncle Tom's Cabin" in England.—The following extract from a letter recently received by Mrs. H. B. Stowe, author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," is worth copying as an illustration of honesty, as well as to show the circulation that work is likely to obtain. Thomas Bosworth, of London, says:—

Madam: I beg respectfully to address you on the subject of your work, "Uncle Tom's Cabin," an edition of which I am now printing for sale in this country. There have been two editions published here as yet, but both of them in very inferior style, and I thought there must yet be room for a well-printed edition. I do not think it right, however, to avail myself of the present defective state of the copyright laws, and to reprint the works of an author, though belonging to another country, (which in my opinion does not alter the principle of the thing at all,) without making him or her a fair remuneration. I beg therefore, to offer you a "royalty" of three pence on every copy sold, which I shall have much pleasure in transmitting to you in any way you may request. My edition must, of course, be a cheap one, as the work is being printed in this country for sixpence; but it will be printed well, and have in every respect a creditable appearance.

American Authors and British Publishers.—Instances of justice between authors and publishers are multiplying. We have already chronicled the offer of a British publisher to pay Mrs. Stowe a per centage on copies of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" sold in England. Rev. F. C. Woodworth, who has recently returned from London, furnishes the N. Y. Tribune with another instance. He says:—

"Messrs. James Nisbet & Co., an extensive publishing house in London, entrusted to my care a beautiful copy of the 'Wide, Wide World,' which they had just brought out, and desired me to present it to the gifted author, with their compliments. They informed me, also, that they had made an equitable arrangement with this lady for the publication of most or all of her books; and they desired me to revise, for the English market, certain of my own juvenile works, for which, in the event of their publishing them, they proposed to allow me an adequate compensation. More than this, they assured me it was their deliberate determination not to republish a page from an American author without sending him a fair and satisfactory equivalent."

A Visit from the Aborigines.—A company of Florida Indians, who had been on a visit to Washington for some time past, arranging matters with the Government, came to New York last Fifth-day, under charge of Gen Blake and Mr. J. Griffin, and put up at the American. Their names were Billy Bowlegs, or Holota Micko, Fusatha Emathla, Nocose Emathla, Chocote Tustenugga, representative of Sam Jones, John Jumper, Sarpaka Yohla, Abraham, (a negro,) interpreter. In the course of the afternoon they visited Barnum's Museum, and viewed the city from the roof, a prospect which highly delighted and astonished them. They passed the evening at Niblo's. The next day they took a view of the lions, paying another visit to the Museum, and taking a ride up to the High Bridge. They remained until Sabbath, when they left by steamship for Savannah, and thence to Key West. After disposing of their property, they will leave for their new home in the Far West, under charge of Gen. Blake—at least, they have promised this.

Rates of Postage under the New Law.—The following are the quarterly rates of postage on our several publications after Oct. 1:

The Sabbath Recorder—3½ cents in the State of New York; 6½ cents in any other part of the United States.

The Sabbath-School Visitor—½ of a cent in the State of New York; 1½ cents in any other part of the United States.

The Seventh-day Baptist Memorial—1 cent a number in any part of the United States.

These rates must be paid quarterly in advance, or they may be doubled. Small papers, like the Visitor, may be sent in parcels of not less than 8 ounces to one address, for half a cent an ounce, provided they are prepaid at the mailing office by affixing postage stamps. Each copy of the Visitor weighs about ⅓ of an ounce; consequently it will take 24 copies to make a parcel weighing 8 ounces. The postage on Visitors sent in this way would be less than ½ of a cent per number to any part of the United States. We will cheerfully affix the stamps, when they are furnished, to parcels of over 24.

European News.

The steamship Africa, with three days later dates from Europe, arrived at New York Sept. 21. We give a summary of the news.

An accident occurred on the Bristol and Exeter Railway on the 8th, by which the engineer was killed, and two persons seriously injured. The engine and tender ran off the track, but fortunately the impetus of the train was such that the sudden check snapped the connecting chain between the van and the first carriage, the whole line of which were impelled past the wreck at full speed, and so near was the van obstructing the way that a groove was made in some places an inch deep in the sides of the carriages as they passed it. The passengers escaped with some trifling cuts and bruises.

A fearful thunder-storm had visited Worcestershire and done immense damage to the crops.

A mine of valuable anthracite coal has been discovered at Cavan, Ireland.

As a party of soldiers were firing at a target with the Minié rifle, at Crinkle, Kings County, Ireland, Francis Najeat, a drummer, aged 18, was shot through the head by one of the bullets and instantly expired.

The Tribunal of Correctional Police at Paris, have condemned a hair-dresser, named Lanoe, to six months' imprisonment, and 100f. fine, for having used insulting language respecting the President of the Republic.

A company is being formed to sink artesian wells in each of the 48 quarters of Paris, for the purpose of supplying warm water to baths, at 20 centimes each, to four public wash-houses in each quarter, to private houses, and for warming apartments.

At the convocation of the bishops held in Cologne, a manifesto is stated to have been prepared for presentation to the King, praying his Majesty to abolish the royal order which gives the Roman Catholic bishops and clergy the power of inspecting all the schools; and likewise the abolition of the recent order prohibiting the reëstablishment of the order of the Jesuits in Prussia.

The reports of cholera are more favorable. The disease still commits considerable ravages in Posnania, and in the vicinity of the Lower Vistula, Vogat, and Middle Order, as well as upon the Pregal, near Konigsberg; but for the present it shows no disposition to cross these boundaries, and medical men do not entertain apprehensions of its extending toward the Elbe.

Some of the Madrid journals have for some time past been demanding the suppression of bull fights. In opposition to them, a petition, praying the Queen to establish a school of tauromachia, has been signed by several thousand persons, and presented to her Majesty by the Duke de Veraguas.

Nearly all the soldiers enlisted for the Pope's army at Portarlier have deserted at Civitta, and now amuse themselves by stopping the diligences and plundering travelers.

The correspondent of the Trieste Gazette writes from Constantinople that there is every probability of a speedy reïnstallation of Reschid Pacha, Ali Pacha, and Fuad Effendi, in their former ministries. Reschid Pacha is reconciled with Ali Pacha, his chief enemy, and the best possible understanding now exists between them. More than 5,000 families are left houseless by the recent fires; 3,000 have as yet found no place of shelter, and the Government has granted them the use of a sufficient number of military tents. In Adrianople conflagrations have caused the destruction of property to the value of 4,000,000 piasters. According to reports from Syria, Abdurahman's band had fallen upon Hebron and pillaged it.

A Singular Case of Suffering.

In the Supreme Court, this week, (says the Boston Traveler,) the case of Miss Ann M. Clark, who sues the city for $20,000 damages for injuries received from falling into a cellar-way in Hawkins-st., on the last night of the railroad jubilee, has been on trial. The testimony of the Massachusetts General Hospital physician, where Miss Clark has remained for nearly the whole time since the accident, discloses the following singular result:—

Miss Clark is about nineteen years of age. Previous to the accident she was employed as a worsted worker at Malden, and enjoyed good health. On the last evening of the Railroad Jubilee, she proceeded with some of her friends to witness the fireworks in Bowdoin-square. On their return home they passed through Chardon and Hawkins-sts., where she fell through a cellar-way which had been accidentally left open after the grade of the street and sidewalk had been altered. After she was taken out she complained of a feeling as if she had been struck in the stomach. The next day she proceeded to her work at Malden was there seized with vomiting, and violent pains in the stomach; she returned to the city, was conveyed to the General Hospital, where she has remained ever since. The physicians say that in her fall she received an injury to her spine, and the result is, that she can keep upon her stomach but a very small quantity of food, an amount barely sufficient to sustain life, but not enough to stay the cravings of appetite. Her chief aliment is molasses and water, and if any amount above two ounces is given to her, her stomach soon rejects it. Various expedients have been devised by the physicians to administer nourishment. Among others, blisters have been applied, and then Cod Liver Oil rubbed on the scarified surface, and thus absorbed in the system. The unfortunate young woman is little better than a skeleton, and her sufferings are no doubt very severe. The physicians state that there is recorded in the books but one similar case.

A Fortune found an Owner.—A young man named Hugh Belfrage, a private soldier, has become entitled to a princely fortune. It appears that between thirty and forty years ago, an uncle of his father, who was a silk mercer or silk dyer, left Scotland and settled in the West Indies. There he realized a large fortune, and about twenty years ago he died intestate, and without issue. The father of Belfrage was the heir at law, but, as he understood that the property had been acquired in the slave trade, he declined upon conscientious grounds to apply for it, considering that good could not come of money so obtained. The property was, under these circumstances, taken possession of by the authorities, in whose hands it has continued ever since, and it is now supposed to amount to about [illegible] million.

Fire in a Railroad Car.—A singular accident occurred on a train of cars on the Rochester and Syracuse road, a few days since. Mr. Robert Lay, who resides near Vienna, was taking a beautiful and favorite horse to the State Fair, and was in the car with the animal himself. The train was in motion, and the door closed from the outside, when he discovered fire in the forward part of the car, among the straw. Almost instantly it was in a blaze. He tried to extinguish it, but failing, he attempted to open the door. At last he succeeded, but the train being under full headway, he dare not leap. He remained on it until badly burnt, when he jumped off, and narrowly escaped with his life, no bones being broken. Before the fire was discovered, the car was nearly destroyed, and the noble horse suffocated or burnt to death.

SUMMARY.

Died, in Buffalo, on Saturday, the 19th inst., James Copland Mason, aged 30 years. Some of our readers may remember that Mr. Mason was married about a year since to Miss Atkinson, and that Jenny Lind honored the ceremony by officiating as bridesmaid and Otto Goldschmidt as groomsman. The prospect which then seemed so pleasant, has been suddenly turned into one of gloom and sadness, and kind-hearted, amiable Margaret, has been left alone in the world, a widow. Both had been employed during the season on board the steamer "Southern Michigan," and had secured the esteem of her officers for the faithful manner in which they discharged their duties.

The Florence and Keyport Company expect soon to have in operation a new route between New York and Philadelphia, by means of a ferry between this city and Keyport, a plank-road from Keyport to Florence on the Delaware, and a ferry thence to Philadelphia. The object is to furnish a cheap line of travel, and the fare will not exceed a dollar. As the distance can be traveled by this route in six or seven hours, it will probably be availed of to a considerable extent, while the railway fare is maintained at the extravagant rate of three dollars.

At Philadelphia, Sept. 25, Ole Bull, the celebrated violinist, took the initiatory steps toward becoming a citizen of the United States. In obedience to the request of the distinguished Norwegian, the necessary oath was administered in the Hall of Independence, by Mr. George Pritt, Clerk of the United States Circuit Court. A number of persons were present, and witnessed the ceremony. Ole Bull said he designed inducing as many of his countrymen as he could to emigrate to this country.

An important case was tried a few days since in the Circuit Court of Shenandoah county, Va. The Rockingham Register states that about a year since, a gentleman, while going down the valley in a stage-coach belonging to Messrs. Farish, Harman & Co., was seriously injured by the upsetting of the coach. His leg was dreadfully broken, insomuch that he is made a cripple for life. He brought suit against the company, claiming damages to the amount of $10,000. The jury in the case rendered a verdict for the plaintiff, and assessed the damages at $9,000.

An Irishman who was supposed to have died suddenly on the railroad, was recently buried at Wheeling, Va. Those who attended the funeral, after lowering the coffin into the grave, returned to their homes, leaving a man to fill up the grave. It appears that after throwing in a few shovels full of earth, he was alarmed by a singular noise as of kicking and struggling in the coffin, so that he ran away. Coming up with Mr. Fitzimons, he told what he had heard, and both immediately returned, raised and opened the coffin, and found the man turned on his face, and his person warm.

The Daily News states that on the last voyage of the Canada from Liverpool to New York, the vessel narrowly escaped destruction by fire. After leaving Liverpool, it was found that one of the passengers was insane, and had to be put under restraint. The person appointed to watch him having left the cabin of the madman for a short time, it was immediately discovered to be in flames, and it was only by the most strenuous exertions that the fire was extinguished.

It is a remarkable circumstance, without parallel in the annals of Congress, that the annual Message of the President lay on the table of the House of Representatives without being referred, as is the invariable custom, from the period of being received until the adjournment. This fact speaks volumes as to the waste of time that characterized the proceedings of a session which was the longest since the establishment of the Government.

A poor German at Columbus was killed recently, while firing a salute, by the bursting of a gun Gen. Scott called on his widow and gave her an order for $400.

During the late Irish elections, no fewer than 30,000 soldiers and constabulary were actually on the move from one part of the country to another, as the elections came off at each place.

The whole amount of relief collected in this City for the sufferers by the late fire in Montreal, so far as returns have been made, is $18,685 92.

The Universalists, whose General Convention was held in this city recently, report 1091 societies, 828 churches, and 640 clergymen.

The Board of Health of Charleston reports 13 deaths from yellow fever, for the 24 hours ending Monday, at 10 P. M., and 40 deaths for the week. Of the 40 deaths, only 8 were natives, the rest were Germans, French, English, and Irish, principally the latter. Dr. Dawson, the City Register, appends a note to the report, published in the morning papers, stating that he had seen letters from a physician of high standing in Savannah, who says therein, that he has never known so much sickness in Savannah as now exists there, that the cases are ten to one more numerous than have occurred within his experience, and that he has had a patient who died with black vomit.

A Lancaster, Pa., paper says the celebrated aëronaut, John Wise, has recently made his one hundredth and fifth ascension at Cleveland, Ohio, during the State Agricultural Fair. He is now preparing his mammoth balloon, Hercules, for the purpose of testing the practicability of an aërial voyage across the Atlantic. Several gentlemen of New York and Philadelphia have raised the sum of $1,000 to defray the expenses of an experimental trip from St. Louis to Philadelphia or New York. The voyage, it is said, can be accomplished in 15 hours. It will soon be attempted.

Five young girls recently entered the baths on the Rhine, at Cologne. They were heard laughing and talking in the bathing room which they occupied, when suddenly the noise ceased. The master of the establishment, feeling somewhat alarmed, opened the door, and found that the flooring had given way, and that the whole party had fallen through into the river and been carried away by the stream.

The Troy Budget says that three men, named Peter Woodbeck, Martin Coons, and a Mr. Keach, were committed to the county jail on Friday afternoon, on warrants issued from our Justices' Court against them, on charge of being participants in the late outrage at the house of Hiram Shaw, Esq., of Berlin. They are all young men. The former—Woodbeck—is brother to the person whom Shaw shot during the perpetation of the outrage.

A negro woman belonging to Geo. M. Garrison, of Polk Co., killed four of her children by cutting their throats while they were asleep, on Thursday night, the 2d inst., and then put an end to her own existence by cutting her throat. Her master knows of no cause for the horrid act, unles it be that she heard him speak of selling her and two of her children and keeping the others.

The N. Y. Tribune of Sept. 24th says: Yesterday we announced the death of Rev. Dr. Milledoler, one of the oldest and most highly esteemed clergymen of our City. This morning we are called upon to record the death of his estimable widow, who followed him within 2[illegible]rs. "United in their lives, in death th[illegible] not divided."

A dispatch from Quebec, dated Sept. 22, says: Last night the Legislature passed an address to the Queen, thanking her for the protection of the fisheries—and hoping that no treaty will be made impairing that of 1818, without embracing the whole commercial intercourse of the Colonies and the United States.

The decease of John Vanderlyn, the eminent American artist, took place on Thursday night, at Kingston, Ulster Co., at a ripe and venerable old age. He was born in that town in October, 1776, and consequently, if he had lived a week or two longer, would have completed his seventy-sixth year.

We learn from the Troy Times that a Mrs. Margaret Ford, 79 years old, was burned to death on Saturday. She resided two miles from Troy, near the line of the town of Brunswick. It is supposed that her clothes caught fire from her pipe. She was alone in the house at the time.

Amadee Valle, Esq., of St. Louis, recently received information that nine negro men, who had been at work in his mines in St. Genevieve County, ran off and crossed the river to Illinois. At Sparta the citizens made an effort to arrest them, but the negroes fled to the woods. It is thought they were persuaded off, and assisted in their flight, by whites, who accompanied them.

The September term of the Court of Oyer and Terminer, of Westchester County Circuit, was commenced at White Plains on Monday last, before Justice Parker. A letter from Havana says: "That you may not be mistaken with regard to our new Captain-General, I inform you of the fact that about 500 negroes, from Africa, have been landed at Ortigosa, in this island, and two ounces ($34) per head were paid for winking at the business."

Counterfeit two dollar notes of the City Bank of Hartford, Ct., are in circulation. The genuine notes of that denomination have a centre view of the Hartford Athenæum upon them. The spurious have not.

It is now determined that the Japanese expedition shall consist of three superior war steamers, viz: The U. S. steamer Mississippi, Capt. Long, which will leave New York from the 1st to the 10th of November; the U. S. steamship Princeton, Commodore Perry, which will accompany the Mississippi as flag-ship, and is now at Baltimore receiving her boilers. The third steamer is the Allegany, which is now undergoing repairs at the Gosport navy yard, and will sail in January.

Nine deaths have occurred in Chambersburg, Pa., of malignant cholera, from the 7th to the 14th inst. The Whig says it seized its victims, in some instances, without even the usual premonitory symptoms, and ran its fatal course with great rapidity. There were several new cases on Tuesday. The epidemic has invariably been aggravated by sudden changes in the atmosphere, of whatever nature.

A dispatch dated Boston, Saturday, Sept. 25, 1852 says: The house of the Mayor of Lynn—a friend of the Maine Liquor Law—was entered this morning very early, by several rowdies, who defaced the exterior, and soiled two carpets with blacking &c. They effected their entrance by breaking a window.

A family in Canton has engaged to have a set of blocks cut for a new edition of the national historians of China, a series of classical works called the Twenty-four Histories, which will involve an outlay of $100,000. It is done to show their regard for letters, rather than with the hope of gain.

Some days since, the topmasts of the schooner Merchant were found sticking above the surface of Lake Superior, the vessel lying in thirty feet water. Five years ago she left Sault Ste. Marie, with fifteen persons on board and $5,000 in specie; all went down in a gale, and nothing had been heard of the vessel till so discovered.

On the 21st of September, the U. S. ship Vincennes, commanded by Wm. L. Hudson, arrived at New York from Valparaiso, which port she left sixty-seven days before. The Vincennes doubled Cape Horn fifteen days after leaving Valparaiso. She has sailed 65,000 miles, and been in port thirty-two times, during her cruise of three years.

A sale of a portion of the personal property of the late Hon. The sale took place under the direction of his executors.

DIED,

At Unadilla Forks, Otsego County, N. Y., Thursday, Sept. 16th, after a most distressing illness of about four months, Mr. Jacob West, formerly from Cumberland County, New Jersey, in the 64th year of his age. In this sad event his wife has been called to mourn the loss of a beloved and affectionate companion; and one son and two daughters have been bereft of a kind and affectionate father. In his protracted sickness, although his bodily sufferings were great, his mind was composed and happy. He felt that he was prepared to die. He rejoiced in view of death, as he believed it to be a passport to the haven of eternal rest, where he would meet his Saviour, and those saints who had gone before, to sing the praises of his Redeemer forever. His exhortation to his children and friends was to be faithful, and prepare to meet him in heaven. He conversed familiarly of scenes before him, and to his relatives he said, Weep not for me; I am going to a holier and happier clime, where pain and sorrow never enter. He took no nourishment, except cold water, for the last fifteen days before his death. A few hours before his death, he wished to be raised in bed, after which he did not speak so as to be distinctly understood; but seemed to bid an affectionate farewell to his friends, and patiently waited his time. His departure for the spirit land was like the dying away of gentle zephyrs, or the summer sun, when

> "No lowering clouds obscure the sky,
> Nor ruffling tempest blows."

His funeral obsequies were performed on Saturday, the 18th, when an appropriate discourse was delivered by the Rev. Mr. Cutler, from Romans 1: 16—"I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ,"—words which were selected by the deceased a few weeks before his death. L. S.

In Hopkinton, R. I., Sept. 9, 1852, Mr. Paris Eldridge, in the 58th year of his age. The deceased was a Christian, and for a number of years before his death he embraced the Bible Sabbath, and continued conscientiously to observe it until called to exchange worlds. The cause of his last illness and death was the bursting of a mill-stone while in motion, carrying him with a part of the stone through the end of the mill (which was stone) some distance, bruising him severely. He lived and suffered much pain for about six weeks, which he bore in meekness, and died resigned to the will of God. H. C.

In Scott, Cortland County, N. Y., August 28th, Beriah L. Babcock, aged 48 years, leaving a widow and one daughter to mourn, but not as those that have no hope. It is not a year since the typhus fever removed from this truly afflicted family two lovely daughters, who had grown to womanhood. Surely, in the most of life we are in death. The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord.

Miscellaneous.

The Old Apple Tree.

BY GRACE GARLAND.

That old apple tree, I love it well,
Better, far better, than tongue can tell;
I have watched its growth, beheld its decay,
Sat under its boughs in childish play;
Gathered its fruit in happiest glee—
Ah! I ne'er can forget that old apple tree!

At the noon-tide hour I have sought its shade,
Secure from the sun, and lazily laid
Myself on the moss that so kindly spread
A pillow to rest my weary head,
In dreamy visions again to see
My aged friend, that old apple tree.

Childhood is gone, and time flies apace,
Yet I cherish it still 'mid life's weary race;
'Tis hastening forward to Nature's tomb—
I behold its decay with feelings of gloom;
Under its shade may my resting place be—
Part me not from my friend, that old apple tree.

Barnum's Rules for Success in Business.

From Freedley's "Practical Treatise on Business."

EDWIN T. FREEDLEY, ESQ.:

Dear Sir,—I can scarcely expect to offer any thing new on the subject proposed, but will name a few rules that I am convinced, from experience and observation, must be observed in order to insure success in business.

1st. Select the KIND of business that suits your natural inclinations and temperament. Some men are naturally mechanics; others have a strong aversion to any thing like machinery and so on; one man has a natural taste for one occupation in life, and another for another. "I am glad we do not all feel and think alike," said Dick Homespun, "for if we did, every body would think my gal, Sukey Snipes, the sweetest creature in all creation, and they would all be trying to court her at once."

I never could succeed as a merchant. I have tried it unsuccessfully several times. I never could be content with a fixed salary, for mine is a purely speculative disposition, while others are just the reverse, and therefore all should be careful to select those occupations that suit them best.

2d. Let your pledged word ever be sacred. Never promise to do a thing without performing it with the most rigid promptness. Nothing is more valuable to a man in business than the name of always doing as he agrees, and that to the moment. A strict adherence to this rule gives a man the command of half the spare funds within the range of his acquaintance, and always encircles him with a host of friends, who may be depended upon in almost any conceivable emergency.

3d. Whatever you do, do with all your might. Work at it, if necessary, early and late, in season and out of season, not leaving a stone unturned, and never deferring for a single hour that which can just as well be done now. The old proverb is full of truth and meaning, "Whatever is worth doing at all, is worth doing well." Many a man acquires a fortune by doing his business thoroughly, while his neighbor remains poor for life, because he only half does his business. Ambition, energy, industry and perseverance are indispensable requisites for success in business.

4th. Sobriety. Use no description of intoxicating drinks. As no man can succeed in business unless he has a brain to enable him to lay his plans, and reason to guide him in their execution, so, no matter how bountifully a man may be blessed with intelligence, if his brain is muddled, and his judgment warped by intoxicating drinks, it is imposible for him to carry on business successfully. How many good opportunities have passed, never to return, while a man was sipping a "social glass" with his friend! How many a foolish bargain has been made under the influence of the nervine, which temporarily makes its victim so rich! How many important chances have been put off until to-morrow, and thence forever, because the wine-cup has thrown the system into a state of lassitude, neutralizing the energies so essential to success in business. The use of intoxicating drinks as a beverage is as much an infatuation as is the smoking of opium by the Chinese, and the former is quite as destructive to the success of the business man as the latter.

5th. Let hope predominate, but be not too visionary. Many persons are always kept poor because they are too visionary. Every project looks to them like certain success, and therefore they keep changing from one business to another, always in hot water, and always "under the harrow." The plan of "counting the chickens before they are hatched," is an error of ancient date, but it does not seen to improve by age.

6th. Do not scatter your powers. Engage in one kind of business only, and stick to it faithfully until you succeed, or until you conclude to abandon it. A constant hammering on one nail will generally drive it home at last, so that it can be clinched. When a man's undivided attention is centered on one object, his mind will continually be suggesting improvements of value, which would escape him if his brain were occupied by a dozen different subjects at once. Many a fortune has slipped through men's fingers by engaging in too many occupations at once.

7th. Engage proper employees. Never employ a man of bad habits, when one whose habits are good can be found to fill his situation. I have generally been extremely fortunate in having faithful and competent persons to fill the responsible situations in my business, and a man can scarcely be too grateful for such a blessing. When you find a man unfit to fill his station, either from incapacity or peculiarity of character or disposition, dispense with his services, and do not drag out a miserable existence in the vain attempt to change his nature. It is utterly impossible to do so. "You cannot make a silk purse," &c. He has been created for some other sphere; let him find and fill it.

8th. Advertise your business. Do not hide your light under a bushel. Whatever your occupation or calling may be, if it needs support from the public, advertise it thoroughly and efficiently, in some shape or other, that will arrest public attention. I freely confess that what success I have had in life may fairly be attributed more to the public press than to nearly all other causes combined. There may possibly be occupations that do not require advertising, but I cannot well conceive what they are. * * * * *

9th. Avoid extravagance; and always live considerably within your income, if you can do so without absolute starvation! It needs no prophet to tell us that those who live fully up to their means, without any thought of a reverse in life, can never attain a pecuniary independence. * * * * *

Men and women, accustomed to gratify every whim and caprice, will find it hard at first to cut down their various unnecessary expenses, and will feel it a great self-denial to live in a smaller house than they have been accustomed to, with less expensive furniture, less company, less costly clothing, a less number of balls, parties, theater-goings, carriage-ridings, pleasure excursions, cigar-smokings, liquor-drinkings, &c., &c., &c.; but, after all, if they will try the plan of laying by a "nest-egg," or, in other words, a small sum of money, after paying all expenses, they will be surprised at the pleasure to be derived from constantly adding to their little "pile," as well as from all the economical habits which follow in the pursuit of this peculiar pleasure. The old suit of clothes, and the old bonnet and dress, will answer for another season; the Croton or spring water will taste better than champagne; a brisk walk will prove more exhilarating than a ride in the finest coach; a social family chat, an evening's reading in the family-circle, or an hour's play of "hunt the slipper," and "blind man's buff," will be far more pleasant than a fifty or a five hundred dollar party, when the reflection on the difference in cost is indulged in, by those who begin to know the pleasures of saving.

Thousands of men are kept poor, and tens of thousands are made so after they have acquired quite sufficient to support them well through life, in consequence of laying their plans of living on too expensive a platform. Some families in this country expend $20,000 per annum, and some much more, and would scarcely know how to live on a smaller sum. Prosperity is a more severe ordeal than adversity, especially sudden prosperity. "Easy come, easy go," is an old and true proverb. Pride, when permitted full sway, is the great undying canker-worm which gnaws the very vitals of a man's worldly possessions, let them be small or great, hundreds or millions. Many persons, as they begin to prosper, immediately commence expending for luxuries, until in a short time their expenses swallow up their income, and they become ruined in their ridiculous attempts to keep up appearances, and make a "sensation."

I know a gentleman of fortune, who says that, when he first began to prosper, his wife would have a new and elegant sofa. "That sofa," he says, "cost me thirty thousand dollars!" The riddle is thus explained: When the sofa reached the house, it was found necessary to get chairs "to match," then sideboards, carpets, and tables, "to correspond" with them, and so on through the entire stock of furniture, when at last it was found that the house itself was quite too small and old-fashioned for the furniture, and a new one was built "to correspond" with the sofa and et ceteras; "Thus," added my friend, "running up an outlay of $30,000, caused by that single sofa, and saddling on me, in the shape of servants, equipage, and the necessary expenses attendant on keeping up a fine 'establishment,' a yearly outlay of eleven thousand dollars, and a tight pinch at that; whereas, ten years ago, we lived with much more real comfort, because with much less care, on as many hundreds. The truth is," he continued, "that sofa would have brought me to inevitable bankruptcy, had not a most unexampled tide of prosperity kept me above it."

10th. Do not depend upon others. Your success must depend upon your own individual exertions. Trust not to the assistance of friends, but learn that every man must be the architect of his own fortune; and with proper attention to the foregoing rules, and such observations as a man of sense will pick up in his own experience, the road to competence will not, I think, usually be found a difficult one.

BRIDGEPORT, Conn., June 28, 1852.

A Suicide with a Moral.

The Philadelphia papers tell of the suicide of a young man named John S. Davis, at the West Jersey Ferry Company's wharf, on Monday, the 16th ult. Among other letters found on his table, was one assigning reasons for the commission of the fatal act, of a character so different from that which ordinarily characterizes this species of literature, that it is worth while copying it:

"It will be charged upon me by paragraph-mongers, that 'mental aberration, caused by pecuniary difficulties,' has led me to the act whose consequences are now visible. 'Love,' 'domestic affliction,' or any but the true cause, will be assigned. To refute all such charges, and to set at rest forever all speculations on the subject, I write these lines.

"I have passed my life in the search after happiness. Like other men, I have tried and exhausted all the springs of action; ambition, friendship, love, have all moved me in their turn, but they have not brought happiness.

"Mine has indeed been a 'battle of life.' And as I have kept my post upon its field, I have beheld all that makes life happy pass forever away. Projects of fame have failed, friends have fallen from my side, the love of my youth has turned to gall in my breast, the wife of my bosom has deserted and denied me, wealth has slipped from my grasp—all has proved but a dreary blank. And now at the end of strife, I stand alone upon the plain, my dead hopes strewn around in mockery, and nothing in the future but despair and death.

"Why it has been thus with me—why I have not enjoyed the happiness that other men have revelled in around me, I stop not now to inquire. Suffice it that I have not. As many another, many a better, and many a wiser man has found it less terrible to meet death than to brave the scorning finger of the world and to endure the gnawings of his own bitter thoughts, so I; and from a life of care and trouble, and more sorrow than my poor nature can bear, I turn to the quiet and silence of death. And what comes after? Eternity! dark, blank, mysterious and unfathomed eternity! In a single hour I shall have solved its mystery.

"To those who will be wronged by my voluntary exit from the stage of life, I have only to say that I have endeavored to act honorably and justly towards them all—to wrong no man—to do entirely unto others that which I would have others do unto me. I have set before me the words of the poet—

> "'Thou jewel, Reputation!
> Let me secure thee, bright and spotless now,
> And this weak care-worn body's dissolution
> Will cheaply pay the purchase.'

"I have labored for a name white as mountain snow, dazzling, and speckless; but the failure of the hopes I had built upon has come upon me too crushingly to be survived. If I could have lived, I should have redeemed my honor as it now stands pledged to them; as it is, they must only pity and forgive, while they condemn me."

The unhappy author of these lines was evidently a man of education and intelligence, in the worldly acceptation of the term; but, alas! it is no less evident that he lacked that kind of knowledge which alone enables suffering humanity to fight and win the "battle of life." Had he been blessed with something of Christian fortitude, he never could have sunk into the coward's grave, the grave of the suicide. The air of Athiesm or Infidelity pervades his letter from beginning to end; and that spirit of despondency which it conjures up in seasons of misfortune, to frighten its victims into eternity, is painfully prominent throughout. Hope, Patience, Contentment, Resignation, are weapons only the Christian can command in like seasons of trial. [N. Y. Express.

What Every Farmer may Have.

Every farmer may, if he will, have a house, a neat, tasteful structure, adorning his farm, and contributing to his comfort. There is, on every farm, if one could but find it, a fit site for a house, with grounds near it suitable for a garden and out-buildings.

What a pity such locations should not be selected, instead of the sorry places where too many farm houses are placed! We have seen a house standing on a ledge of rocks, and a recess for a garden excavated in a bank in the rear, when, not forty rods distant, a most inviting spot for building was neglected; and another stuck down on a low swampy piece of land, with planks running to the road as a means of access, when on the opposite side of the road, a gentle eminence, crowned with noble forest trees, was occupied by cattle.

As to the houses themselves, much might be said. Generally speaking, they seem to be a product of the farm; that is, a thrifty, well cultivated farm, has a snug dwelling on it, and a slovenly, ill-tilled one has an overgrown or decaying tenement.

A correct taste in building is not, and cannot be, in the possession of every one. Architecture is a science, and taste is the result of cultivation, and none but men educated to their profession, should undertake to design and build a house.

It is true, that so many sticks of timber, boards, nails, shingles, will make a building, and so too, a given quantity of iron, steel, and brass, will make a steam engine, but a novice makes a failure when he undertakes to construct either. Still, a little attention, the perusal of a work on this subject, might form some taste, and substitute tolerable dwellings for the ungainly structures that so often are seen.

Every farmer may, if he will, have a garden, not a patch of onions here, of beets there, of cabbages some where else, interspersed with bean poles and potatoes, but a veritable garden, a cultivated place.

A farm that has not a plot of ground adapted to the purposes of a garden, had better be abandoned at once. There is no good reason why the real luxuries that spring from the soil, under the culture of the practical gardener, sould be confined to the lands of the gentleman of leisure, They belong as legitimately to the sturdy, hard-working farmer, and indeed more so; for he who labors most actively, should reap the richest harvest. All that serves to make life more desirable, that tends to the improvement of the soil, the mind, and the heart, is not beneath the attention of man. We cannot conceive of a more fit place to commence the careful cultivation of a farm, than the garden. It would soon be evident that the greater care bestowed on the soil, the greater its product, and so a system of culture would by degrees be adopted, till the whole farm should become a fruitful field.

In the cultivation of a garden, can be noted, on a small scale, all the phenomena of growth, and from data there gathered, one can advance successfully from the tilling of narrow beds to that of broad acres. The knowledge necessary to success in gardening, is rather the result of experience, than of fixed rules. There is requisite a taste for the art, close observation, and a modicum of practical skill; give these, and common sense will supply the deficit. We would not by any means profess to teach gardening "in six easy lessons," but we assert that any one so disposed can make a beginning.

There are certain adj[illegible] to a garden, which a majority of far[illegible] who take the trouble to cultivate a few esculent roots, seem to think altogether too trifling to merit their attention. Such are beds of flowers, flowering shrubs, and grape and other vines. That ever potent argument of expense, and the ready excuse of poverty, cannot be urged against these decorations of the farmer's home. A man may be too poor to erect a costly cottage, but no one is too poor to cultivate a bed of flowers, to plant shubbery around his humble dwelling, or to train a vine to relieve its bare exterior. A beauty unattained by any triumph of art, is thus in the reach of the most obscure. Nature waits to provide, "without money and without price," the ornaments of a cultivated field, and the pleasure of a cultivated mind.

Contrast, for one moment, the cottage and the lawn, with the rude dwelling and its unkept grounds—compare the beauty and fragrance of flowers, with the unsightly weed and its rank odor—mark the difference between the luxuriant green of shrubbery, and vacancy of barren yards, and then decide whether an hour of time can be better spent than in effecting such a change.

The past few years have wrought a manifest improvement in matters of rural taste, but as yet its evidences are confined to cottages and farm-houses, scattered here and there, like oases in the wide desert. It will be seen, however, that as agriculture advances, and system takes the place of confusion, all these things will receive the attention that they so richly deserve. [Albany Cultivator.

A Crucifixion.

Bonn is a pretty little German city of some 13,000 inhabitants, beautifully situated on the banks of the Rhine, twenty miles above Cologne. It is the seat of a Prussian University, which annually counts more or less of the scions of princely houses among its students. Prince Albert was educated there, and the son of the heir apparent of the Prussian throne was lately recorded on the Pedell's books. There are two faculties of Theology connected with the institution, totally distinct from each other—the Protestant and the Catholic faculties. Since the revolutionary movements of 1848–9, the severity of the Governments having driven the people from politics, their excitement is forced into other channels, and has taken, to a great extent, a religious form. Enormous masses of people are to be met with in summer, in long processions, under the guidance of clergymen, bound to the hundred holy places, where are carefully preserved the wonder-working relics of canonized Saints, long since moldering in their coffins. Very naturally, this excitement is in some cases carried to great extremes, and we translate from the Westfalische Zeitung a remarkable instance of this character, which lately occurred near Bonn, in the beginning of August last:

"A young theological student of this place (Bonn) went out to Godesberg, (a village some four miles south of Bonn,) taking with him four nails eight inches long, a hammer, and a file. Having dined at the Hotel Bitsner, he walked out into a neighboring grove, sought out a tree, which bore some resemblance to a cross, and crucified himself upon it. First he nailed his feet fast to the tree, driving each nail four inches into the wood. He then, after driving a nail into a branch on the right, and filing its outer extremity sharp, nailed his left hand to the opposite branch. Having thus fastened both feet and his left hand to his cross, he struck his right upon the sharpened nail. The first attempt appears to have been unsuccessful, as his hand was sadly torn. Whether, overcome by pain, he now called for assistance, or that people by chance passed by, it matters not; he was soon after found, fainted away, hanging from the nails. As, however, those who found him had no tools to draw the nails from the tree, they cut it down and carried it into the village of Godesberg. Here he was separated from his cross, put on board a steamboat, brought back to Bonn, and placed in the hospital, where he lies in a fair way of recovery. The writer gives the physician who attended him as his authority, and adds that the facts are well known throughout the city."

Gigantic Telescope in England.

The necessary imperfections of, and the difficulties attendant upon huge reflecting Telescopes like those constructed by Herschell and Lord Rosse, has led to an attempt to construct an achromatic instrument which shall rival those gigantic instruments in power. The new Telescope, constructed for Rev. Mr Craig, Vicar of Leamington, under the superintendence of Mr. W. Gravatt, F. R. S., is placed upon a site of two acres, on Wandsworth Common, presented for the purpose by the Earl of Spencer in perpetuity, or so long as the instrument shall be maintained.

The central tower, consisting of brick, is 64 feet in hight, 15 feet in diameter, and weighs 220 tuns. Every precaution has been taken in the construction of this building, to prevent the slightest vibration; but, if any disappointment in this respect should arise, additional weight can be obtained by loading the several floors, and the most perfect steadiness will be thus insured. By the side of this sustaining tower hangs the Telescope. The length of the main tube, which is shaped somewhat like a cigar, is 76 feet, but with an eyepiece at the narrow end, and a dewcap at the other, the total length in use will be 85 feet. The design of the dewcap is to prevent obstruction by the condensation of moisture, which takes place during the night, when the instrument is most in use. Its exterior is of bright metal, the interior is painted black. The focal distance will vary from 76 to 85 feet. The tube at its greatest circumference measures 13 feet, and this part is about 24 feet from the object-glass.

The determination of this point was the result of repeated experiments and minute and careful calculations. It was essential to the object in view that there should not be the slightest vibration in the instrument. Mr. Gravatt, reasoning from analogy, applied the principle of harmonic progression to the perfecting of an instrument for extending the range of vision, and thus aiding astronomic research. By his improvements, the vibration at one end of the tube is neutralized by that at the other, and the result is that the utmost steadiness and precision is attained. The object-glasses are of English construction. The making of the large flint glass was entrusted to Mr. Chance, of Birmingham, who at first hesitated to manufacture one larger than nine inches in diameter. Upon being urged, however, by Mr. Craig, he has succeeded in producing one 24 inches—perfectly clear, and homogeneous in structure.

Beside this, there is a second, of plate-glass, of the same dimensions, cast by the Thames Plate Glass Company, either of which the observer may use at his option. The manner in which these object-glasses are fitted into the tube is a marvel of artistic invention. By means of twelve screws, numbered according to the hours of the day, they can be set in an instant to any angle the observer may require, by his merely calling out the number of the screw to be touched. The object-glasses also move round in grooves to wherever it may be considered that a more distinct view can be gained. The tube rests upon a light wooden frame work, with iron wheels attached, and is fitted to a circular iron railway at a distance of fifty-two feet from the center of the tower. The chain by which it is lowered is capable of sustaining a weight of thirteen tuns, though the weight of the tube is only three. Notwithstanding the immense size of the instrument, the machinery is such that it can move either in azimuth, or up to an altitude of eighty degrees, with as much ease and rapidity as an ordinary telescope, and from the nature of the mechanical arrangements, with far greater certainty as to results. The slightest force applied to the wheel on the iron rail, causes the instrument to move horizontally round the central tower, while a wheel at the right hand of the observer, by a beautiful adaptation of mechanical powers, enables him to elevate or depress the object-glass with the greatest precision and facility. So easy, in fact, is the control over the instrument in this respect, that a very slight touch on the wheel lifts ten cwt.

With respect to the magnifying power of this novel instrument, it is only necessary to state that, though the focus is not so sharp as it will be shortly, it has already separated the nebulæ in the same way as Lord Rosse's. It has also separated some of the double stars in the Great Bear, and shown distinctly a clear distance of 50 or 60 degrees between them, with several other stars occupying the intervening space. Ordinary readers will better understand the extraordinary magnifying power of the telescope when we inform them that by it a quarter-inch letter can be read at the distance of half a mile.

The preparations for this really national work have been progressing for the last two years, under the superintendence of Mr. Gravatt as engineer and mathematician, but it is only about three months since the superstructure at Wandsworth Common was commenced, and it is already near completion. We understand that the Observatory is likely to be endowed by its liberal and enlightened creator. Lord Rosse has visited the Observatory, and expressed his admiration of this novel and interesting invention.

Apples for Hogs.

One of our most valuable exchanges has the experience of Robert Tyton, of Westmoreland, Pa., detailed at length, in regard to the value of apples for hogs.

"After an experience of several years, I have come to the conclusion that, although apples possess fattening qualities, they do not possess them in a sufficient degree to warrant the assertion that alone, they can be used with success in fattening hogs. Hogs will some times thrive well upon them, and at other times will lose flesh if confined to them exclusively as food.

Three years since, having an abundant crop, I concluded to test their value as food in various ways. First, I tried them in their natural state, as they came from the orchard. For a short time the hogs devoured them greedily, but did not thrive.

I next threw them into the hogsheads in which my slops are kept, permitting them to remain there for several days before using; by which time many of them (especially those partly decayed when thrown in) were well saturated with the slop-water. They were then fed; but the hogs did not thrive any better than before the apples were given them. I then erected a temporary boiler in which the apples were placed, mixed with about one-half the quantity of corn meal I usually fed the hogs. The whole was then boiled until the apples were soft enough to be broken by stirring—they being of the sour kind. This mixture was then fed in the same quantity as the meal mixture alone had been formerly. On this food the hogs grew larger and fatter, observing which, I persevered in it until killing time, when I found them in quite as good condition, I think, as I could have had them by feeding them in the usual way. By this plan I saved one-half my corn meal at the expense of the wood necessary to boil the apples. Whether any thing was saved by the experiment, I am not prepared to say, as I kept no account of the wood burned.

From the above experiment, I am inclined to believe that apples, in their natural or raw state, do not possess sufficient nutrition to fatten swine; but if steamed or boiled, and mixed with meal, they may be used to advantage, provided wood is not too high in price."

A New Hampshire Belle.

A correspondent of the Journal gives the following description of a New Hampshire Belle, Miss Rosina Delight Richardson, of East Alstead, whom he visited during a recent visit to the Granite State:—

"She is nineteen years of age, is 5 feet 3¼ inches in height, measures 5 feet 4¼ inches around the waist, (6 feet 2 inches around the hips,) 22 inches around the arm above the elbow, 14 inches around the arm below the elbow, and 2 feet 10 inches in a straight line across the shoulders. At birth she weighed 6 pounds, at 5 years 148 lbs., at 10 years 268 lbs., at 15 years 365 lbs., and now, at 19 years of age, she weighs 478 lbs. On estimating the quantity of cloth in her clothing when dressed for a ride on a winter's day, we found it to contain 98½ yards of ¾ yard wide cloth. She has brown hair, dark blue eyes, is of fair complexion, and has what phrenologists would call a well balanced head, the perceptive organs predominating. She can knit, spin, weave, make a shirt, or a batch of bread, is a good singer, and plays the piano with taste and skill, is considered one of the best scholars in the town where she resides, is courteous and affable, and lively in conversation, and evinces a general knowledge which might raise a blush on the cheek of some of our city belles."

TOMATOES FOR WINTER USE.—"Take the largest ripe tomatoes, which wash and drain; cut them across and lay them with the cut side up in an earthen or wooden vessel; sprinkle well with fine salt, and with alternate layers of tomatoes and salt; fill your vessel, and let it stand all night. In the morning, pour off the juice, with as many seeds as possible, and throw it away. Put them over the fire, boil slowly until reduced to a pulp, which rub through a sieve, to get rid of the skins. Add to this pulp cayenne pepper enough to season it highly, and if necessary, more salt; boil slowly for two hours, or until quite thick; stir well to prevent burning. When cold, put into shallow earthen plates to dry in the sun, or a slow oven. When quite dry, put it into glass jars, and if kept in a dry place, where it will be free from mold, it will be as good at the end of the year, as when first made. A piece half an inch thick and three inches square, will season a gallon of soup. If wanted for sauce, soak it in warm water, and butter rubbed with crumbs of bread or flour, and stew for a few minutes before serving it."

OLD FASHION.—It is a curious fact, worth mentioning, that among the relics of art disinterred by Layard from the ruins of Nineveh, may be seen various ornamental devices exactly like some of the fashions of our own day. Among the rings and bracelets, for instance, of which Layard made excellent drawings, may be seen patterns which look as if manufactured from the designs of London and Paris jewelers of the present day. In one of the engravings of Layard's researches, we have a drawing of a horseman with his riding whip, the handle of which is a gazelle's foot, exactly like the present fashion as it is frequently seen in the finish of hunting whips. Verily, there is nothing new under the sun, telegraphs and steam engines excepted.

By a decision of one of the French courts, the owner of a dog, who, in an attack of hydrophobia, had bitten and caused the death of another party, in consequence of a neglect of the established police regulations, was mulcted in damages to the amount of 20,000 francs, payable to the wife and children of the deceased.

The cholera is spreading along the Mississippi River. It is also reported that two persons had died at Mifflin, Pa., of the same disease.

In no Catholic country on the globe can a Catholic laborer get as good treatment and as fair wages as he can in any Protestant country. A most weighty fact is his.

Within the last three years and a half, ending on the 12th inst., there have been 2,279 persons killed and 773 injured by accidents in British mines.

A fire in Parkersville, Mo., destroyed property to the value of $40,000 on the 26th August.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

THE TRACT SOCIETY'S ANNIVERSARY.

Opening Address of the President, N. V. Hull.

Beloved associates and fellow-laborors in the cause of Sabbath Reform:—

It may be due to ourselves, to the cause in which we are engaged, and to those whom we would interest and benefit, to answer the question, "Is there a sufficient cause for this outlay of money and labor?" If a good and sufficient answer to this question cannot be given, we are in duty bound to withdraw our labor from this field, and bestow it upon one more worthy. To furnish an answer to that question is my present object. I therefore invite your attention to a few principles which are vital to the question.

1. We affirm, that religion is essential in order to man's well-being in this life, as well as in that which is to come. Man is a compound being. He has a moral as well as a physical and an intellectual nature, and it is as essential that his moral constitution should be developed, as that his physical and intellectual natures should be, and even more so. The man whose physical constitution is undeveloped, deformed, and sickly, is a burden. He whose intellectual constitution is uncultivated and weak, is an object of pity and commiseration. But he whose moral constitution is neglected, uncultivated, and absurd, is not only a burden and an object of pity, but is also an unmitigated curse. Indeed, the true idea of manhood is not there; he is a mockery. But the attempt to cultivate man's moral nature, without religion and its services, would be like attempting to cultivate his physical nature without giving him a due amount of food and suitable bodily exercise; or, like an attempt to develop his intelligence without requiring its healthful and necessary exercise upon suitable themes of thought. Indeed, are we saying too much when we affirm, that without religion man is unfitted for the due and satisfactory performance of any duty, either public, private, or personal, or for the highest enjoyment of which he is capable? We think not. When we labor, then, for the development of man's moral nature, we are rendering him the highest possible service of which we are capable.

2. The second principle is, that the Sabbatic Institution is strictly religious in its nature, and therefore an essential element of religion. Now, the idea that the Sabbath is to be observed by simply ceasing from labor, is incorrect. I am aware that to sabbatize we must cease from our labor. But to say, therefore, that resting is sabbatizing, is simply ridiculous. Resting is a necessary condition of Sabbath observance. The institution, in its literal character, is in part founded upon this idea, as in this respect it is the opposite of labor. But this is rather the body of the institution—not its spirit. We may rest, then, without really sabbatizing, as one may say his prayers without really praying.

A reference to the commandment designating and enforcing the Sabbath, will set this matter right at once. Ex. 20 : 8—"Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," &c. The qualifying term "holy" teaches us, that to sabbatize "according to the commandment," our rest must be a religious one. The duty enjoined, therefore, is not simply a political or civil one, but a religious one.

Further, we are not simply to be religious in a general sense of the term; but, so far as the one idea of Sabbath observance is concerned, it is to be definite, conformed in its nature to the character and objects of the institution itself. To sabbatize with the same feelings and objects that one would receive the ordinance of baptism or the Lord's Supper, would be erroneous altogether, for the reason, that they differ in their objects. The religious idea of the Sabbath is fundamental—the first idea of all religion, that from which every other sentiment flows, an index pointing to the great Creator through his works. It gives us the highest possible view of the ETERNAL, his wisdom, power, and goodness. And universal history teaches us this important lesson, that the loss of the true knowledge of God and of the proper observance of the Sabbath, have gone hand in hand. We therefore affirm, that if the Sabbath be observed in its spirit and intent, it will prove a sure defense against all those great and heaven-daring apostasies which have characterized the history of our race, and so often invoked the hottest wrath of Almighty God! Is it not, then, a matter of infinite moment, that this institution be exhumed and restored to the church and the world, and that its observance be enforced by all of those exalted and God-honoring influences and considerations, which Heaven has thrown around it.

But the objector may reply, "I acknowledge the obligation of the Sabbath, and feel its importance as much as you." This statement we readily admit, when made by a certain class of religionists, so far as the general principle is concerned, the language being interpreted according to the popular sentiment in regard to the institution; but the statement cannot be truthfully made, if it be interpreted by the Holy Scriptures.

For a better understanding of this question, we proceed to make the following statement and classification of this subject. There are three general opinions that may be proper for us to notice.

1. A very large number of the Protestant communion, with the Roman Catholic Church at large, believe the Sabbath of the fourth commandment to be abolished; and they regard the popularly observed day as a festival only, and not as a Sabbath. We may safely say, that that portion of the Protestant Church already mentioned have their sentiments fairly represented by the late Dr. Neander, when he says, in his "History of the Christian Religion and Church during the first three centuries," translated from the German by Henry John Rose, B. D., page 186: "The festival of Sunday, like all other festivals, was always only a human ordinance; and it was far from the intention of the apostles to establish a divine command in this respect; far from them, and the early apostolical church, to transfer the laws of the Sabbath to Sunday. Perhaps, at the close of the second century a false application of this kind began to take place. Men appear by that time to have considered laboring on Sunday as a sin."

Two things in this quotation are worthy of special attention; and these are, first, that Sunday is only a festival, and that of human and not Divine appointment; and second, that it is a false application of law, to charge that it is sinful to do ordinary labor on Sunday. In proof of the truth of the Doctor's statement, we might quote extensively from the most reliable sources; but as his statement has not been attacked directly by any one, so far as I know, whose attack would be worthy of notice, we will omit the labor.

In regard to the Roman Catholics, it is known by every one at all acquainted with the subject, that they make no other pretension than that the change was made by "The Church," and they charge it upon Protestants as one of their inconsistencies, that after professing to take the Bible, "without note or comment," as their "rule of faith and practice," they should observe an institution of such importance, having no other authority for it than that just cited.

2. Another though smaller branch of the Christian Church, hold to the perpetuity of the Sabbath law, but argue that a change has been made in regard to the particular day to be observed, and that that change was made by Christ and his apostles. But it should be observed, that when the proof is called for, the argument is conducted upon principles so similar to the one used in the case of the sentiment before described, that a confusion at once arises in the minds of those who attempt to follow them through from their premises to their conclusions. Let us see: They first give us their Protestant creed, "The Bible, and the Bible only, is the religion of Protestants;" or, "The Bible, without note or comment, as a rule of faith and practice." Now for the application of this "rule." First, the confession is made, that the Bible says nothing directly on the subject of a change of the Sabbath. But then, say they, certain statements are made in the Old Testament, which intimate that a change would be made in the days of the Messiah. Ask for one of these statements, one as much to the point as any they have, and perhaps they will give you Isaiah 65: 17—"For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth; and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind!" There is your "intimation" of a change of the Sabbath. But now we come to the change itself; and this, we are told, we are to learn from inference; and when we ask for one of the strongest passages in the New Testament showing that the Sabbath has been changed, perhaps we are referred to Acts 20 : 7—"And upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached unto them, ready to depart on the morrow; and continued his speech until midnight." Or, it may be that Rev. 1 : 10 will be cited—"I was in the spirit on the Lord's day." And then, as if confident of their failure, they flee to the "Fathers." And now, to carry out their principles, "the Bible without note or comment," "the Bible only," they proceed, and perhaps, as their strongest passage, they will give you saint Ignatius to the Magnesians, about the year 100; and, that I may not be charged with unfairness, I will quote from the "Sabbath Manual," where the author, puts these words into the mouth of Ignatius: "'Let us (Christians) no more sabbatize,' he says—that is, keep the seventh day, as the Jews did, 'but let us keep the Lord's day,'" &c. But now let us see for one moment what this learned Doctor has done; and that we be not tedious, we will state one fact, and that is, that in the most authentic Greek copy of Ignatius, no such statement as the above occurs at all. The Greek word translated day is not in the text; and the best that can be done in the translation of the phrase is to make it read, "Let us live according to the Lord's life," &c. Thus ends the "Bible and the Bible only" doctrine of a change of the Sabbath, as held by that class of Christians whose sentiments we have just noticed! Verily, "consistency, thou art a jewel."

3. The third class of opinions is that represented by this Society, and contained in the following language of Holy Writ: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates. For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it."

Now, one thing is certain, and that is, that all of the above sentiments cannot be true. They oppose each other, and if either one of them is according to the word of God, the other two cannot be. And as the Sabbath institution is one of so general importance, exerting such an unbounded influence upon all the interests of this life, as well as of that life which is to come; and as those interests cannot be promoted, except as true notions are entertained by us on this question, does not the world's good require that he that hath light shall let it shine? I put the question soberly to all: Could a greater good to the church and the world be produced by a reform in any one department than by a reform such as we propose? Let us for one moment consider this point.

1. What a breach in the church of Christ would be healed! And who can calculate the strength, the joy and peace, that this would cause?

2. With how much more efficiency could Protestantism attack Romanism! Oh, what power it would wrest from Rome, and what strength it would impart to the Reformation!

3. How it would increase the church's spirituality, by giving her clearer views of gospel truth and Christian duty.

4. It would mightily increase the power of the church in the performance of her mission, the world's conversion.

The importance of the subject, then, I trust, will be admitted, at least by many. But there are some, I doubt not, who will affect to despise this labor, upon the ground of "liberal principles." This class of men dispose of every mooted question by pronouncing, with an air of mingled indifference, self-complacency, and affected wisdom, that it is "unimportant." So of this question. "What's the difference in days?" say they; "just as if one day was more holy than another." Our answer to such men is, "Your philosophy charges God with folly. He has made a difference in days, not that one portion of time is unholy, and another the opposite, and therefore holy; but while some days are by Divine appointment devoted especially to services which regard our temporal necessities, he has also devoted by Divine appointment one day in each week to religious services, besides giving the day in itself a religious character, and in this sense making it a "holy day."

But these remarks have already occupied more time then I intended, and I will close by saying, that after years of reflection, I arrive at the conclusion, that the field of labor assigned to this Society is second to none among the many that occupy the public mind at the present period; and I sincerely pray, that it may become still more vigorous, and enlarge the field of operations, feeling that, with faith in God, it is pledged for life to the work assigned it.

THE JEWISH NATION.

Our race can look back upon no event in its history more profoundly interesting than that declaration of Jehovah to Abraham, "In thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed." Time might have hurried on, and millions sunk into the depths of hopeless woe, and none been justified nor saved, had not our Heavenly Parent made a channel of communication though which to pour the truth out on the world. The Jewish nation was the grand medium which received and transmitted the oracles of God.

Early chosen for this purpose, their experience has been the most varied and instructive. We may well ask, What condition of life have they not experienced? While all the heathen tribes around were sunken in the most degrading and abominable idolatry, the Jews knew and worshiped the God of their fathers. We must pass over the galling servitude in Egypt, marked as it was by the awful demonstrations of God's retribution upon the haughty tyrant who dared assert a right to the bodies and souls of his fellow men; the passage of the Red Sea, when its sandy depths were trodden with impunity, while watery bulwarks, just ready to dash upon the hosts of Pharoah, and bury them in unutterable confusion, guarded either side with majestic sublimity; the long and perilous wanderings over the burning sands of the desert, when the Flaming Presence, scattering the gloom of night, assured them of their course, and the cloudy vesture of the dread I AM led them on by day; the thunderings of Sinai, when the great Moral Constitution of the world was spoken with such emphasis as to cause old earth to shake and tremble to its center, and man and beast to flee the terrible presence of Him who spake out of the midst of thick darkness. We cannot, in this connection, speak of valiant Joshua, who fought for Israel the battles of the Lord. Let Jordon's pebbly bed, revealed by her receding waves, and the toppling walls of Jericho, bear witness to his divine acceptance. Nor of the glorious deeds of Shamgar, Gideon, and Samson. The whole history of the Jewish Nation is replete with examples of illustrious men; and almost every brook, and hill, and valley of their Palestine is endeared to memory, as the residence of holy men of old, to whom we are indebted for the sublimest declarations of truth, and the most rapturous prophetic visions, reaching down even to the end of time, and the consummation of all things. To the Jews we are indebted for the holy principles of that Book which has gone forth to Christianize and enlighten the world, and to the influence of those principles we owe all that social and domestic order and happiness which to-day distinguish us from the Hottentot, or the untutored savage roaming our western wilds.

It is true, that this ancient people of God have experienced their national calamities, as well as prosperities. Indeed, the whole dealings of the Lord with them may serve as a grand example of what treatment we may expect from the Judge of All the Earth. When yielding obedience to the mandates of Heaven, and trusting divine protection, the richest prosperity attended them; but when self-confident or disobedient, sure destruction followed in their train. On the one hand, they rose to national wealth and greatness during the successive reigns of David and Solomon, so that the queen of Sheba, when brought into the presence of the king, fainting at the sight of so much splendor and magnificence, declared that the half had never been told her. On the other hand, for wicked misrule and heinous idolatry, they were delivered into the hands Nebuchadnezzar, and the streams of Babylon listened to their mournful wail, and their silent harps were hung upon the willows while they refused to sing one of Zion's songs. Although the Jewish nation was frequently almost blotted out on account of its grievous offences, still a remnant was preserved; and, when the time had fully come, the Messiah appeared on earth as the grand consummation of that system of Divine Truth which is destined to save the world. And here it becomes us to remember, that the Gospel was first given by David's Royal Son to the Jews, and written by inspired Jews for our salvation. How true that declaration of our Saviour, "For salvation is of the Jews."

We turn for a moment to the present. Go where we may, on both continents, from tropic suns to polar snows, every where we find the despised and outcast Jew; and although every circumstance has been the most unfavorable possible for him to preserve an existence distinct from the rest of mankind, yet he has strangely maintained his identity, and we find him a Jew still. It seems as though God is preserving His ancient people for some more glorious destiny; for, notwithstanding they have been persecuted from city to city, and wronged and outraged by almost every nation, Christian as well as heathen, yet, contrary to analogy, when the entire tendency has been to their extermination, we find them somehow wonderfully preserved.

We say, contrary to all analogy; for where are the contemporaneous nations? We look in vain for a living representative of the Mother of the Arts and Sciences. Where now are the proud Pharoahs, with their numerous hosts? Nought but the faintest outlines of their existence can be traced; and these a Champollion must with difficulty decipher from crumbling pyramids and obelisks and ruins—the only relics of a mighty nation. Where are the Syrians and Assyrians, the Persians and Medo-Persians—

> "The haughty priest, the Chaldee sage,
> The slave, the gemmed and glittering page?"

All, all, have passed away, nor left one trace behind. Nebuchadnezzar and Cyrus, Darius and Ahasuerus, Saleucas and Antiochus Epiphanes, who swore to abolish the Jewish religion, and extinguish their nation, and who erected a statue of Jupiter Olympius in the temple of the Lord—these too have sunk into merited oblivion, and long since the mammoth idol has crumbled to dust. But their despised subjects and slaves still live to remember their wrongs and triumph over the destruction of their oppressors. Or, if we examine more recent nations, the Sarmaritans and Thracians, the Greeks and Romans, are nations known only in history, and by their imperishable literature and monuments of art. Again, if we trace our own descent, or that of our European brethren, a few centuries ago we were all mingled and confused and lost among the savage northern hordes that overran Europe. But the Jewish Nation stands out upon the broad and stormy ocean of Time, like a mighty rock, whose bosom has received unscathed the dashing waves of four thousand years, and sternly bids defiance to the raging elements. And shall we doubt the veracity of God's Word, when we have these living witnesses in every city and nation, who have come down to us from Abraham and Isaac and Jacob? Let sceptics and infidels forever close their mouths in the presence of such indubitable evidence of the truthfulness of Divine revelation. TACITUS.

EXAMPLES OF BIBLE READING.

Many of the anecdotes compressed within the following paragraph, it is easy to verify; and every reader will acknowledge the value of the lesson which they are intended to teach. Remarkable as some of them are, not one approaches what is related and earnestly believed in the East, of a famous Mohammedan, namely, that during his confinement in in the prison of Bagdad, where he died, he read over the Koran seven thousand times!

That we may see—says Dr. Plumer—what can be done in becoming acquainted with the Bible, let us look at a few facts. Eusebius tells us of one who had his eyes burnt out in the Diocletian persecution, and who repeated in a public assembly the very words of Scripture with as much accuracy as if he had been reading them. Jerome says of Nepotian, that by reading and meditation he had made his soul a library of Christ. Theodosius the younger was so familiar with the word of God, that he made it a subject of conversation with the old bishops, as if he had been one of them. Augustine says that after his conversion he ceased to relish even Cicero, his former favorite author, and that the Scriptures were his pure delight. Tertullian spent a large portion of his time in reading the Scriptures, and committed large portions of them to memory. In his youth, Beza learned all Paul's Epistles in Greek so thoroughly, that, when he was eighty years old, he could repeat them in that language. Cranmer is said to have been able to repeat the New Testament from memory. Luther was one of the most indefatigable students of the Bible that the world has ever seen. Ridley said, "The walls and trees of my orchard, could they speak, would bear witness that there I learned by heart almost all the Epistles; of which study, although in time a greater part was lost, yet the sweet savor thereof, I trust, I shall carry with me to heaven." Sir John Hartop, a man of many cares, made the book of God so much his study, that it lay before him night and day. A French nobleman used to read three chapters of the Bible every day on his bended knees, with his head uncovered. Joshua Barnes is said to have read a small pocket Bible a hundred and twenty times over. Roger Cotton read the Bible through twelve times a year. William Romaine studied nothing but the Bible for the last thirty or forty years of his life. John Boyse, one of the translators of our Bible, had read all the Scriptures before he was five years old; his mother read them through twelve times. I have read of more than one, of whom it was said, that if the Bible had been lost, the whole might have been recovered from them.

SELF-KNOWLEDGE.

It is not what my hands have done
That weighs my spirit down,
That casts a shadow o'er the sun,
And over earth a frown;
It is not any heinous guilt,
Or vice by men abhorred,
For fair the fame that I have built,
A fair life's just reward:
And men would wonder, if they knew
How sad I feel with sins so few.

Alas! they only see a part,
When thus they judge the whole;
They cannot penetrate the heart,
They cannot read the soul.
But I survey myself within,
And mournfully I feel
How deep the principle of sin
Its root may there conceal,
And spread its poison through the frame,
Without a deed that men can blame.

They judge by actions which they see
Brought out before the sun;
But conscience brings reproach to me
For what I've left undone;
For opportunities of good
In folly thrown away;
For hours misspent in solitude,
Forgetfulness to pray,
And thousand more omitted things,
Whose memory fills my breast with stings.

And therefore is my heart oppressed
With thoughtfulness and gloom;
Nor can it hope for perfect rest
Till I escape this doom.
Help me, thou Merciful and Just,
This fearful doom to fly!
Thou art my strength, my hope, my trust;
Oh, help me, lest I die!
And let my full obedience prove
The perfect power of faith and love. [Rel. Mag.

LETTER FROM OREGON.

The following letter from C. P. Crandall, of Oregon, to F. C. Davis, of Leonardsville, N. Y., contains information of interest to all, and especially to those who contemplate a removal to the shores of the Pacific.

DEAR SIR:

Your inquiries concerning certain matters in Oregon, reached me a short time since; and now that I am prepared to answer them, I will do so in as satisfactory a manner as possible.

When you ask if such and such branches of business are good, you ask a question very difficult to answer; for at one time a certain branch may be quite profitable, and within a few months become an actual expense to the tradesman, so uncertain are all business matters in Oregon. However, I will say this much in regard to your first query; there are only two or three tanning establishments in Oregon, so far as I have been able to learn; and owing to the high prices of labor, they are able to do but a limited business, with no more than fair profits. Leather can be shipped from the States and sold cheaper than it can be manufactured here, unless one could carry on the buisness without the necessity of hiring labor. I am told that fir bark makes a very good substitute for hemlock, of which last there is but very little in the Willamette Valley. Fir is the principal timber of the country. Of oak there is considerable in some parts of the upper Willamette Valley, but it is scarce in the middle and lower sections. Hides can be obtained, only in small quantities, at from $2,00 to $3,00. I am told that an inferior quality of lime is found near the mouth of the Columbia River; but of its extent or cost I know nothing. Ashes are generally substituted for lime. In regard to music, I can say but little; for, aside from camp-meeting singing and shouting, I have heard but very little music since my arrival in Oregon. I am, however, of the opinion, that very few instruments would find purchasers. Cabinet-making will illustrate what I said at first in regard to the uncertainty of things. Two years ago, and even one year ago, it was an exceedingly profitable buisness, and it would have remained so had the gold mines of Oregon held out as valuable as at first supposed. Our people are beginning to learn a lesson of economy, the consequence of their own prodigality in prosperous times, as a matter of course. Money matters are becoming somewhat tight, and no class are feeling its effects at this time more than cabinet-makers, and such classes of mechanics as are least actually needed. Of fruit, there is no small quantity growing in Oregon, and there is perhaps as great a variety as in any of the Western States. There are plenty of crab-apples growing wild.

Having now answered your questions, I will venture a remark or two concerning the proposed colonization of Seventh-day Baptists in Oregon. You require, I presume, a vacant tract of country, of sufficient extent to allow a concentration of all your members; otherwise colonization for you could have no advantages. That vacancy cannot be found in the Willamette Valley, nor indeed anywhere south of the Columbia River. People of the States seem perversely obstinate in the belief, that Oregon is boundless in extent, good qualities, rich resources, agricultural facilities, &c., ad infinitum. That portion of Oregon, which has set the Western States agog, is no more nor less than a strip of land less than 200 miles in length, and averaging perhaps 50 or 60 in breadth, lying between the Cascade Range on the east and the Coast Range of mountains on the west. But few claims can now be obtained in this valley, as you may readily suppose, from the fact that the greater part of 20,000 inhabitants are already in it. From this you will see, that you must look to some other portion of Oregon for a place in which to colonize. I have thought much upon this matter, from the fact that my father, and a number of my friends, are about to become members of this country; and in casting about for a situation such as you must require, I can see, or learn of none, unless it be the country about Puget's Sound. A lengthy letter, lately received from Mr. H. R. Stillman, from Olympia, on Puget's Sound, gives much information that may be valuable to your society, a part of which I will transcribe. He says:—

"This country had been highly recommended, and I took the trouble to come and see for myself; and after traveling considerable, am satisfied that it is fully able to sustain its good reputation. There are many fine prairies, interspersed with the most beautiful groves of fir and cedar, together with excellent water running in clear and tranquil streams, with occasional ripples. There are no canyons to prevent easy access and departure. There is an excellent tract of land on and about the Cowlitz, the Chehalis, Bafan, and Noodcan Rivers—surface generally level, sail as good as in any part of Oregon or the Western States. This section has been almost entirely overlooked, and in consequence there are excellent chances to secure desirable locations."

In regard to facilities for marketing, he says:—

"Chehalis is navigable for large vessels forty-five miles from the mouth to the head of tide water; then for 45 or 50 miles farther for small boats, drawing from 24 to 30 inches water. Extensive bodies of coal have lately been discovered on the Cowlitz, and a steamboat is in process of building to run on the river. The prairies are free from fern, the pest of farmers in this valley."

I would add, You will find Oregon very different, in almost every respect, from any part of the States, and very many, no doubt, will be much disappointed upon their arrival. But a year's residence here will satisfy any unprejudiced man, that Oregon is emphatically a good country, when all circumstances are considered.

Several individuals have written to Mr. Coon and myself, making inquiries similar to yours; and I will suggest, that you will do us both a favor by publishing all or such parts of this communication as you may deem advisable, and thus saving us the trouble of replying to each one. Yours, &c.

DR. CHALMERS.

In Dr. Hanna's volumes, Chalmers is portrayed at full length. After the good example of Plutarch, the biographer has thought it quite consistent with his dignity to follow his hero into private, and to exhibit the man as clearly as the minister or the professor. By such details biography is distinguished from her graver historical sister; and it is no prurient curiosity, but an honorable affection, that prompts our desire to know the daily life of one whose deeds or writings we admire and love. To Dr. Hanna we are indebted for many such personal traits. We see Chalmers wandering abroad at daybreak in quest of a wild flower for a lady's cabinet; springing delighted from his chair, with a characteristic "ha, ha!"—falling out of a lively conversation into fits of silent abstraction; flinging his clenched fist from the pulpit in the face of those who "flounced in the robes of magistracy;" vociferous in his loyalty at George IV.'s visit to Edinburgh. We are not surprised to find a brother minister declaring that "much learning has made Chalmers mad." We can well understand how a friend felt his conversation to be "a tonic for the faint, and a crutch for the lame." We comprehend how he himself at one time thought military engineering his natural vocation; at another, deemed "the prosperous management of human nature the noblest exercise of human power." If we examine his style, we may trace the impetuous fervor of his spirit in the not unfrequent turgidity of his periods. But we must conclude: In his eulogy upon Dr. Andrew Thompson, Chalmers unconsciously pronounced his own. By temperament open, genial and enthusiastic, he flung love around him wherever he went, beside his own hearth and in the general world, in the scholastic class-room and in the pauper's cottage. Logical and precise in intellect, always haunted by his early fondness for mathematics, he preferred the facts of science to the theories of philosophy—the truths of morality to the subtleties of metaphysics—the idea of Christianity to the dogmas of theology. Severely conscientious, strong of will, and dauntless in resolution, he never recoiled from any labor, never swerved from any course which his mind determined and his soul adopted, never thought of the end where the first step was clear. Indignation at wrong might sometimes fan his warmth into passion; his precision might now and then degenerate into pedantry; his faith in induction might make him rely too much upon system; his firmness might occasionally be deemed obstinate or overbearing. But such excesses were, in truth, the overflowings of virtues. Emphatically, Thomas Chalmers was a man of love and honor. If we are forced to regret some important points in which we differ, we rejoice to believe, with his friend, Andrew Fuller, that those points are outnumbered and outweighed by those in which we agree. THE EXPLODED ROCK.

In blasting for the foundation of the Vermont State-House, a citizen was standing a considerable distance off, and heard the horn as a signal for the blast. Looking with anxious suspense, he saw a rock flying toward him with terrific force. He leaped with all his might. He went several paces from where he had been standing. But he went just far enough to receive the whole force and weight of the rock, and was killed in a moment.

Thou Judge of quick and dead,
Before whose bar severe,
With holy joy or guilty dread,
We all shall soon appear,
Our cautioned souls prepare
For that tremendous day,
And fill us now with watchful care,
And stir us up to pray.

Certain it is, whether we attempt to avoid death or are careless of it, we are all soon to meet it. Go to the west or to the east, to the north or to the south; depend upon it, each step carries us so much nearer to that trying moment. David said, "My times are in thy hand." While your eyes are tracing these lines, death, perhaps, is taking an arrow from its armory for you. How stands your account with God? There is an eternity of joy or woe.

THE MISSIONARY CAUSE.

The Seventh-day Baptist Denomination stands forth as committed to the work of evangelizing the human race. Are there not among us many, who have never seriously reflected upon the position we have taken, the responsibilities which it involves, and the guilt which will lie upon us, in case we draw back, or even do this work of the Lord carelessly? Perhaps there are; but we would cherish the persuasion, on the other hand, that there are those who have looked at the matter in its various bearings, and, having put their hands to the plough, will by no means look back. We would exhort such to awake to new zeal; and if, for the benefit of all, we aim to stir up the mind to a remembrance of those principles which, by the blessing of God, may be the means of stimulating the denomination to fresh ardor in the good cause, it may not be regarded as an unsuitable supplement to the account we have given of our Annual Meeting.

Prominent among the means to be used for compassing the great object of the world's conversion, stands prayer. In view of the greatness of the harvest, we are directed to pray expressly for an increase of laborers; also, to make it our daily petition, that the will of God may be done on earth, as it is in heaven. But if the degree in which Christians have relied upon this instrumentality should be estimated by what has actually been accomplished in the way of furnishing the great field with laborers, and rendering the world obedient to God, either they have been sadly in fault, or the obstacles have been too many, and too great, for even Omnipotence to overcome.

The latter supposition is not to be admitted. The heathen are pledged to Jesus Christ for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession; and God Almighty makes no pledge which he is not able to fulfill. It is as certain that all the ends of the world shall remember and turn to the Lord, as it is that the kingdom is his, and that he is the governor among the nations. Ps. 22: 27, 28. Promises like these are absolute; they cannot fail of fulfillment. And with the same confidence that inspired the royal prophet, we may say, "All nations whom thou hast made shall come and worship before thee, O Lord, and shall glorify thy name;" and, like him, we may rest this confidence upon God's greatness alone, without regard to the number and formidable character of the obstacles to be set aside. Ps. 86: 9, 10.

It will be no breach of charity to say, that, while Christians have prayed for the conversion of the world, they have, in too great a degree, satisfied their consciences with the petition merely. The Scriptures teach, however, that the bare expression of our wishes to the Divine Being is not all that is requisite to prayer. Besides this, there must be an undoubting persuasion that God will perform that which he has spoken, and a corresponding effort, on our own part, to obtain the blessing sought. These are necessary elements in "the effectual fervent prayer of the righteous man." Christians have prayed that all flesh might see the salvation of God, but they have not appeared to feel that, by so praying, they took upon themselves an obligation to labor for the result. But if there is any sin which is especially provoking to the Almighty, it is that of compassing him about with lies; a sin of which we are always guilty, when in prayer we profess the strongest desire for the conversion of the world, while we never prove the sincerity of the profession by active labors for the accomplishment of the object.

It will be seen, therefore, that in urging prayer as prominent among the means to be used for the world's conversion, we insist, not only upon the supplication, but upon all that it implies. We insist upon faith in God's promises. We insist upon active labors in the way of preaching the gospel, giving of our substance, performing deeds of mercy, and the like. And we believe, that such is the effect of fervent prayer upon the suppliant himself, that he will not have persevered in it long without inquiring, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?"

But alas! what will all our efforts result in, if we refuse to pray? Unquestionably, we shall labor in vain. We shall be left to see, that in "going out with ten thousand against him who cometh with twenty thousand," we have only insured our own defeat. The Lord Jesus himself, the greatest of all missionaries, whose life was one continued effort in missionary work, and to whom it was promised that he should see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied, did nevertheless feel the necessity of "offering up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears." He spent whole nights in prayer to God. Has he not herein given us an example, that we should follow in his steps? O what faint conceptions of the heart's depravity do those have, who think that a little moral suasion will suffice to convert it! What an utter want of confidence in the testimony of Scripture, that men are "DEAD in trespasses and sins," do they manifest! They pray not, because they seem not to feel that God only can give life to the dead; or rather, because they do not truly feel that sinners are dead. Of course, we cannot expect such to pray; but if there are among us those who, by the Spirit of Truth, have been taught their own depravity—and we trust there are—of them we expect unceasing supplication to the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, according to the working of his mighty power which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead, he will bring the heathen to know him and believe on his name.

We had written thus far, when the following interesting letter from our sister Carpenter was handed us, which, if it do not contribute something towards stimulating the spirit of prayer and of holy activity among us, will affect the minds of our readers differently from what we think it ought. Read it, and then pray for Nemay and her relatives. T. B. B.

Letter from Mrs. Carpenter.

SHANGHAE, May 21st, 1852.

DEAR BRETHREN,—In the Ninth Annual Report of your Missionary Society, I notice a reference to the case of our dear China friend Nemay, and an apparent desire to know more of her religious state and prospects. She has, since her marriage in February last, visited her old home two or three times, and makes a point to improve such opportunities in giving us a good long visit, as we are not yet permitted to visit her in her new residence. She passed a day with us, not long since, and we endeavored to make the most of the opportunity, by religious conversation, reading the Scriptures, and prayer. I asked her what she wished me to say for her to our American friends. She said, tell them her heart is fixed to worship the God who made all things, and Him only to serve. All this will not be new to you; neither will it be news to hear of the stumbling-block which the reverence of ancestors, as connected with the observance of the fifth commandment, has ever been to her. The duty of going once a year to the tombs, repairing and decorating them, and making offerings to the departed, has in itself so much that is really attractive, that all must concur in the opinion of a late writer in the Chinese Repository, that whoever takes this citadel, does a work for China. Some of the missionaries, alive to all these difficulties, recommend to their converts to be particularly solicitous in their attention to the tombs, in order to give their heathen friends proof that their filial love is not diminished; but to do it at other than the yearly periods, thus doing away with all appearence of worship in the performance. Nemay's arguments are these: "It is from my ancestors that I derived existence, and now shall their spirits behold me unfilial—forgetful of them and unmindful of my duty? Is once a year too much to visit their tombs? I cannot go so far at other times, and alone." It is urged: "By going when others go, and doing as others do, occasion is given to the beholders to say, Nemay worships ancestors." "It is a light thing," she replies, "to be judged of man's judgment; God knows my heart, that I wish to worship Him. I respect ancestors, but do not pray to them. People must think of me as they please." However adequate my own feelings of charity may be, to cover all defects in her Christian character, these are certainly defects, which in the Christian church should not be tolerated; so we must wait until this veil also falls from her eyes, before we can choose to include her in church covenant. I have been thus particular, in order that you may understand fully the case, and know better how to sympathize with us in all our anxieties for these dear objects of our special care. What is to be done? Even missionaries do not scruple to tell the Chinese, that their long and quiet continuance in their own land has been the result of their observance (although ignorantly) of that command which insures this. No wonder, then, if, after hearing this, they should cling more closely than ever to a custom which is as dear to them as life, and with which its best interests seem all interwoven. For myself, I have long thought that all other obstacles in China were as straws compared to this; and it is that which only the strong arm of Omnipotence can reach.

But to return to Nemay. Her sincerity and truthfulness are remarkable. "What do you think of me?" she has repeatedly asked as we have sat in confidential conversation together. I reply, "If your heart is so and so, then I believe this or that," &c. The doubt implied by the "if," always seems to distress her, and she asks, with much feeling, "Do you think I would deceive you?" No, on no account would I do it; I believe our hearts are united in one common purpose, and that in another world we shall not be separated." She tells us, also, that her husband does not oppose her, in her religion, or in keeping the Sabbath—that he wishes and designs to make our acquaintance; but that her father-in-law is exceedingly bitter against all foreigners, and it is on his account she delays inviting us to visit her there. She fears the consequence of such a visit.

Ah-nah has failed much during the past winter, which has been unusually long and severe. She also misses Nemay very much, as there are none left to read to her, or to call her attention to those subjects in which they two, of all that household, have seemed almost exclusively to find pleasure. During my last visit with her, she seemed much depressed; but when once fairly aroused to speak of her religious feelings, her face kindled with its former pleasant smile, and I was again encouraged, even with the slight tokens of returning animation which her awakening spirit seemed to manifest.

Maymay I have not seen since her removal to the house of her future husband. The day of her removal was a solemn one to us both. Her face would swell with emotion, as she looked at me, without uttering more than a sentence or two, but those expressive of deep feeling, as well as of lasting affection. Her present position is that most humiliating one of the unmarried daughter-in-law; which differs but little, as you have heard, from our idea of a slave. I have no knowledge of the place of her residence, and no means of finding it out. Indeed, I suppose it would be considered the hight of impropriety for me to be introduced to her as an acquaintance, before she shall have attained the dignity of wife, and that will not be for the next two or three years, although I expect to see her occasionally in her visits to her former home.

I need not say, that my heart is sad in view of all these recent changes among those I have been deeply interested for, nor how earnestly I desire the fervent intercessions of Christians for these dear friends. I know they are in the hands of One who has said, he will be sought unto to do these things for them. O, for wrestling prayer, for overcoming faith!

Sincerely yours,
L. M. CARPENTER.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Duke of Wellington—The Queen—Parliament and Convocation—Dr. Newman—Ireland.

GLASGOW, September 17, 1852.

The Duke of Wellington died suddenly at Walmer, his summer residence, three days ago, in his 84th year. Regular and temperate in his habits to a remarkable degree, the immediate cause seems to have been an imprudent act of an opposite character. The previous evening he ate a hearty dinner (at fashionable dinner hours) of vension, and shortly after went to bed. In the morning he desired medical attendance. His usual physician when in the country was speedily summoned, and found the Duke suffering severely from indigestion. The medicine administered failed to operate, and epilepsy ensuing, he expired in the afternoon. We know of no evidence of his having been a religious man, in the true sense of the word; but few statesmen have had a more favorable reputation for integrity and general uprightness of purpose, and determination to act upon his conviction of what was right.

The Queen is still in her Highland Home, and if the death of the Duke interfere not with previous arrangements, is to remain there until about the end of next month. The London papers intimate the royal intention to build at Balmoral a new and magnificent Palace. No contradiction has been given to the announcement, while the Queen's predilection for Highland scenery renders it not improbable. The Court Circular, this week, in an announcement of the royal movements, astonished the cockneys, and even the literati of the metropolis, with a phrase in Gaelic—which is left untranslated, to puzzle the wise men of the south.

Shortly after the Queen's return to London, our Parliament is expected to assemble for buisness. At the same time, the Church of England Convocation takes place. At present, and for a long time past, this has been a mere matter of form. The Puseyite and high-church party, however, greatly dissatisfied that the clergy have no real power, not even to determine what is or is not heresy, when they have to deal with men of decision and means to carry an appeal, have elected generally this year those who have avowed themselves favorable to the resuscitation of Convocation in reality. Some effort, or attempt at effort, to do something, is therefore expected; although it is not probable that they will have any success. The State, which gave birth to and has continued to nourish this institution, as useful for its own purposes, is jealous of the aims of that which it created. And if the present Government should prove more willing than some of their predecessors to accede in any degree to these clerical demands the House of Commons is probably much less disposed to sanction such a course than it has formerly been. There are about 36 Dissenters returned to the new Parliament: 2 Baptists, 13 Independents, 9 Unitarians, 4 Free Churchmen, 3 United Presbyterians, 2 Wesleyans, 1 Jew, 1 Friend, 1 Plymouth Brother. All of these will be more disposed to abridge than to extend the power of the Church of England; and in this, at least, in whatever else, they are likely to have the help of the Popish members from Ireland, even although those they are resisting in the case will be principally those most nearly allied in principle to those of their own church.

The French Papists are being called upon to contribute towards the payment of the expense of the trial of Father Newman for libeling Achilli. The Universe, the Parisian organ of the priests, in a long article, urges this strenuously, and in the way of encouragement, it is stated that the convicted slanderous priest has begun to say mass twice a week for his contributors. No great value seems to be set upon his masses, however, for while the expenses are set down at £10,000, only £3,000 (including promises) have hitherto been obtained.

In Ireland, at the time of the elections, the Romish priests were unusually zealous to obtain returns in accordance with their wishes, and even more than usually audacious in the means employed. Two of them, Fathers Burke and Clune, have been arrested and held to bail for stimulating the mob when the soldiers fired upon them. Other priests, accused of promoting murder for their own purposes, are also to be tried. The conspiracy to destroy obnoxious individuals has been widely extended; and the Lord Lieutenant has been constrained to place the barony of Tireragh, in the county Sligo, under the provisions of the Crime and Outrage Act. Unhappy, indeed, is and must be the land which is under the influence of a system which, while professing the name of Christ, has so awfully departed from His spirit, and has so perverted His institutions. Yet so long as Protestants act in any degree on the same principle, we need not expect much amendment on the part of those against whom they protest. Indeed, hope of amendment, except on the part of a few, comparatively, Scripture gives us little warrant to expect. "When the Son of Man cometh, shall He find faith upon the earth?" "Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame."

CONSERVATISM vs. REFORM.

Conservatism is the desire, the effort, of preserving what is established. Reform is the change from worse to better, from bad to good, and always supposes improvement. The result, the effect of conservatism, is permanency—that of reform is progress. Permanency and progress represent two inherent principles or tendencies of the human mind. These two principles, in their practical workings, are often correlative and opposing.

There is ever a tendency in conservatism to immobility, stagnation, and death; there is in reform a tendency to change, innovation. One tends to the preservation of what is already established, however old or dilapidated; the tendency of the other is to tear down or build anew. Conservatism is intent on preserving old discoveries, old organizations, old applications, or methods; reform is intent on making new discoveries, new applications, forming new organizations. The latter likes new wine in new bottles; the former prefers old wine in old bottles—so old, sometimes, that they burst for very rottenness. For one there is nothing so good, so beautiful, as newness; to the other, oldness is the only truly beautiful or good. Conservatism looks to the past as the golden age; reform looks to the future for the unfolding of that age; in both cases, the present is the age of iron. The former is ever crying, "The good time is past;" the latter, "The good time is coming." The one looks to the past for rules, guides, and precedents; the other makes its own precedents. Conservatism is negative and defensive; reform is affirmative and aggressive. Conservatism loves stately systems, synods, councils, and courts—anything that will give centralization and oneness; reform cannot brook ceremonies, complicated systems, or consolidation, but prefers independency, generalization, and diffusion. The former is ever tending to think the thoughts of others, receiving them, not so much from their truthfulness, as because the great and aged thought so. Lutherism, Calvinism, Arminianism, Presbyterianism, Methodism, are received by it as true, not because they are perceived to be truth, but because Luther, Calvin, Arminius, Knox, Wesley, or Edwards, thought their respective doctrines to be truth. Reform receives no truth because it is old, or has the sanction of great names. With it, oldness is no sure mark of respectability—indeed, there is ever a tendency to prefer the glitter and gush of newness, at the expense of old and established truths.

These are the legitimate tendencies of the two principles, acting unrestrained, unmodified by each other, in their ultra developments. But they were never designed thus to act. Their nature, their correlation, is such as to give them, in their appropriate action, a controlling influence over each other. Reform, in its radical or ultra development, often becomes mere innovation or revolution; conservatism, in its ultra development, terminates in immobility. Ultraism is but innovation seeking change, regardless of right or truth; or conservatism, clinging to the ancient, regardless of right or truth. The first and most important questions, in the one case, are, Is it new? how new?—in the other, Is it old? how old? If it is new—very new—it is adopted by the one without farther inquiry; if it is old—very old—it is held on to by the other with undying tenacity. Revolution is but the intensive action of reform or innovation, opposed and repressed by the intensive or ultra action of conservatism.

All true reform, and all true conservatism, terminate in progress. Change should never occur at the expense of right and truth; permanency should never exist at the expense of progress. Progress, rather than change, should be the watchword of reform; progress, rather than stability, immobility, should be the watchword of conservatism. There must be enough of conservatism in all reform to give permanency to right and truth; there must be enough of the reformatory principle in all conservatism to permit the discovery and the reduction to a concrete form of abstract right and truth. A MISSION IN PALESTINE.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Unable to rest, I have risen from my bed to consecrate a few moments, in the stillness of the morning, to the subject which more than any other at the present time interests me; I allude to the mission to Palestine.

In perusing the last two papers, I perceive that no allusion is made to the action of the Missionary Society on that subject. I hope it has not been overlooked from want of interest, when it seems to me that more than ordinary interest should be felt. The providence of God, in my opinion, is pointing out to us the path of duty, as evidently as though God's hand was seen writing it upon the walls of our houses, directing us to improve the first opportunity to act in this matter. We read of the promise of God to Abraham, to give him the land of Canaan for a possession, and we believe it true. We find it fulfilled to his posterity, and we believe it was of God. Our Saviour predicted the dispersion of the people, till the time of the Gentiles should be fulfilled. We have seen it literally accomplished, and we believe we have seen the hand of God in the matter. We read that the people shall be gathered, and the waste places shall be restored, and the sterile soil shall be fertilized; and we admire his glorious purposes revealed, and expect that in due time they will be brought about. But we are infidel to the working of the present time. This is as fatal as any other infidelity, and of the most real and practical kind—the ruin of the world in the flood, and the sin of every age. We felt, years ago, that the set time to favor Zion was at hand, and we were stirred to make an effort to secure the interest of Sabbath-keepers in the conversion of the Jews. But we temporized, and fell back; and now God has commenced without us, and shows us the practicability of the work. He has taken from us the honor, and given it unto a woman, as in the time of Deborah. Nevertheless, we are invited to the work, after the first scene is opened; and we are called upon to come up to the help of the Lord, to rescue the pioneers from falling in the commencement of the battle, and to secure the advantages gained, and save the land from Sabbath desecration, under the hands of Mahomedan Arabs, Roman Catholic Christianity, and Protestant conformity. The valley of Artas is offered, to be secured forever from the desecration of the Sabbath, and to have the living demonstration of Christianity, in its benevolence, continually exhibited before the Jews and Arabs, more convincing, though in the humble labors and charities of a few true-hearted Christians, than by the labors and preaching of Doctors of Divinity without them. And what an ally is this to a Seventh-day Baptist missionary, who should teach from the Bible only. Should not the sum be raised by an immediate contribution from Seventh-day Baptists, and thereby be made a nucleus for future operations? I would be glad to head the subscription with a hundred dollars; but for want thereof, I pray God to accept the purpose of my heart, and dispose those who have, to give, on the condition that it be forever devoted to the churches of Sabbath-keeping Christians; and let it be independent of the missionary organization, but accessible forever to their coöperation. Who will begin the work? J. M.

AGRICULTURAL MISSION IN PALESTINE.

Our readers have been informed, from time to time, of the progress of the enterprise of Mr. Meshullam and the American friends who have volunteered their assistance in the Christian effort among the Jews. That this colony of truly benevolent individuals should be embarrassed with difficulties from the prejudice of Jews and Turks, by whom they are surrounded, is not strange; but that they should receive from Christian (?) hands such unchristian treatment, is passing strange. It will be seen by the following letter, how unscrupulous even Christian missionaries may become, when their less rich and powerful rivals can be made the tools of their own aggrandizement. Let this example be a warning, to put all on their guard against similar imposition from "spiritual wickedness in high places."

It appears that sixty-three Jews had signed a petition, in Hebrew, directed to Mr. Meshullam, expressing their anxiety to participate in his agricultural work. Mr. M. thought proper, before sending it to his friends in America, to get the signatures acknowledged before Mr. Finn, the British Consul. Mr. Finn, discovering the value of the document, contrived to keep it from Mr. M., and to turn it to account for the English Church Mission in Jerusalem. The document was therefore sent by the mail of the 25th of June to England, and letters of subsequent date sent to Meshullam, to keep him easy till the transaction was fully consummated, when a copy of the petition, without signatures, was returned to him. This imposition will not, we are confident, tend to benefit the cause it was designed to favor, but will, we hope, wake up the true friends of Israel among us to greater diligence and zeal. T. B. S.

ARTASS, July 27, 1852.

Dear Brother and Sister in Christ:—

Last evening we received your kind and welcome letters of the 8th of June, and I need not assure you of the joy and thanksgiving of our hearts to God, for the good news of our friends' welfare, and the great and very timely assistance from Christian friends to the suffering Jews, who began almost to despair from deferred hope. We are all in excellent health, except one case of diarrhea now recovering, and are greatly encouraged in our work by the success and fertility of the soil, as our spring and summer crops of corn, sweet and white potatos, tomatos, beets, peas, beans, etc. etc., have been very fine, and we are putting in a second planting. We find, also, that the climate is very delightful, and much more pleasant and cool mornings and evenings than we expected through the whole season thus far, with a constant fresh breeze, and we have suffered very little from heat.

But the last month we have had great reason to rejoice in seeing the work of God rapidly progressing among the Jews. A great interest exists in Jerusalem, among all classes of Jews, respecting agriculture. Many are constantly coming and going from Artass, and appealing in the most affecting manner to live with us and labor on the soil. They come out in little companies of from six to twelve, and spend the night, and tell us their griefs, and we search the gardens for ripe vegetables, give them supper and breakfast, a few paistres, and each a bag of corn, cucumbers, beans, etc., as we have; and it would break your heart to see the quivering lip, and look of despair, and sometimes tears, when from such companies dear brother M. can only select one or two to remain with us, and sends the rest to the city! Many speak German, and through sister Thuler converse with us. Some tell us, that our coming here to reside and befriend them, from such a distant land, has greatly encouraged their hearts; and the blessing on the land, and Bro. M.'s cultivation, altogether, seems a sign to them, that if they would leave off their evil and idle ways, and cultivate this land, and earn their honest bread, their Messiah will soon come. They love us much, and desire to live with us because we keep the Sabbath.

At length, such was their earnestness, that sixty-three Jews drew up a Hebrew petition, written by a rabbi, and sent it out by a delegation of a rabbi's son and five others, entreating, in the most forcible manner, to be taught and superintended by M., their brother; and wishing us to send it to our benevolent friends, to beg them to help them to lease land, and meet the expenses of a large beginning. Also, several other letters in Hebrew, from different Synagogues, one recommending (by a rabbi) seventy-two men as faithful and industrious, and promising to be responsible for them, and giving rabbinical consent. Well, Bro. M. thought it would be best to have their public petitions authenticated before the English Consul; so Albert took the Hebrew document into the city, and Mr. Finn promised to faithfully attest it in the presence of the Jews, and return it to Artass in time for us to send it by the next mail to America. This he delayed several days; and seeing its importance, he consulted the English Mission, and determined to appropriate it to their own plans. Mr. Finn drew up a paper stating Mr. Meshullam's character and agricultural success, (what they never published before,) and that the Jews were now, as never before, desirous to engage with him, but that as he declined the responsibility, they appointed Mr. Finn, Dr. McGowan (the head of the Church Mission Committee,) and, to make it plausible and probable, Dr. Barclay, an American, (whom they assured that Mr. M. desired it,) a Committee of Superintendence over Mr. M., Artass, and the whole work, to receive contributions, etc., and added, that the friendly Americans with Mr. M. consented! This, with a translation of the petition, he sent to England, to be extensively published, and sent back the original to us too late to send by mail.

You may judge what was our surprise and grief at such an unprecedented course. Mr. M. is indignant at this course, and will not consent at this late hour to be compelled to come under their control. But it has delayed and hindered us in presenting the petition to friends in America. He has the mail in his own hands and entire power. The next week he was so offended at M. and us, as he heard of M.'s disapprobation, that he sent out a most insolent official command, as Consul, for M., forbidding him to make any bargain with any person whatever, to lease land, or build any buildings, without his consent, declaring any such action without him null and void! He also sent out a very impertinent letter to dear sister Williams, who had just arrived, as an English subject, commanding her to show her proofs of it in 48 hours, or risk his not protecting her. He received no answer to either of these communications.

But we continue to feel their constant opposition. They strive to alarm Mrs. Meshullam and her sons, that we are selfish persons, and have designs on Mr. M.'s property, and will make great claims upon him, and that he will lose all that he has, and Mrs. M. and her dear babes will come to ruin!—that if Mr. M. should die, we would take possession of his land, and his family would suffer, etc. They also offer him large funds (under their direction) to carry on his great desire for his brethren, and to settle salaries on himself and sons, and make provision for Mrs. M. in case of his death. You may imagine, that in contradistinction with our poverty, and the piercing cries of the poor, how great is his faith in God, and how severe are his trials, in going forward unsustained by sufficient means. Sometimes they threaten, then try to coax, and then discourage his family. But in the straitest moments he has still held fast his integrity. Though his means were running very low, from his constant calls from the Jews, and benevolent hospitality, wages to the poor, etc., and acknowledging that he knew his last paistre must come, unless the Lord should interfere, he determined to stand his ground and struggle on. We continue much in prayer, and encourage him in every way in our power, in our converse. Yesterday I said to him, Wait, and trust in God; wait a little longer; the Lord will surely send us help. Also, sister W. said, The Lord will surely answer prayer; and he, half discouraged, replied, But there is no longer such open interference for his people as in the days of the prophets.

It was the Sabbath, and after encouraging each other's faith, we felt strengthened, although, from the many needs and the great opposition of these rich and determined enemies, my heart's burden had been through the day almost insupportable; when, at sunset, a friendly Christian Israelite came out with a package from dear Hugeno's banking agent in Jerusalem, who is also a converted Israelite, and very friendly. It contained a very kind letter from him, and yours inclosed, and also an order for the whole amount of the different sums you had directed to his care, and a very kind note from Dr. Burgheim, the above banker, for us to come in and receive the money! We were at tea, and all gathered round while I opened and read to them all your kind letters and relations of matters in the United States. Words can scarcely express the joy of all, and we soon retired to give thanks, before family worship, to the Lord for such considerable and timely aid at such a moment of our trial. Though we have difficulties to overcome, and outward opposition, we have many and increasing tokens that the Lord is our helper, and that he has in very deed begun to visit his land and people, and that our poor weak example and work are not in vain, but acceptable in his sight.

This week (the interest still increasing, many Jews having recently arrived,) a number of principal rabbis have petitioned Sir Moses, having a hundred signers to this petition, telling him, that although they were unwilling to work at agriculture as he had proposed to them three years since, that now Mr. M. has so succeeded, and Americans having also come, and settled without danger, and engaged in the same, they are ready and desire him to assist them in extensive operations of the same kind! So, you see, the work is rapidly increasing, and there is every prospect of the land being cultivated. Last week a converted Jew and his wife, who have purchased land near Jaffa, and commenced building, but know nothing of agriculture, came to see us, and entreated that one or two of us would come and join with him, to show him how to plant, etc.; but we had no help to spare. He told us that a rich Jew of Jerusalem had purchased land there also, and we know of one farm owned and worked by the Germans near Jaffa. The Greek Christians have lately purchased many large pieces, and are gathering out the stones, planting trees, and building houses and walls. There is also a report among the Jews, that Rothschild will purchase extensively; and so twenty respectable Jews, mostly rabbis' sons, wish to come here and learn to be superintendents of agriculture for him. So that, if we had many thousands, we could use it in the most judicious way for opening the door for Christian influence among their whole nation in Palestine! O, where are the lovers of Israel now?

INCIDENTS OF TRAVEL.

On my recent trip to our Anniversaries, the car in which I rode part of the way was literally a sort of traveling grog-shop. There were at least two parties that carried their liquor in a bottle, and were seen drinking it frequently, to the very great annoyance of sober travelers. One of the ladies of my party became really sick from the fumes of alcohol which she was compelled constantly to inhale.

"UNCLE TOM'S CABIN" was a subject of remark by a company of southern men. They seemed almost as destitute of intelligence as of religion and morality, often giving the work a coarse euology. One of them closed the criticims by saying, "It is full of Scripture; it has got as much Scripture as the Book of Genesis; give me a 'chaw of tobacco.'" And, as a finale, the whole party drank again from the bottle. On one occasion, the company could not restrain their commendation of the "Maine Law," as a "solitary and alone" man drank the hated beverage.

These incidents I have given as an admonition to the friends of the Maine Law, that their best efforts are needed, "just now," to suppress liquor drinking and liquor traffic.

COMMENCEMENT OF THE SABBATH.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

As the editors of the Advent Review and Sabbath Herald seem to be mistaken in commencing the Sabbath "at six o'clock," would it not be well to examine this subject a little? To say, "the seventh day of the week begins when the sun is an hour and a half high on the sixth day of the week (in long days,) or an hour and a half after sunset (in short days,") would not seem hardly reasonable, unless the Scriptures say so.

God made the sun "to rule the day," Gen. 1:16. "And the evening and the morning were the first day," "the second day," &c. That is, the darkness and the light were reckoned for one day. And God commanded, saying, "From even unto even shall ye celebrate your Sabbaths," Lev. 23:32. And to show when to begin and when to end the Sabbath, we have not only the above command, but the example of the Lord's people. See Neh. 13:19. "And it came to pass, that when the gates of Jerusalem began to be dark before the Sabbath, I command that the gates should be shut, and charged that they should not be opened till after the Sabbath." This was about the time of sunset. It could not have begun to be dark an hour or two before nor after sunset. This, then, is the time to commence the Sabbath, when it begins to be dark, or about the time when the sun is setting at the end of the sixth day of the week. It is so understood to this day, I believe, by that people to whom God "committed the lively oracles to give unto us."

But at what time does the Sabbath end? See Mark 1:21, 32. "And at even, when the sun did set, they brought unto him all that were diseased, and them that were possessed with devils," &c. Here we are expressly told, that the "even" was "when the sun did set;" nothing said about 6 o'clock. Matthew says this was "when even was come." Matt. 8:16. Luke says this was "when the sun was setting." Luke. 4:40. Thus Mark and Luke clearly show, that at the setting of the sun is the time to end the Sabbath.

But if we begin the Sabbath on the sixth day of the week at "six o'clock," an hour and a half before sunset (in long days,) we should not know when to leave off our work in a cloudy day, without any human time-piece to "rule the day." Yet, if we permit the "sun to rule the day," then all the people can know when it begins to be dark, even in a cloudy day, without any human time-piece.

I suppose that, upon a fair examination of this subject, our friends of the Review and Herald would find, in commmencing the Sabbath at six o'clock instead of at sunset, that they keep only a part of the Lord's "holy day," and a part of the Mahomedan sixth-day Sabbath, and a part of the Pope's first-day Sabbath.

B. C.

DEATH OF BISHOP CHASE.

The venerable Philander Chase died at his residence in the State of Illinois on Monday, the 20th ult., from the effect of an injury received some time since by a fall from his carriage. The deceased was Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Illinois, and Senior Bishop of that Church in the United States.

Bishop Chase was born at Cornish, N. H., December 14, 1775, and received his academic education at Dartmouth College, at which institution he graduated with the class of 1795. He was ordained to the ministry in St. George's Church in New York, three years after leaving College, and at once engaged in missionary labor in different parts of the State of New York. In 1805, he went to New Orleans, devoting himself with characteristic zeal to the establishment of the Episcopal Church in that city; and returning to New England in 1811, he was rector of Christ Church in Hartford for six years. Having taken a deep and apostolic interest in the progress of Episcopacy in Ohio, he was consecrated as Bishop of that diocese in 1819. His labors in the cause of education resulted in the erection of Kenyon College, but from a series of embarrassments, he was induced to resign the bishopric of Ohio, and at length took up his residence in Illinois, of which diocese he was elected bishop in 1835. Devoting himself with unabated zeal to the interests of education in the West, he succeeded in establishing another seat of learning, called Jubilee College, at Robin's Nest, in Peoria County. The autobiography of Bishop Chase, published a few years since, is a collection of curious reminiscenses, and throws a rich light, not only on the character of the author, but on the development of Episcopacy in this country. Bishop Chase was a man of indomitable energy, of enthusiastic zeal, and of single-hearted devotion to the welfare of the Episcopal Church. Not without a vein of eccentricity, he was remarkable for his high integrity of purpose, his fervent piety, and the disinterested ardor with which he devoted his powers to the service of his fellowmen. By his decease, the Right Rev. Dr. Brownell becomes the senior Bishop of the Episcopal Church in America.

PROVISIONAL BISHOP ELECTED.—Ever since the suspension of Bishop Onderdonk, in 1846, the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of New York has been without a Bishop, and dependent upon those of other dioceses. At the Annual Conventions in 1850 and 1851, much time was spent in attempts to elect a Provisional Bishop, but without success. Last week another Convention was held, which, after nine ballots, succeeded in electing Rev. Jonathan M. Wainwright, D. D., Provisional Bishop of New York. Dr. Wainwright is the man whose name was for a long time before the public in a controversy with Dr. Potts in regard to the legality and propriety of the office of Bishop. This controversy, which attracted much attention at the time, arose from a remark made by Hon. Rufus Choate at the New England Dinner, to the effect that our Puritan ancestors had formed "A Church without a Bishop, and a State without a King." It is generally believed by the Delegates, that the elevation of Dr. Wainwright to his new office will reünite the various classes which have for a long time existed in this Diocese.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE JERRY RESCUE.—The anniversary of the rescue of the fugitive slave Jerry, at Syracuse, was celebrated in that city on Sixth-day, Oct. 1. Gerrit Smith presided, and some five thousand persons were in attendance. Among the speakers were Messrs. Smith, Garrison, Wheaton, Raymond, May, Lucy Stone, Lucretia Mott, and Capt. Daniel Drayton, the gentleman who was imprisoned five years at Washington for attempting to run off slaves. The resolutions adopted declare that the Fugitive Slave Law is a sham, and that the rescue of Jerry was a rescue from a mob.

THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE.—The Twenty-fifth Annual Fair of the American Institute of the City of New York, opened to the public at Castle Garden on the 5th day of October. The object is to stimulate genius, advance all the useful and ornamental arts, encourage and reward industry, and elevate the condition of the laboring man; in the pursuit of which, efforts have been continued through a period of twenty-five years. These constantly recurring stimulants have exercised an important influence on the progress of the arts and manufactures of our country. The Managers solicit the presence and countenance of the People during the Fair, where they will meet large numbers of the intelligent and patriotic men of our country, whose presence always tends to increase among competitors their ambition to excel. The leading notices in the programme are as follows:—

Oct. 9, Plowing, Testing of Plows, and Spading Match, at Nyack, Rockland County, N. Y. Steamboat leaves the foot of Dey-st at 8 A. M.

Oct. 18, Special Exhibition of Roses and Dahlias.

Oct. 20, 21, 22, Cattle Show at Madison Cottage. Entries can be made on the 18th, 19th and 20th, on the ground, or at any time previous, by addressing A. Chandler, Corresponding Secretary, at No. 351 Broadway.

Oct. 21, Anniversary Address.

MADAME SONTAG'S CONCERTS, at Metropolitan Hall, are probably the most popular entertainments of the kind ever given in New York. They are got up on a scale of surpassing liberality and completeness, with Eckert for conductor, Eisfeldt for leader, and Badiali, Pozzolini, Jael the pianist, and Julien the violinist, among the performers. Of Madame Sontag's style of singing, some idea may be gathered from the following notice, by the musical critic of the Evening Post, of one of the songs sung by her at the first concert:—

"Sontag next gave, with a chorus accompaniment, a tender Swiss air, set for her expressly by Eckert, and, we think, on purpose to show that those remarkable ventriloquial effects which made Jenny Lind's Echo Song so famous, are within reach of any first-class singer. In delicacy, in refinement, in the sweet and simple charms of natural feeling, as well as in the accomplishment of difficulties, it was the gem of the concert, and, in our estimation, greatly surpassed the mountain song of the great Swede. The receding cadences were inexpressibly soft and exquisite, and vanished away like the stars that melt in the sky."

DISCOVERY OF COAL IN ILLINOIS.—We learn from the Kendall County (Ill.) Courier, that a bed of coal has been discovered about five miles south of Oswego. It was struck into by a person engaged in digging a well. The width of the vein has not been ascertained, but it was found to be six feet in thickness, and lies only five feet below the surface. Specimens of it had been tried in Oswego, and pronounced to be a very superior article—equally as good as Pennsylvania coal. Should future explorations prove the existence of any considerable body of coal, of this character, so near Chicago, the importance of the discovery can scarcely be over-estimated.

California News.

By the arrival of the Falcon at New Orleans, and the United States and Prometheus at New York, we have advices from San Francisco to Sept. 1.

The steamship Brother Jonathan, of the Nicaragua line, which was supposed to have been lost, had arrived at Panama, and sailed thence for her destination, on the 10th.

The Falcon reports that the new and splendid steamship Cortes, of Messrs. Davis & Brooks's New York and San Francisco line, had arrived at Panama, from New York, after the rapid passage of sixty-three days from port to port, being the shortest trip on record.

The health of the Isthmus was genetally good, and passengers were arriving and departing without any interruption.

Considerable excitement existed at Panama on account of discoveries of gold upon the Isthmus, and many of the inhabitants had left their homes for the diggings.

The overland emigration continued to arrive in large numbers. Some of the emigrants report the most terrible sufferings, while others have fared well during the entire journey.

The news from California is uninteresting. There have been some few murders and other outrages since the sailing of the last steamer, but as a general thing the state of affairs is far more encouraging. Some serious disturbances have, however, broken out in Contra Costa, which the authorities had taken prompt measures to quell.

The news from the mines is very favorable, and the yield the coming season, it is anticipated, will be immense.

Measures for the independence of Lower California were still in progress.

The notorious Parker H. French was at Durango. He had made a proposition to the Governor to allow him to arm and equip an army of one hundred Seminoles, with which to fight the Apachés, and check them in their murderous and lawless deeds.

Some new and valuable gold discoveries have been made in the east range of the Sierra Nevada.

The California markets were only moderately active, and many descriptions of goods had declined. Several auction sales had been held, at which the prices accepted in a number of instances were below the first cost of the goods in the Atlantic States.

The money market was in a favorable condition, and the receipt of gold dust at San Francisco was on the increase.

From Oregon we learn that owing to the neglect of the farming interests, flour and wheat were on the rise, as were also many other articles of produce.

European News.

By the steamer Canada, we have European dates to Sept. 18th.

The English papers are filled almost exclusively with biographies of His Grace the Duke of Wellington. The Duke died suddenly, from an apoplectic fit, on Tuesday P. M., the 14th, at his seat, Walmer Castle, near Dover. The event has caused the profoundest sensation in England, and the funeral solemnities were to be of a national character.

Mr. Pugin, the celebrated architect, is also dead.

Louis Napoleon was on his tour to the South of France, meeting with enthusiastic receptions.

The threatened difficulty between England and Turkey had been adjusted.

A new palace for the Queen of England is to be built at Balmoral, Scotland, at a cost of £100,000.

During the past year the trade of France with the United States has been—Imports 110,000,000 francs. Exports 145,000,000 francs.

The steamer Sarah Sands was to sail from Liverpool for Australia via Queenstown the day the Canada left, with a full complement of passengers and the mails for the Cape of Good Hope and Australia.

Favorable replies have been received to the circular of the International Cheap Postage Association from the Ministers at London of the United States, Austria, Spain, Brazil, Sardinia, and Portugal.

Letters from Castinia, of the 30th ult., describe the damage done by the eruption of Etna. One stream of lava had flowed toward Zaffaroni, fifteen miles from the crater, and another toward Mila, devastating the vineyards in both directions. Prayers had been offered in all the Churches by way of averting the evil.

The recent high dividend of the Submarine Telegraph Company, has given an impetus to telegraph enterprises, and it has brought Messrs. Harrison's proposal, to unite Europe and America, via Iceland, Greenland, &c., more prominently forward. They have now obtained exclusive right from the Danish Government to Labrador. Stations are proposed to be erected at Kirkwall, Orkney; Lerwick, Shetland; Thors Haven, Faroe Islands; Riekiavik, Iceland; Julians Haab, Greenland; and at one of the most eligible of the English settlements on Labrador coast. Surveys have shown that the bed of the sea is favorable, and the greatest length of submarine wire would not exceed 500 miles.

Four days Later.

The steamer Atlantic, with Liverpool dates to Sept. 22, arrived at New York Oct. 2d.

In England, public attention is still occupied with the Duke of Wellington's death, and with the honors to be paid to his memory. It is officially announced that the obsequies shall be at the cost of the nation, and will probably be according to the programme of the funeral of Nelson.

During the night of Friday, Sept. 17th, the ship Bhurtpore, which sailed from Liverpool the previous day for New Orleans, went ashore on Long Bank, near Wexford, Ireland, and has since gone to pieces. She had on board at the time of the accident 35 crew and 485 Irish emigrants, five of whom were drowned.

Advices from Hong Kong to 23d July, had been received. The rebellion in China was exciting more alarm, the insurgents having appeared in the northern province of Honan, which is a new feature of the affair. Troops had been sent from Canton to oppose them. One of the high Mandarins had been degraded—an indication that the imperial forces had been having the worst of it.

Calcutta papers to Aug. 7, had been received in England. The chief event of importance that had occurred at the seat of war in Burmah, since the departure of the previous mail, was the capture of the town tos Prome, by a fleet of light steamers, under the command of Captain Tariton. The river Irrawaddy, below Prome, divides into two branches, the left channel being defended by two strong forts, and the right unnavigable except during the rainy season. Captain Tarion having been warned by some friendly natives that the left channel was defended, and being favored by the flood, ascended the right branch of the river, and entering the town without resistance, carried off 28 guns. Having no orders to advance, he returned to Rangoon, although there was reason to believe that the fleet could have made its way to Ava, the capital.

Baron Humboldt celebrated his eighty-third birthday on the 14th. The "Nestor of Science" is in excellent health, and is engaged daily for some hours on a fourth volume of the "Cosmos."

The latest reprint of an American book in England, is Richard Hildreth's "White Slave." It is announced as a companion to "Uncle Tom's Cabin," and "The May Flower," by Mrs. Stowe.

The Ministers of France, Netherlands and Turkey, have returned favorable answers to the memorials of the International Cheap Postage Association.

Died, on the 10th, at Brechin, Scotland, Rev. James Somerville, LL. D., late Professor of Theology, King's College, Fredericton, New Brunswick.

The latest reports from the districts of Posen, where cholera prevails, are still very unfavorable.

On the 11th, a woman named Rehe was beheaded at Dresden, for child murder.

The Lockport Journal says an enterprising traveler, last week, being out of funds, and finding it necessary to get from Schenectady to Utica, crawled under one of the cars, hitched himself to the gearing, and, thus suspended, he arrived at the depot in the latter city. A bystander observed our "speculator" unhitch himself, and he presently made his appearance, literally covered with dust and perspiration. Our traveler subsequently resumed his comfortable quarters, and arrived safely at Syracuse.

A mechanic at Boston has hit upon an ingenious mode of nullifying an ordinance of the city, which provides that no sign of any description shall be hung, affixed, or erected, so as to project more than a foot into any one of the narrow streets; but which, by sufferance, admits of the suspension of political flags across the whole street. At the corner of Bedford and Kingston streets, may be seen a great flag, with an inscription like this: "Henry N. Gardner, Painter, Grainer, &c. For President—Daniel Webster."

There are at Gloucester twenty fishing firms, fitting out about three hundred fishing schooners, manned by some three thousand men. Some of these concerns carry on a large business, and at their commodious and spacious wharves manage the fisheries on very extensive scales. Messrs. S. Wonson & Son fit out this year forty-five schooners. This is probably the largest concern engaged in this business in New England.

There is a project on foot to build another railroad along the Hudson River, taking the west bank to Catskill, and then branching off to Schenectady. The rise in property on the east bank of the river, resulting from the building of the Hudson River Railroad, has measurably induced the new project; landholders on the west bank desiring to participate in the rise.

The Erie Road have commenced widening the track of the Ramapo Road, so as to run their wide equipage to Paterson. It is proposed to lay down a third rail on the Paterson, so as to accommodate the Erie equipage, as that of the Paterson, and thus the Erie trains, before winter sets in, could run directly from Dunkirk to Jersey City. If this should be done, it will, we believe, be the only instance in the United States of a track capable of accommodating both narrow and wide guage equipage.

An accident occurred on the Hudson River Railroad, on Thursday night, at Croton, by which two young men lost their lives. They stood on the track looking at the freight train as it was passing, when the express train down from Albany passed the point where they were standing, killing both of them. One of them had his head and feet cut off from his body, and the other was shockingly mangled. They both belonged to Croton, and were named John Tice and Horace Travis.

Died, at this place, on Monday last, says the Grove Hill (Ala.) Herald, Philip, better known es "Old Uncle Phil," aged about 105 years. He was the oldest man, white or black, in this County, and has been a faithful servant. The old man was buried on Tuesday night; a large number of the blacks followed him to the grave. The torch was carried by another venerable black, whose hoary head and unsteady gait betokened that he, too, would soon follow his old associate.

A Southern slaveholder offers to emancipate his slaves, to the number of sixty or seventy, on condition that the Massachusetts Colonization Society will furnish funds to transport them to Liberia. These people could be sold for $30,000 or $40,000, and constitute the bulk of their master's possessions. The Society have pledged, or in the treasury, $1,200, and appeal to the friends of the colored man for $900 in addition, for the above object.

DIED,

On the 11th ult., at the residence of Col. Tuly, Clark Co., Va., Mrs. ELIZABETH BROWN, widow of the late Rev. O. B. Brown, of Washington City. We find in the Baltimore True Union the following delineation of her character, to the truth of which we most heartily subscribe:—

"Mrs. Brown was literally and truly one of 'the excellent of the earth.' In her family, ever kind and hospitable; to the poor, a bountiful benefactor; to the houseless orphan, an unwavering and reliable friend; to the sick, ever a comforter, both of the body and the soul. Among the many kind and beneficent ladies of Washington, few were less ostentatious or more active than Mrs. Brown, in all those works of charity that adorn female character. Many a poor young minister, while pursuing his studies at the Columbian College, has felt the influence of her kindness without ever ascertaining to whom he was indebted for the comforts he enjoyed. She has now passed from the scene of her labors, and has entered into rest, rejoicing in the fullness of that sovereign, unmerited grace, which formed the basis of her hope while on earth."

Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Kite-Flying in China.

All sports that spare the humblest pain,
That neither maim nor kill,
That lead us to the quit field,
Or to the wholesome hill,
Are duties which the pure of heart
Religiously fulfill.

Though some may laugh that full-grown men
May frolic in the wood,
Like children let adrift from school—
Not mine the scornful mood;—
I honor human happiness,
And deem it gratitude.

And though perchance the Cricketer,
Or Chinaman that flies
His dragon-kites with boys and girls,
May seem to some unwise,
I see no folly in their play,
But sense that underlies.

The road of life is hard enough,
Bestrewn with slag and thorn,
I would not mock the simplest joy,
That made it less forlorn,
But fill its evening path with flowers,
As fresh as those of morn.

'Tis something, when the noon has pass'd,
To brave the touch of Time—
And say, "Good friend, thou harm'st me not,
My soul is in its prime—
Thou canst not chill my warmth of heart—
I carol while I climb."

Give us but health and peace of mind,
Whate'er our clime or clan,
We'll take delight in simple things,
Nor deem that sports unman;—
And let the proud, who fly no kites,
Despise us if they can!

The Careless Man.

"Mr. Skimpole had been educated for the medical profession, and had once lived, in his professional capacity, in the household of a German prince. He told us, however, that as he had always been a child in point of weights and measures, and had never known any thing about them, (except that they disgusted him,) he had never been able to prescribe with the requisite accuracy of detail. In fact, he said, he had no head for detail. And he told us, with great humor, that when he was wanted to bleed the prince, or physic any of his people, he was generally found lying on his back in bed, reading the newspaper, or making fancy sketches in pencil, and couldn't come. The prince, at last, objecting to this—'in which,' said Mr. Skimpole, in the frankest manner, 'he was perfectly right'—the engagement terminated; and Mr. Skimpole, having, (as he added with delightful gayety,) nothing to live upon but love, 'fell in love, and married, and surrounded himself with rosy cheeks.' His good friend Jarndyce, and some other of his good friends, then helped him in quicker or slower succession to several opening in life; but to no purpose, for he must confess to two of the oddest infirmities in the world: one was, that he had no idea of money, in consequence of which, he never kept an appointment, never could transact any business, and never knew the value of any thing! Well! so he had got on in life, and here he was! He was very fond of reading the papers, very fond of making fancy sketches with a pencil, very fond of nature, very fond of art. All he asked of society was, to let him live. That wasn't much. His wants were few. Give him the papers, conversation, music, mutton, coffee, landscape, fruit in the season, a few sheets of Bristol Board, and a little claret, and he asked no more. He was a mere child in the world, but he didn't cry for the moon. He said to the world, 'Go your several ways in peace! Wear red coats, blue coats, lawn sleeves, put pens behind your ears, or wear aprons; go after glory, holiness, commerce, trade—any object you prefer; only let Harold Skimpole live!'"

Susceptibility of Animals to Atmospheric Changes.

In the common sensations of life, we perceive a distinction, according as the exciting cause is agreeable or otherwise—whether it presents itself as pleasure or dislike, bodily strength or weakness, activity or fatigue, warm or cold—by pressure or tension of the atmosphere, &c. By these combinations of sensations, all animals in which they are strongly developed are enabled to anticipate atmospherical changes before the most delicate instruments give any indication of them; and, in a minor degree, the same is traceable in persons of great nervous susceptibility. In the animal world it extends not only to creatures of the land and of the air, but also to those which inhabit the water.

The actiniæ throw out their feelers and expand themselves when a continuance of fine weather is to be expected, but withdraw and contract themselves, even in a room, when a change is impending. The mussels, before the approach of a storm, spin several new threads to secure their hold on the rocks; and leeches rise to the surface of the water before rain. Spiders enlarge their webs during fine weather, but spin only short threads, work seldom, or hide themselves in corners, during rain. Many beetles, by their active flight and humming sounds, give tokens of the morrow's brightness. Before rain, bees remain either in their hives or in the neighborhood of them; and ants convey deep into their hills the pupæ which they expose to the sun in fine weather.

The leeches rise anxiously to the surface of the water before a storm, and hence in Germany they are called weather-fish, and are kept in glasses, where, by their uneasy movements, they denote a change twenty-four hours in advance; and, from the same cause, many fish forsake the sea for the rivers; the groundling is roused into activity, the silurus leaves the deep waters, and the eels become lively. If the lightning strikes the water, the perch sickens and dies; the snake and the slow-worm are restless before a storm; toads leave their concealment before rain; ducks are busily active, and swallows fly lower.

Before a storm breaks forth, many birds, such as the cross-bill and plover, are uneasy, and show themselves less; and while many species of water-fowl hurry for shelter to the shore, the petrel, as if rejoicing in the coming conflict of the elements, dashes forth and defies its power. If the atmosphere be lowering in the morning, pigeons feed rapidly, and return to their cots; and the hare hides itself; but the mole comes to the surface of the ground, and the squirrel seeks its nest, and shuts its entrance. This susceptibility of atmospherical changes, influences, also, materially, the natural economy of some animals; the wild rabbit, for instance, which feeds chiefly in the evening or at night, comes forth at noon-day if the weather portends rain, and loses its natural timidity in its eagerness to procure food.

Before the occurrence of an earthquake, animals become uneasy. In that which took place in Calabria in 1783, it was noticed by Bartel, that the sea-fish were disturbed, and were taken in vast numbers; many birds fluttered about distressed in the air; dogs ran about howling; the horses and oxen trembled, pawing the ground and snorting as if in agony; and the cats slunk about with their hair bristled up. Narrow Escape.

Mr. Chas. P. Davis, (son of Capt. Chas. M. Davis, of Portland, Me.,) recently returned from a voyage to the East Indies, met with a most remarkable adventure, while lying in the River Hoogly last fall. He was attached to the ship John Merrick, Capt. Stevens, bound from Calcutta to London. The ship had dropped down the river to a large island not far from its mouth, called Sagua, or Tiger Island—and having been informed that deer were to be found quite numerous on the island, Davis, with the ship's pilot, the skipper of the lighter, one other white man, and four natives, went ashore to hunt for them, each armed with a gun. After a half hour's ramble, they got sight of the heads and antlers of a number of deer, which were feeding on the opposite side of a hollow, behind a thicket or jungle of low brush-wood. Concealed by this jungle, the hunters were creeping stealthily, in single file, towards the game, when Davis was startled by the cry of "tiger, massa," from one of the natives, and turned his head just in time to see the glaring eyes of a monstrous Bengal tiger, that with claws outspread and mouth wide open, was coming down upon him, having made a flying leap from the contiguous jungle. Instantly the jaws of the fierce animal were closed upon his arm, near the shoulder, but fortunately the stock of the gun was taken into its mouth in connection with the arm, whereby the limb was in a measure saved from harm. The huge beast did not stand for trifles, but trotted away with him, gun and all, as easily as a cat would carry off a mouse. Davis grappled the animal's throat with his left hand, but he might as well have seized the gambril of an ox, ~~or an~~ iron bar, for all the harm he could do him; at the same time he shouted lustily for his companions to shoot at the tiger; but fearing the shots might take effect upon himself instead of the beast, they forebore. His own gun, however, proved his salvation; for the barrel, which extended its whole length from one side of the tiger's mouth, occasionally digging into the ground, induced the animal at length to drop him, for the purpose, apparently, of taking a better hold. At this instant, a ball from the well-aimed piece of one of Davis's comrades, struck the tiger, wounding him severely, and, with a roar that made the echoes ring again, he darted into the thicket, and they saw no more of him. Davis's arm was lacerated severely, and it bled profusely.

From the National Intelligencer.

Not far from Breslau, in Silesia, in a domain called the Prairie of Humboldt, there exists two establishments as astonishing for their produce as for their union. One is a manufacture which converts pine leaves into a sort of cotton or wool; the other offers to invalids, as curative baths, the water used in the manufacture of that vegetable wool. Both have been created by Mr. de Pannewitz, inventor of a chemical process, by means of which it is possible to extract from the long and slender leaves of the pine a very fine fitaceous substance, which he has named woody wool, because, like the ordinary wool, it can be curled, felted and woven.

All the acicular leaves of the pine fir, and of the coniferæ in general, are composed of a bundle of fibrillæ, extremely fine and tough, surrounded and held together by a resinous substance under the form of a thin pellicle. When by decoction and the use of certain chemical agents the resinous substance is dissolved, it is easy to separate the fibres, to wash them and free them from all foreign substance. According to the mode of preparation employed, the woolly substance acquires a quality more or less fine, or remains in its coarse state; in the first instance it is used as wadding, in the second to stuff mattresses. If the pine has been preferred to the other kinds of pitch trees, it is on account of the length of its needle-shaped leaves. It is thought that a similar result might be obtained from other trees of the same species.

The tree can be stripped of its leaves when quite young without any injury. The operation takes place when they are still green. A man can gather two hundred pounds of leaves a day.

It was first advantageously substituted for cotton and wool in the manufacture of blankets. The hospital of Vienna bought five hundred, and, after a trial of several years, has adopted them entirely. It has been remarked, among other advantages, that no kind of insects would lodge in the beds, and its aromatic ordor was found agreeable and beneficial. These blankets have since been adopted by the penitentiary of Vienna, the charity hospital of Berlin, the meternity hospital, and the barracks of Breslau.

Its cost is three times less than that of horsehair, and the most experienced upholsterer, when the wool is employed in furniture, could not tell the one from the other.

This article can be spun and woven; resembling the thread of hemp for its strength; it can be made into rugs and horse blankets.

In the preparation of this wool an ethereal oil of a pleasant odor is produced. This oil is at first green; exposed to the rays of the sun, it assumes an orange yellow tint; replaced in the shade, it resumes its former green color; rectified, it becomes colorless. It differs from the essence of turpentine extracted from the same tree. It has been found efficient in rheumatism and gout; also as an anthelmintic, and in certain cutaneous diseases. Distilled, it is used in the preparation of lac of the finest kind. It burns in lamps like olive oil, and dissolves caoutchouc completely in a short time. Perfumers in Paris use it in large quantities.

It is the liquid left by the decoction of the pine leaves which has been so beneficial in the form of bath. The bath establishment is a flourishing one.

The membranous substance, obtained by filtration at the time of the washing of the fibers, is pressed in bricks and dried; it is used as a combustible, and produces, from the resin it contains, a quantity of gas sufficient for the lighting of the factory.

A New Agricultural Machine.

The Albany Argus describes an invention which is designed to supersede the plough, the harrow, the roller, and the man who sows the seed. It says:—

"Yesterday we were shown the model of a new, and what purports to be a valuable, improvement in one of the laborious departments of the agriculturist, and for which the inventor procured a patent in April of the present year. It embodies in one implement the capacity for ploughing with four ploughs, scattering the seed in the furrows, harrowing and rolling. The ploughs are arranged at suitable distances in front of the cart, and the number can be diminished at pleasure, or four used. Immediately following and attached to the ploughs are the buckets for the reception of the seed, corn included, and from which it is distributed. The harrows follow behind the wheels of the cart, and the rollers bring up the rear. On the platform of the cart, and forming a part of it, is a basin of the same width, which is the receptacle of the seed. Its position is immediately over the buckets, and as the cart goes forward, it is so arranged as to allow the seed to fall, in suitable quantities, into the buckets below. The platform is large enough for the driver, and will also accommodate several bags of grain. The harrows are also the width of the cart, in two pieces, as are also the rollers, for more easy passage over the ground. The entire arrangement can be removed with ease, and the cart used in any other capacity about the farm.

The inventor is Mr. Henry Beebe, a young mechanic of Albany. While it appears to be a valuable improvement, and has received the approbation of many distinguished agriculturists, its utility remains to be tested. There is scarcely a doubt, however, that on prairie land it will prove a valuable acquisition to the implements of the farm.

The Mammoth Cave—Its Cost.

In one of Mr. Willis' recent letters to the "Home Journal," we find the following paragraph, relating to the original purchase and the amount paid for the Mammoth Cave in Kentucky:—

"Colonel Croghan, to whose family it belongs, was a resident of Louisville. He went to Europe some twenty years ago, and, as an American, found himself frequently questioned of the wonders of the Mammoth Cave, a place he had never visited, and of which, at home, though living within ninety miles of it, he had heard very little. He went there immediately on his return, and the idea struck him to purchase and make it a family inheritance. In fifteen minutes' bargaining, he bought it for $10,000; though, shortly after, he was offered $100,000 for his purchase. In his will he tied it up in such a way that it must remain in his family for two generations, thus appending its celebrity to his name. There are nineteen hundred acres in the estate—three square miles above ground—though the cave probably runs under the property of a great number of other land owners. For fear of those who might dig down and establish an entrance to the cave on their own property—a man's farm extending up to the zenith and down to the nadir—great vigilance is exercised to prevent such subterranean surveys and measurements as would enable them to sink a shaft with any certainty. The cave extends ten or twelve miles in several directions, and there is probably many a backwoodsman sitting in his log-hut within ten miles of the entrance of the cave, quite unconscious that the most fashionable ladies and gentlemen of Europe and America are walking, without leave, under his corn and potatoes!"

New York Milk.

Very few persons have any adequate idea of the manner in which New York is supplied with milk. All know, that great quantities are daily brought into the city over the Hudson River and Harlem Railroads, and the knowledge of this fact is generally quite sufficient to banish suspicion that the article furnished for our tables comes from any other quarter. One thing is true, however; that two distillery establishments alone, one of which is in New York, and one in Williamsburgh, furnish daily for consumption between 6,000 and 7,000 gallons, or near 30,000 quarts. The former contains 1,300 cows, the latter 1,200. Besides these are several furnishing milk in smaller quantities, and extensive establishments of the same description at Wallabout, all contributing their proportion of this article of food.

The New York establishment referred to is located in the upper part of the city, and is probably the largest of the kind in the United States. Thirteen hundred animals of the bovine genus are there doomed to imprisonment for life. Extensive buildings, three in number, and each five or six hundred feet in length, have been erected, and placed parallel to each other, with narrow yards intervening. Their height is one story, and in them the animals are arranged in rows of fifteen transversely, with sufficient space to allow of their lying down, with a little squeezing. A few hundred feet distant is the distillery, from which the "slops" are conducted through a subterranean canal to a receiving reservoir, and from thence distributed at pleasure through wooden troughs to the animals' heads. With this food are also served portions of hay at stated intervals. As may be easily imagined, even with the exercise of a reasonable degree of attention, the effluvia arising from these tenements, with their low ceilings and indifferent ventilation, is anything but savory, especially in warm weather; and surprise is naturally excited, that the animals can long remain in a healthy state.

However, under the treatment described, a copious supply of milk is obtained, twelve quarts a day being considered only a very fair average. These 1,300 cows are owned by different persons, who obtain the supply of slops and lease of the building occupied for six cents a day per cow. In other words, the cows are put out to board. Some intelligent opinion may be formed from this of the degree of profit attending the prosecution of the business—leaving any watering processes out of the calculation. The fluid, thus prepared and ready for market, is sent off in all directions, in handsomely painted wagons, decorated with the words "Hudson Co. Milk," "Westchester Milk," or whatever is most convenient and looks best.

After having lived their allotted length of time, the cows bid adieu to sublunary things, and the [illegible]sition of their carcases forms another [illegible]t branch of business. Formerly they passed into the hands of the interdicted "bone boilers;" but now they are transported across the river. Their skins are then made into leather, their feet into oil, and the little fat on the bones into soap. Such has been the success of those following the latter vocation, that at least one or two individuals can point to rows of handsome residences in the upper part of the city as their own; and such is the ignoble end of very many unfortunate brutes. Church Property in Spain.

The N. Y. Tribune says that the Spanish Government are exhibiting symptoms of a longing to lay their hands on the wealth of the Church in that country. An order has been issued by the Minister of Justice and Ecclesiastical Affairs, directed to the Bishops and heads of Dioceses generally, demanding a complete inventory of all the treasures and articles of value in the various churches. Great pains have been taken to keep the fact secret, but it has transpired, and all sorts of guesses are current as to the object of the order. It is believed by some, that nothing else is intended than to keep up the artificial credit of the State by an exhibition of the wealth of the Church. When it is consinered that the Cathedral at Toledo, for in stance, has articles of gold and silver to the amount of some $7,500,000, it would be no matter of surprise if the grand total in the kingdom should reach $125,000,000. It would prove no easy matter, however, for the Government to obtain possession of these immense treasures. The inhabitants of the country towns and villages would resist any attempt at removing the Church property, and in the cities, the heirs of former benefactors to the churches will naturally oppose any other application of treasures obtained from their ancestors than that for which they were given. A majority of the parish priests refuse to undertake the inventory demanded; and is it a remarkable circumstance, that just at the moment when the circular is becoming know, thefts in the churches seem to have become the order of the day. In two weeks, toward the end of August, more thefts of this kind have been committed than in many previous years together.

POCKET-BOOK DROPPING.—A few days ago a man named Enoch L. Nutter arrived in N. Y. from Maine, with the intent of taking passage on board the barque Dolphin for Australia. While amusing himself with viewing the sights of the city on Saturday, the "pocket-book dropping" game was practiced upon him in the following manner:—

The pocket book was dropped at his feet, and another of the gang picked it up and asked Enoch if it was his; while a third came up, collared him, and told him that he was the owner of the wallet, and that he (Enoch) had stolen it from him. This fellow threatened him with a berth in the State Prison if he did not at once settle the matter. Poor Enoch, fearing that he had got into hot water, gave the rascals fifty dollars to get clear. He then proceeded to the station-house and told his story, and a fellow was arrested named Waldren, and taken before Justice Bogart, but finally escaped through the instrumentality of a confederate, who recovered the fifty dollars for Enoch, and persuaded the latter to refuse entering a complaint, on the ground that he could not certainly identify Black Joe.

THE "LIQUOR BUSINESS."—The traffic in ardent spirits is said to be almost universally attended with such fraud as would disgrace and destroy the followers of any other calling. Gin is improved by the use of sweet oil and vitriol, which give it a "beed." Irish and Scotch whiskey are made of American, by the introduction of a little creosote, to give it the "smoky twang;" pale and dark brandies are made of whiskey by the introduction of a little more or a little less of the coloring matter, &c., &c. We read lately in the papers that one of the Delegates to the Cold Water Alliance, recently assembled in Utica, New York, in the course of a narrative of his experience, informed the Delegates that he was once engaged in the distilling business, and had frequently made and placed on sale good brandy, rum, gin and wine, from whiskey, in the short space of four hours, and could at any time make sparkling brandy from whiskey, which would deceive the palate of the upper ten. REAPING MACHINES IN ENGLAND.—We observe in the English papers reports of several recent trials of Reaping Machines in England, of a more thorough character than those previously here made, the results of which seem to have been in favor of that of Mr. M'Cormick. The £6 premium was awarded to it in a trial at Driffield, and the £10 premium in a late similar trial at Sunderland, where Hussey's Machine, improved by Garrett, Croskill's, and others, competed. In the Times of the 9th ult., there is a report made by the Royal Agricultural College of a trial in which each machine was made to cut one hundred acres, and the preference is given to M'Cormick's, in regard to ease of operation for horses and men, cleanness of work, speed of the machine, cutting damp or foul grain (without being clogged,) and the delivery of the grain, so that it can conveniently be bound into sheaves. AFRICAN PROVERBS.—If there be still any adherents among us to the "baboon theory," and any depreciators of "African intellect," we beg leave to refer them to the Rev. Samuel Crowther, native missionary of the Church Missionary Society, and to his lately published "Yoruba Vocabulary," for a confutation of their favorite dogma. This book not only shows that an "African" can become a highly educated being, but it proves, what is far more to the purpose, that a whole African race, numbering 3,000,000, exists, possessing a language highly refined and developed, abounding in expressions which could only have arisen among a people in a state of considerable civilization, and rich in proverbial sentences, exhibiting not only a shrewd and worldly-wise, but also a gentle and moral people.

BAKED HAMS.—Most persons boil hams. They are much better baked, if baked right. Soak for an hour in clean water, and wipe dry, and then spread it all over with thin batter, and lay it in a deep dish, with sticks under, to keep it out of the gravy. When fully done, take off the skin and batter crusted upon the flesh side, and set it away to cool. You will find it very delicious, but too rich for dyspeptics. So says one of our agricultural exchanges.

A SINGING MOUSE.—The Buffalo Commercial says that a family, having rooms in the American Hotel, lately left town for a few weeks. On their return, they found that a mouse was in the habit of constantly visiting the cage of a canary bird which had remained in the room during their absence, having taken the opportunity of forming an acquaintance during the unusual stillness of the apartment. To the surprise of the members of the family, it was found that the mouse had taken lessons in singing of its musical friend, and would constantly give forth notes in exact imitation of the canary's tones, but low and sweet. The little creature now visits the cage nightly, eats of the seed, and endeavors by its singing to excite the attention and call forth the notes of the bird.

LAND WARRANTS.—The number of Land Warrants issued under the act of September, 1850, amount at their par to about $16,000,000; about one-third of which are estimated to be located, and the remainder floating in the market. The following table will show the amount of each description of Warrants issued under the act referred to:—

Warrants.	Numbers.	Par.	Total.
40 acres	75,000	$50	$5,700,000
80 acres	65,000	100	6,500,000
160 acres	30,000	200	6,000,000
Total			$16,200,000

VARIETY.

It was announced the other day, among sundry items of European news, that three Englishmen, who had undertaken, on a wager, to sail from London to Constantinople in an open boat, had arrived at some port in Germany. We now hear that they have got as far as Vienna, on the way down the Danube to the Black Sea. Their boat is three feet wide by twenty-one long, and weighs seventy-four pounds. For crossing the Bistish channel this was rather a dangerous conveyance, but the terms of the wager left them no choice; accordingly, they remained in the boat for the entire passage, but took care to have it hoisted upon the deck of a steamer before leaving London.

Authors and scribblers often boast of their correctness in orthography, and the beauty of their language—but they seldom turn their thoughts toward the toiling compositor, who, line after line, page after page, arranges their scrawling duck-feet letters into the semblance of sense—inserting here a neglected interjection, there a preposition, and occasionally a whole sentence—and then, after that, correcting the proof sheets, and giving to the world the effusion, which, if set in type in its original shape, would be the veriest nonsense.

According to the returns made to the Secretary of the Treasury, it appears that the steamboat tunnage connected with the American lakes exceeds that of Great Britian and all her dependencies. The steamers on Lake Erie alone measure more tuns than all the steamboats in Europe, Asia and Africa, inclusive, provided you leave out those which belong to Great Britian. What a comment are such facts on the boundless resources of our soil, and the go-ahead tendency of free institutions.

"We can prove," says Baron Liebig, "with mathematical certainty, that as much flour or meal as can lie on the point of a table-knife is more nutritious than five measures (about eight or ten quarts) of the best Bavarian beer; that a person who is able daily to consume that amount of beer, obtains from it in a whole year, in the most favorable case, exactly the amount of nutritive constituents which is contained in a five-pound loaf of bread, or three pounds of flesh.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also, which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also the Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

ASSOCIATIONAL POWER.

TO "T. B. B."

From the manner you treat the subject we are upon, and its importance, I feel under obligation to write still more upon it, though at first I thought I would not.

You seem to have been obliged to look your "Remarks" over very closely, to find any thing to which my charge of false imputation was pertinent. And when you did find a single sentence to which you seem to become aware it might be applicable, you disavow the imputation of the sentiment to me personally. Well, let that be so understood.

But then, your "Remarks," from first to last, abound with the imputation, in substance, that the views I hold, and the amendment and measures I contend for, are presbyterian, prelatical, and episcopal, in their tendency. Thus, while you would profess not to hold me chargeable with such sentiments personally, your imputations of that sort against the views I hold, instead of lessening, increase, and are urged with accumulating pertinacity as you proceed.

Now, what I expect to show is, that such is not the tendency of my views—that your representation of the matter, in this respect, is an entirely mistaken view of the subject. I shall hit, too, on some other points. To put power, then, into the hands of the ministry, by which they may rule the ministry, or laity, or both, must be the tendency of my views, or you must be wrong. Your statements, if you mean any thing by them, as you say by me, (though I would not intimate that you write without meaning any thing,) must mean what I have said. Let us examine that doctrine, which you have clothed in such a frightful garb, and see what it is.

The doctrine I hold is this: I maintain that the churches associated, and their ministers, as ministers, as public men, (holding an office of the highest responsibility, authorizing them to administer the ordinances of the gospel throughout the whole body,) are amenable to the body of representatives chosen and sent by the churches to constitute their Association. I hold, that if any church in the Association lays a complaint before that body against another, or the minister of another, said church or minister is liable to be tried by that body, and dismembered by an act of the same, for any conduct which it deems to be in violation of the principles on which they originally associated. All must necessarily see, that the whole question whether or not such views tend to a government of presbyters, prelates, or bishops, must depend on another question, namely, whether the body of delegates who are to do the business, and constitute the tribunal, is to be composed of presbyters, prelates, and bishops, or of some other class of individuals. It is positively certain, that in the sense you use those titles, there are no such dignitaries among us. It follows, that the Association can not be composed of such. But suppose we call our ministers by those titles, or any others you please; they only stand on a level with the private members, in regard to being delegates to the Association; they have no claim to that position among Seventh-day Baptists by virtue of their office; the churches are not obliged to appoint or send them to do that business. On the contrary, if it is the pleasure of the churches to do so, they can make up the sessions of their Association and not have a solitary minister in them. It is true, the churches do generally send their ministers as delegates to those meetings; but they usually send three or four from the private membership of the church to one from the ministry; and the vote of each church is as the majority of its representatives vote. So the power is in the hands of the people, though the ministers are delegates. But should the churches perchance only send their ministers to the Association, you may say that would constitute a government of bishops, prelates, or presbyters. But that would not be true, if the churches still retained the right to demand a new trial of the case, and to appoint a new set of delegates to submit the matter to; which they always have done, and I trust they always will do, and which of course they most certainly ought to do, for the security of their own rights.

No, brother, no such brief authority as the churches give to any set of delegates, whether it be to decide as to the soundness of the churches, or of their ministers, bears the most distant resemblance to presbyterianism, prelacy, or episcopacy, imaginable. My scheme invests the people—the members of the churches—with authority to wield over the ministry for self-preservation. But presbyterianism, prelacy, and espiscopacy, invest the ministry with authority over the people, the membership of the churches, and also over the ministry, and that by virtue of their office perpetually. On my plan, if at any time the people wish to authorize their ministers, or other individuals, or both, to judge of any matters for them, they can do so. If they approve their judgment, they may acquiesce in it; if not, they have the power in their own hands—they can reverse it. The jurisdiction in the case possessed by the delegates to whom it was committed, has terminated when once they have given their opinion; it then falls back into the hands of the people, necessarily. But under presbyterian, prelatical, or episcopal governments, which in only a slight degree, if at all, originate with the people, and are not amenable to them, the people of course are obliged to submit to their rule or domination over them, whether it be right or wrong, or at least with but a slight chance of obtaining justice at their hands; yes, comparatively, with no chance of justice whatever. I wish to make the ministry amenable to the people; my doctrine secures that end, necessarily; it can not result in any thing else. But you heap odium on my views, (not to say on me,) by representing—yes, in substance charging—that they are presbyterianism, prelacy, or episcopacy, or that such views would put power into the hands of the ministry; which is so far from being true, that it is directly contrary to every fact in the case. In frankness, I must say, that I can not account for this idea of my views having such a tendency, on any other supposition than that it is purely a creation of your fancy. I am amazed that you should take such a view of this thing. But then, I am aware that as a people we are almost frantic when the thought of priestcraft crosses the mind, or especially when the frightful image of its horrid tyranny is held up to view, and this presented a strong inducement to excite disgust against my views in that way.

There is reason, indeed, to be afraid of priestcraft's iron sway. But there is no reason that we should allow its image, held up in vapors, to bewilder us, or overcome us with such a fascination, that we, like a charmed bird, should hover around in vain attempts to escape, and then throw ourselves into the extended jaws of the hungry monster. But I fear our case is something of that sort. For, by the course taken, and the views maintained, at the last Association, the ministers are put entirely out of the reach of all except the particular churches to which they belong. And who is ignorant of the fact, that a minister of but an ordinary share of ingenuity and tact, can easily find some church whose circumstances, together with his representations, will lead them to sustain him, and declare that he has done nothing for which he can be faulted. If, then, a minister gets into difficulty in one church, and can patch up his standing a little, so as to get a letter, or certificate of standing, or by some other manœuver or shift, get into a church that will defend him, he can not be touched. Or, suppose the pastor of one church accuses the pastor of a neighboring, sister church, of lying, and it can be proved that the falsehood is on him who made the charge; yet his church will hear no complaint, will not have the case examined, avows its confidence in his integrity, and continues him its pastor. According to your doctrine, the decisions of his church are final, ultimate, and of the highest authority; indeed, there is no other authority to which he is amenable. The subject being thus legitimately disposed of, (for they must manage their own concerns in their own way,) no church, nor the body at large, having any business to judge but what it is all right, the pastor accused of lying, and his church, and the pastor who accused him, and his church, are all in fellowship and communion, unavoidably. And whenever they are brought together in their association with the body to which they in common belong, the accused pastor and his church, so many of them as may be present, will be expected to go forward in the communion. Of his accuser it is only to be remembered, that he has been justified by the highest authority, and he can come forth with his flock, and sit down to the communion, or stand and administer to his accused neighboring pastor and flock. And even should the disaffection rise to such a pitch, that the Association should assay to withdraw the hand of fellowship from the accusing pastor, and then his church should declare its determination to separate from the Association, and that body erase the name of that church, or declare them dropped, and so they part, from mutual loathing and repulsion; yet, after all, these pastors and churches are all in communion; and if either of them should for any reason be disposed to claim that place, or privilege, in the assemblies and services of the other, it could not be refused. For the Association is only capable of handling some questions of a social character, of the nature of expediency, as I understand you. It can not touch any thing of the nature of discipline; it can not sunder in any way the vital cord of Christian fellowship or communion. It follows, that when once a church has been admitted to membership in the body, their pastor may bear false witness against his neighbor, his brother, and though it be proved against him by positive testimony the most unimpeachable, his church has only to say it is not so, and he can come forth into the churches, Associations, and Conferences, and claim his place as a minister and communicant among them, in spite of all they can do. The body may shake itself as hard as it pleases; it can't shake him off. Four-fifths of their number may believe him in the fault, beyond a doubt that they are bound, in justice to their own reputation, and in duty to man and to God, to separate from him, to keep no company with him, "no, not to eat;" they may vote to withdraw the hand of fellowship from him, and suppose they have succeeded to clear themselves of the wrong, and of him; but no, according to your theory, he is a member of the denomination; he and his church belong to the Conference, though they have withdrawn or have been excluded from the Association.

It will avail nothing for you to say, the church must sit in judgment on its own minister and members, and if it does wrong, cut them all off together. For, according to your views, they are not in any respect amenable to any body for any act of discipline of theirs; and of course they are not subject to be cut off for any act of that nature; they cannot be excluded for any act they can make appear to be of the nature of discipline in their body, do what they may. Any act of the Association in respect to such a church could only affect the conventional relations between it and the church. So I understand you, and your theory. This is the independency of the churches! They must have the power to vindicate their minister's standing against no matter what kind or amount of evidence; and when done, impose him and themselves on a people as a part of them, in the eyes of community, in spite of all remonstrance and all resistance.

Does some one say, We need give ourselves no trouble on that score—that no church or minister will ever trouble us in that way? I reply, It is nothing to the purpose whether any are disposed to do so or not. If your theory is what I have represented it to be, (and what, in my opinion, no man can prove it is not,) it is just as much to be objected to, as if there were churches and ministers waiting for an opportunity to take advantage of it to the full extent. If this is liberty, God save his people from it. If this is not presbyterianism, prelacy, or episcopacy, it is no better. It is the monstrous outbreak of that democracy which asks everything, and gives nothing; which would enjoy the protection of the social or religious compact, and at the same time the privilege of trampling on its equal claims with impunity; it is, indeed, the antithesis, the reverse of all it claims to be. Its practical definition of liberty is tyranny—the tyranny of the few over the many—of one church over all the ministers and churches with whom it is associated.

Now, whether it is your views or mine that ought to be charged with a tendency to presbyterianism, prelacy, or episcopacy, I am willing our readers should judge; and also, whether there is any reason why you should appeal to the love of approbation in our people, and at the same time attempt to excite their disgust against my doctrine, by saying, "But we do not think that Seventh-day Baptists are yet prepared for it, though it might be accounted sound doctrine in presbyterian and prelatical denominations." Who has less confidence in Seventh-day Baptists than you have? If I have, I have not transcended you in the exhibition of it, as seen in your allusion to their doctrinal views (or to their not having any) on the subject of "Foreknowledge," in your articles on that subject last winter, and more recently in what you have published on "Denominational Sins." I find no fault with what you wrote on the last-mentioned subject. Have you any more reason to desire the purity of Seventh-day Baptists, than your brethren, who from infancy have been taught by their parents to cherish that object as their patrimony—as their individual interest? Are you—is any man—more republican, more democratic, more congregational than I am? If so, let it be proved, not insinuated.

I hold to just such independency of the churches as will make them equally independent. But the idea that primary bodies may confederate, or associate, and yet be absolutely independent, and unamenable as to whether their doings shall comport with the objects of their organization or not, is an impracticable abstraction. It is nothing else than to declare all organic, constitutional, confederate, or associational obligations, null, and at one stroke to resolve the mass into its original elements. No organization can endure the shock of such a doctrine; and those who maintain it must not be surprised if the reward of disorganizers should be theirs.

You hold that the thirteenth article of the Constitution of the Eastern Association is an undisguised and unequivocal confession of the Association's faith in this respect, namely, that each church has such a right secured to it by the Gospel—that is, such a right as you contend for. I do not so understand it. Nor did your allusion to my criticism on that article, as being so singular, or your presentation of the first and last parts of it, enable me to see that it contained the complete refutation of my criticism which you seem to think it does. I still think the word "gospel" in the article should have the import which I gave it. Be that as it may, I know that I never meant to make such a confession of faith as you hold the Association made, when it adopted that article. Your statement, then, on that point, so far as it bears on me as a member of the Association, I know to be incorrect; and there are many other brethren in the same position. But suppose you were correct in your interpretation of the language of the article, I should contend against the doctrine still, and urge the amendment of the Constitution; for I never supposed we were infallible in making constitutions or articles of faith. I hope, however, that neither ourselves as a people, nor our organizations, are so bad that reformation is impossible; nor can I flatter myself with the idea of such perfection as precludes improvement. And I trust that the time will come when it will be seen, that the resolution of the Berlin Association, affirming the amenability of ministers, was not the result of "an over-acted zeal," and that the rejection of the proposed amendment at Waterford was not the deliberate judgment of our churches.

But you labor hard upon the idea that I advanced in respect to ministers having a right to officiate throughout the body, or Association. Yet you are not sure you understand how much I mean by it. I regret that I did not succeed to state my meaning so that you could get hold of it. Let me try it once more. I understand that when churches associate, they obligate themselves, by that act, to receive each other's ministers, and treat them as having a right to administer the gospel and its ordinances interchangeably among them, as opportunities therefor may arise, or occasion may require. I am not on the question whether it would be modest, or wise, for ministers to demand any thing of that kind. But I maintain, that by associating, each church concedes to all the others, that their ministers shall have the right to administer among them. But if the Seventh-day Baptist church of New York will have it that the ministers of the other churches have no right to officiate among them, except they will accept that "privilege" as a benefit bestowed on them by that church, I suppose they will be equally at their option whether they accept the benefit or not; for, desirable as it may be, it might make a good deal of odds whether it were entered upon, or enjoyed, on grounds which were just or unjust. You hold "that a minister is a minister of the church to which he belongs"—"that his connection with the Association gives him no right to officiate as a minister in any church belonging to it, unless that church is, of itself, willing to receive him in that capacity"—and that "the body throughout which he has a right to officiate as minister, is only that church which in some way signifies its willingness that he should do so." Well, what of that? Suppose it is so, does not the act of one church, when it associates with another, constitute a declaration of its willingness to receive the pastor or minister of the other as an administrator? Do they not by that act affirm his right to officiate among them? I believe they do. And any interpretation of the act of association, which disallows that point, makes a farce or sham of the whole transaction. It is no new discovery, "that it takes two to make a bargain," but if one could invent a way to infuse into men sufficient rectitude to cause them to stand to the bargains which they make, he could no doubt get a patent of it. My acquaintance and intimacy with Seventh-day Baptists from my infancy, and especially for the last twenty years, will not allow me to admit that they ordain men with the idea that they are ministers of the churches to which they belong merely—that they hold no ecclesiastical connection with the denomination except their church. I think I know, that they never act with that idea (you excepted;) but, on the contrary, with the idea that the man ordained is a minister of the denomination, as by their direct agency in ordaining him, or the relations in which they stand to the church which ordained him. If the Conference should meet at Plainfield next month, and it be disposed to have the Lord's Supper administered, would it not have the right to do so, and to call upon some, or any of the ministers of the churches to administer? Could the Plainfield church object, and say, You have no right to administer here, unless we ask you to? Or could one part of the delegates or ministers say to the rest, You have no right to administer to us, unless we ask you in the name of our church to do so; for your connection with the Conference, or Association, gives you no right to officiate any where but in the church you belong to—that your rights, and your amenability, are confined within the limits of your churches, that your ecclesiastical connection goes no farther—you have none with us whatever? On your principle, of course all these things could be legitimately said and done. But I maintain, that such a course is in direct contravention of, and in utter contradiction to, every thing signified by the act of association, on which the churches send their representatives together, and a breach of faith and covenant. And therefore I reject the doctrine in all its bearings, in every form in which it can be presented, either in whole or in part.

The church a minister belongs to is the tribunal first to be looked to for the trial of his case when he is complained of, no doubt. But when the decision of the church is such that churches associated with it cannot fellowship said church, the case must go before the body. And it is perfectly evident, that the church might take one ground, and the ministers another in the end, and the one be sustained, and the other put down. Or, they might take the same position, and he justified or condemned together. If they take contrary grounds, so that one is condemned and the other justified, it must terminate the relations previously subsisting between them. The minister can no longer administer to them. So it is seen, that the trial of the church as a member of the body would not of necessity cover the whole matter, because it is plain, that though the church assumes a position that puts an end to its connection with the body, the minister having received his ordination either at the request of the church, with the concurrence and coöperation of the body, or upon the church when in standing in it (by which the body becomes a party to that transaction,) his ordination can not be vitiated by what his church may subsequently do, unless he takes the same ground. Thus it is, that a minister holds a relation with the body aside from his connection therewith by his membership in the church. And he is no more dependent on the church for his membership in this sense, (and this is the sense in which I understand him to be a member,) and his position as a minister in the body, than the church is upon him for theirs. Suppose an Association or the Conference takes a member of the Seventh-day Baptist church in New York, and ordains him to the ministry, without being asked to do so by the church; can the New York church prevent his being a minister? Is he not, in that capacity, amenable to the body that ordained him? Such things have been done, and their validity has not been questioned.

But you seem to hold that the church alone has the right to originate a man's ordination—that whoever else may participate in it, only acts in obedience to the will of the church. But where did you learn that the church, as a local organization, in such a sense as you employ that term, is vested with the ordaining power exclusively, under the Lord Jesus Christ? Do you find any cases in the Scriptures of churches ordaining ministers? We have the right of private judgment on individual responsibility; and on the right of private judgment, we base the opinion, that a company of converts to Christianity have a right to ordain a minister for themselves, when they are so situated that they can not find others of the same faith to counsel and aid them in it. I admit all that. But Christ ordained the apostles, and they ordained ministers or pastors in the churches; and if you can show an instance of a church that called and ordained a minister for itself in the time of the apostles, I should be glad if you would. I do not mean to say by this, that the clergy, or presbytery, or bishop only, can confer ordination; but I deny that the right to ordain lies exclusively in the church, as you represent. If a church calls a man to the ministry, asks the churches in communion with it to send their minister or others to examine the candidate and ordain him if approved, and they comply with the wish of the church, and ordain the man, I hold that the delegations sent by the churches on said business, and their churches, are just as much the ordaining power, and just as responsible for what is done, as the church that called them together, and that the man who is ordained is just as amenable to the other churches, in respect to the exercise of the office conferred on him, as he is to the church that called him, and to which he belongs.

I hope by this time you can conceive what I mean by a minister's being a member of an Association, though not a voter in its sessions, because not sent as a delegate by any church. If you can only conceive of membership as being predicable of a church, we will call him an officer in the body, and amenable to the same, as such, for his conduct. I hope, at least, you will see, that my views are neither presbyterianism, prelacy, nor episcopacy. At any rate, if the whole power of our press, and all the influence of your editorial position, and standing for goodness and wisdom, are to be brought to bear to crush brethren—yes, the churches who, pursuant to your own advice, as they thought, brought a matter of difficulty before the Association—for one, I wish to know it. I know already, (and am oppressed with the sad thought while I write,) that these churches, year after year, groaned under the oppressive weight of the difficulties which arose in their midst. They prayed—they labored—they toiled—but could not adjust the matter. They asked the ministers in the Association to meet and confer as to what should be done, and use their influence to settle the difficulty. You advised instead of that, (and contrary to my views of the best way at the time, for I was for the informal conference,) that the church complaining of being injured should lay its complaint before the church to which the minister belonged, whom they charged with doing them wrong. The complaining church took your advice, and acted on it. They laid their complaint before the other church, but it would not take the subject up, except to say that they should not go into it. Next the complaint was laid before the Association. What else could any one expect would be done? You heard the complaint, and was on a committee to nominate a council to take the subject up for the Association. The council was appointed, and examined, and reported on the case. And from that moment your denial that the Association had any right of jurisdiction in the case, has been constant. And, taking advantage of an ultra-abstract and impractical notion of the independency of churches, which, though fallacious, is very fascinating to many, you and others succeeded to give such a shape to the doings of the Association at its last session, as very seriously to invalidate the action of the preceding session; and yet, instead of amending that action, went right on to commit more acts of the same kind. The natural result of all this is a most disheartening and sad state of things, from which the Seventh-day Baptist churches in Rhode Island are suffering still. And there is no word so descriptive of the condition of things here on this subject as chaos. A great portion of our members know not what to think or do. And I believe this state of things results more from the course you have taken than from any thing else; and I think you ought to understand it; and I should not feel justified if I should leave this fact unrecorded. But I look for a better state things. I have no idea that the effects of your course will last always—that they are to be fixed upon our people—through, perhaps, they are as easily misled as others; and I have, like you, been [illegible] fully impressed with what seemed to me to be a fact, that they were utterly incompetent to the work devolving upon them. But though I have so much confidence in our people left, as to make me hope they will come right on this subject, still I feel sad to find myself obliged to oppose your views so much as I do. It is what, a year and a helf ago, I never dreamed would come to pass. And now, after so full and extended an expression of my views, I will add, if I can be shown and convinced that I am wrong, and you are right, I wish to; for the remembrance of the past, when our views of things seemed to be harmonious, is so pleasent, that I wish to enjoy them over again, if it may please God that I might. If, however, truth and justice demand it, I must breast the storm of your opposition; and, with right on my side, I shall expect to stand the shock, weak as I am.

FOUR DEATH-BEDS.

Benjamin Franklin was one of the most distinguished men of the eighteenth century. From a small beginning he was raised to a high rank and consideration among men; but, alas! he was a stranger to true religion. During his last illness, we are told that he read and conversed cheerfully with his family and friends; that he often transacted business, and that he often indulged himself in those jeux d'esprit and entertaining anecdotes which were the delight of all who heard him. The only allusion to religion, of which we have any account, is this: "He acknowledged a grateful sense of the many blessings he had received from the Supreme Being—and made no doubt but his present afflictions were kindly intended to wean him from a world in which he was no longer fit to act the part assigned him."

Thus died the philosopher, and his death is often spoken of by Deists as all that could be desired. But we find no traces of love and hope, of joy and heavenly aspiration. He died as a Grecian philosopher, who had never heard the name of Jesus, might have been expected to die. Is this the most desirable state of mind in which an immortal spirit can leave this world? If such a death be worthy of a philosopher, let not my last end be like his!

Voltaire was a celebrated infidel, who delighted to treat God and his word with contempt. In his last illness he frequently exclaimed: "I am abandoned by God and man." To Dr. Trochin he said, "Doctor, I will give you half what I am worth, if you will give me six months' life." The Doctor replied: "Sir, you can not live six weeks." "Then," said Voltaire, "I shall go to hell, and you will go with me!" He soon after expired. How affecting! How horrible the death of this man.

A worldling, when on his death-bed, was reminded of the great truths of the gospel—of his own guilt—of the redemption of Christ Jesus, and of the regeneration of the Holy Spirit. "Yes, sir," was his reply, "these things are all true—all true; but to me they are like something that is too far off, I can not grasp them." And thus he died, stupidly and insensibly.

Augustus Toplady, the author of a great many of our beautiful hymns, a few days before his death, said to a friend: "Oh, it is impossible to describe how good God is to me! This afternoon I have enjoyed such a season, such sweet communion with God, and such delightful manifestations of his presence with, and love to my soul, that it is impossible for words, or any language, to express them. I have had peace and joy unutterable." On another occasion he said: "My prayers are all converted into praises." And again he exclaimed: "Oh, how this soul of mine longs to be gone! Like a bird imprisoned in a cage, it longs to take its flight. Oh, that I had wings like a dove, then would I flee away to the realms of bliss, and be at rest forever! Oh, that some guardian angel might be commissioned, for I long to be absent from this body, and to be with the Lord forever!" Waking from slumber only a little before his death, he exclaimed: "Oh, what delights; who can fathom the joys of the third heavens?" His last words were, "The sky is clear, there is no cloud. Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly!" Thus died the Christian, trusting and rejoicing, praising and triumphing.

Here are four death-beds; no one will feel ready to say, "Let me die the death of Franklin, and let my last end be like his." Nor will this be said of Voltaire, or of the worldling. Many are ready to wish they may die the death of the righteous—that death may come to them without its sting, that they may triumph over it. But such wishes are sinful and foolish, if the sinner is all the while rejecting Christ, and running greedily to do iniquity. Reader, if you are out of Christ, you are on the broad road that leadeth to destruction. "Turn ye, turn ye; why will ye die?" Solemn scenes are before us; death and judgment are at the door. If they find you Christless, unpardoned, and unsanctified, yours will be an undone eternity. Except ye repent, and be converted, ye shall all likewise perish.

But for the believer to die is truly blessed. A happy thing it is to leave sin and sorrow, and to be gathered into Jesus' bosom. Happier still to awake at the resurrection, in the likeness of our glorified Redeemer. Then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, "Death is swallowed up in victory."

HORRORS OF A FIELD OF BATTLE.

Stand, then, in imagination, on a summer's morning, upon a field of battle. Earth and sky melt together in light and harmony. The air is rich with fragrance, and vocal with the song of birds. But suddenly break in the sounds of fierce music, and the measured tramp of thousands. Eager squadrons shake the earth with thunder, and files of bristling steel kindle in the sun. And, opposed to each other, line to line, face to face, are now arrayed men whom God has made in the same [illegible] the same issues. The same heart beats in all. In the momentary hush, like a swift mist sweeps before them the image of home. Voices of children prattle in their ears. Memories of affection stir among their silent prayers. They cherish the same sanctities, too. They have read from the same Book. It is to them the same charter of life and salvation. They have been taught to observe its beautiful lessons of love. Their hearts have been touched alike with the meek example of Jesus. But a moment, and all these affinites are broken, trampled under foot, swept away by the shock and shouting. Confusion rends the air. The simmering bomb ploughs up the earth. The iron hail cuts the quivering flesh. The steal bites to the bone. The cannon-shot crashes through serried ranks. And under the clouds of smoke that hide both earth and heaven, the desperate struggle goes on. The day wanes, and the strife ceases. On the one side there is victory, on the other defeat. The triumphant city is lighted with jubilee, the streets roll out their tides of acclamation, and the organ heaves from its groaning breast the peal of thanksgiving. But under that tumultuous joy there are bleeding bosoms and inconsolable tears. And, whether in triumphant or defeated lands, a shudder of orphanage and widowhood, a chill of woe and death, runs far and wide through the world. The meek moon breaks the dissipating veil of conflict, and rolls its calm splendor above the dead. And see now how much woe man has mingled with the inevitable evils of the universe. See now the fierceness of his passion, the folly of his wickedness, witnessed by the torn standards, the broken wheels, the pools of clotted blood, the charred earth, the festering heaps of slain. Nature did not make these horrors; and when these fattened bones shall have mouldered in the soil, she will spread out luxuriant harvests, and hide those horrors for ever.

USEFULNESS OF ONE TRACT.

A few days since, a member of a Presbyterian church called to make some inquiries about Oregon. As he rose to leave, a copy of a new tract was handed to him, which led him to remark that some years since one of our tracts came into his possession, entitled "The Christian's Annual Directory through the whole Bible; with tables for the reading of each day. Designed to induce young persons to adopt the practice of reading the whole Bible annually, and to pursue it through life. By T. Timpson." This tract, No. 127 of the series of the American Baptist Publication Society, led his children to read the entire Bible several times. Who can estimate the results of that little tract sold for one cent? The multiplication of tracts and good books, so far from checking the reading of the Bible itself, directly promotes it. Good books, like good preachers, cause many to "search the Scriptures." This fact should encourage us also to persevere in the gratuitous distribution of tracts, personally and by colporteurs. We may not ascertain the results in this world, but we shall find, at the day of judgment, that the "labor" of those who are "always abounding in the work of the Lord," was "not in vain in the Lord." "ASSOCIATIONAL POWER."

Reply to Bro. Crandall.

Among Protestants, church government exists in three different forms, namely, Independency, Presbyterianism, and Episcopacy. To these may be added the system of government adopted by the Quakers; but as this is not likely to be referred to in the discussion between Bro. Crandall and myself, it may be thrown out of the list.

I profess to be an Independent or Congregationalist. The strict independency of the churches was the doctrine of the denomination to which I formerly belonged, and when I connected myself with the Seventh-day Baptist denomination, I supposed it to hold the same doctrine. Was I mistaken, or was I not? I still believe that I was not mistaken. Certainly, nothing has ever occurred to make me think that I was, except the confident manner in which Bro. C. sets forth views so widely different from my own, and affirms them to be the views of the denomination.

Bro. C., it is true, professes to hold to the independency of the churches; nay, seems quite indignant that it should be called in question. For he says, "Are you, is any man, more republican, more democratic, more congregational, than I am? If so, let it be proved, not insinuated." I doubt not that he is perfectly sincere in this opinion; but any man of common discernment can see, that his notions of independency are very different from mine. If, according to my doctrine, indepency is "the monstrous outbirth of that democracy which asks every thing, and gives nothing—the antithesis of all it claims to be—whose practical definition of liberty is tyranny," &c., I cannot expect him to withhold his protest against it. Nevertheless, I claim to stand upon the platform of the New Testament, and my readers shall see whether my doctrine is what he has charged it to be. I intend to study brevity, however, for I think that the strength of my position is such, that many words are not called for.

There is one prominent idea that runs through the whole of Bro. C.'s article. It is this; that the Seventh-day Baptist denomination has an embodied, organized existence, in some central council, which unites all the separate or individual churches into one general Church; just as, in the Presbyterian denomination, the various congregations throughout the country are all centralized in one great council, called the General Assembly; or as, in the Methodist denomination, the numerous local societies of which it is composed are all centralized, finally, in their General Conference. I think I do not misrepresent Bro. C. in this. I certainly do not intend to do so, and if I am mistaken, I will be glad to be corrected. He appears to regard our General Conference as the great common council, which centralizes and embodies the individual churches which make up the denomination. He regards it, if I mistake not, as the body to which we must look for an exposition of the denomination's faith, of its ecclesiastical polity, in short, of all that characterizes us as a religious community. And, if I am not mistaken, he looks upon the several Associations as so many subdivisions of the Conference, each of them constituting a council, which centralizes, and consolidates, the individual churches of which it is composed.

In perfect keeping with this idea, he speaks of the churches being brought together in communion, (that is, in the celebration of the Lord's Supper,) at the time of their annual convocation in Association, and of the trouble that would occur in case one or more of the pastors present, justly obnoxious to the charge of lying, should not be ecclesiastically subject to the Association. "And whenever they are brought together in their Association, with the body to which they in common belong, the accused pastor and his church, so many of them as may be present, will be expected to go forward in the communion." Again, "If the Conference should meet at Plainfield next month, and it be disposed to have the Lord's Supper administered, would it not have the right to do so, and to call upon some or any of the ministers of the churches to administer?"

Here, then, is the idea, clearly set forth, that all the particular churches which make up an Association, or the Conference, become consolidated as one general Church, having whatever authority and power the Lord Jesus has committed to that organization denominated the church in the New Testament.

I am glad that Bro. C. is so explicit on this point. It is clear, that he considers the Conference in the light of a divinely authorized Church, having authority to celebrate church ordinances, and to ordain the necessary officers. It is equally clear, that he views the Associations as so many branches of the Church, having in like manner authority to observe the ordinances, and ordain the officers. But from this view I dissent entirely.

Most unquestionably, this is his opinion, or else he must think that the Lord's Supper is not exclusively an ordinance of the church. He must think, that some other organization has a right to celebrate it. But I have no fear that he will take this alternative, for the moment he does so, he destroys his argument for restricted communion, which, I am sure, he would be loth to do. He will maintain, without hesitation, that the ordinance was committed to the church, not to be extended to those who stand without. But if the ordinance was restricted to the church, and was not to be extended to those who are without its pale and jurisdiction, then, whenever it is celebrated, it is an act of the church as such. From this it follows, that it is contrary to gospel order for the Conference as such, or for an Association as such, to go about the celebration of the Lord's Supper, unless the principle which I suppose Bro. C. to hold is well founded, namely, that the Conference is the Church which Christ instituted, and that the Associations are so many divinely authorized branches of the Church, and that individual churches are only so many farther subdivisions of the same body.

But, according to my view, the Conference or any similar organization, is not the Church which Christ instituted, and to which he committed the ordinances. Neither is an Association. Therefore I contend, that if either of these bodies goes about the celebration of the Lord's Supper, in an assumption of its own original right to do so, it does what the New Testament does not warrant it in doing. And to the question, "If the Conference should meet at Plainfield, and be disposed to have the Lord's Supper administered, would it not have the right to do so, and to call upon some or any of the ministers of the churches to administer?" I unhesitatingly answer, No. The original right to have the ordinance administered rests with the Plainfield church. Its own officers are the proper persons to officiate on the occasion, and the ministers, and other delegates to Conference, meeting in the place, may sit down and participate, by invitation of the church. And I will here record my satisfaction, that on the occasion referred to, the pastor of the Plainfield Church took precisely this view of the case, as I infer from the manner in which he gave out the invitation for all members of sister churches who were present to unite with that church in the celebration.

I wish to dwell upon this point a little, for it is one of some importance. Several times I have been witness to the fact, that the Conference, or Association, has, in the way of business, looked forward to the celebration of the Lord's Supper on the Sabbath, and appointed the ministers who should officiate. I have always considered it as an error. Associational or Conference communion is something for which I find no warrant in the Scriptures. The church where the Conference or Association is holding its session, may consistently resolve to have the Eucharist administered at the time, and may invite all the visitors present to a participation of it. Viewed in this light, it is a beautiful custom, and one to which I can offer no objection. I would rather wish it continued, other things being equal; only let it be distinctly understood, that the proceeding is the act of the church, not of the Association.

Bro. C. has not unfrequently been spoken of, as "a man who understands the genius of our denomination better than almost any one else;" and if this be so, it may become me to be very cautious about differing from him. Very well, I will endeavor to be cautious; but, at the same time, I am very desirous to know whether his views are really the views of the denomination, or not. Has it always been the sentiment of the denomination, that an Association, or the Conference, has an original right to provide for the celebration of the Lord's Supper during its session, and to appoint the administrators, the same as if it were a divinely-constituted church? Some of the old fathers can doubtless answer the question. But I can very easily conceive, that the church where the Conference held its first session determined to celebrate the ordinance, and to invite the members of Conference to partake of it. I can easily conceive, that the practice being frequently repeated, it came to be considered as a matter of course, that the Eucharist would be attended to at such times. And I can conceive, that the church insensibly slid into the habit of leaving it with Conference to appoint the administrators, without really intending to concede to it any original right to do so. I can conceive, too, that this practice passed over from Conference to Associations; and that some, not stopping to inquire what the teaching of Scripture was, have inadvertently fallen into the notion, that the Conference or Association provides for the celebration, because it has an original right to do so. All this I can conceive, without supposing that Associational communion, strictly, was ever intended to be set forth as the doctrine of the denomination. And notwithstanding Bro. C.'s acquaintance with "the genius of the denomination," I shall take this view of the matter, till I am compelled to think otherwise.

I fearlessly maintain, that the only ground upon which Bro. C. can consistently claim for the Conference, or for an Association, the orignial right to celebrate the Eucharist, is the consolidation of all the particular churches of which it is composed in one general Church. And could he but free himself from this idea of consolidation, I think he would not be quite so ready to claim for Conference, or Association, an original right to have the communion administered; nor would he be so ready to claim for it a disciplinary authority over churches and ministers.

Bro. C. speaks of "his acquaintance with Seventh-day Baptists from his infancy, and especially for the last twenty years." Well, during all this time, he has seen the General Conference, and (since their formation) some of the Associations, celebrating the Lord's Supper at the time of their anniversaries. Perhaps, without careful inquiry, he has taken it for granted, that they claimed for themselves an original right to do so, the same as if they were bona fide churches, organized upon the New Testament platform. This idea has grown with his growth, and strengthened with his strength, till it has become a settled conviction with him, that nothing short of this was ever intended. In this way, (as I think,) he has been beguiled into the notion, that consolidation is the real doctrine of our denomination.

This principle of consolidation is not the principle of Congregationalism, as set forth in the New Testament. The two principles are directly antagonistic to each other. The congregationalism of the New Testament makes every local church an independent body—a complete sovereignty withim itself. It recognizes no subjection or responsibility of one church to another. On the contrary, every prerogative and every duty is vested in each single church, as though no other existed The right of choosing officers belongs to the church, Acts 6 : 2, 3; the right of receiving members, Rom. 14 : 1, and 2 Cor. 2 : 8; the right of excommunicating disorderly members, 1 Cor. 5 : 13; the right of finally deciding on private differences, Matt. 18 : 17. The only sovereignty over it, at all, is that of the Head, Jesus Christ, as set forth in the laws which his inspired Apostles have placed upon record. All other jurisdiction is disclaimed.

Now, it is evident, that Bro. C. repudiates this strict independency. It is with him "the monstrous outbirth of that democracy which asks every thing, and gives nothing." He is a consolidationist, if I I may coin a word to suit the occasion; and because he is, I consider his doctrine well suited for Presbyterian and Prelatical denominations. I know that we have no such dignitaries among us as Presbyters and Prelates, in the commonly-received sense of these terms. I know, too, that Bro. C. does not advocate, directly, the vesting of church government in the hands of ministers alone. I am not aware of having imputed to him such views, or even of having "insinuated" so much. But I do know, that consolidation is a very important feature of Presbyterianism and Prelacy. I know, that there is not a Presbyterian denomination to be found, which does not recognize its great ecclesiastical judicatory, in which all the local congregations are centralized and consolidated. I know it to be the same with every Prelatical denomination. And I know, also, that when a denomination becomes ecclesiastically consolidated, it is next to impossible to keep the government out of the hands of the chief dignitaries, and retain it in the hands of the people. All experience shows, that large religious bodies are swayed, for the most part, by a few leading minds. There is not a Presbytery, or a Synod, or a Conference, or an Association, or an ecclesiastical convention of any kind, that is not, in a great degree, under the control of a few master spirits, whose favor must be propitiated in order to the adoption of any important measure; and these master spirits are always ministers.

[illegible] believe, that the Head of the Church has sanctioned a system of government which gives to a few leading characters the power of spreading out their influence—which may, peradventure, be mischievous and oppressive—over an indefinite number? Were there any certainty that these leading characters would always exercise their influence in strict accordance with righteousness and truth, such a system might be well enough. But alas! not even ministers are alwaays meek and lowly of heart. Too often their elevated position serves but to inflate their ambition, and render them intolerant towards the weak. Infinite Wisdom fore saw that thus it would be, and, in ordering the system of church government, ordered it in such a way that the intolerance of every Diotrephes should be limited to the precincts of his own congregation.

Such being my views, I maintain that churches have no business to enter into any association which will compromit their strict independency. They may associate for the sake of furnishing the destitute with the Gospel; they may, for the sake of operating more efficiently in Bible distribution, for the education of ministers, for the promotion of Sabbath-Schools, for the promotion of benevolent enterprises generally. Some such objects may very properly call together their representatives, from time to time. But association for the purpose of exercising a strong ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the churches, is downright rebellion against the King.

I find that my proposed brevity is in danger of becoming prolixity; yet, as I have a few things more to offer, I must avail myself of another opportunity. I shall endeavor not to tire the reader.

T. B. B.

INSTITUTION AT AMSTERDAM.—A generous Christian lady at Amsterdam has lately offered to the Free Church a new building in that city, worth about £2000, together with £2080 in money, as a partial endowment, for the purpose of training evangelists and colporteurs to make known the gospel among Jews and others in Holland and throughout the Continent. The building is said to be well fitted for the work of such an institution, and, in fact, part of it is at present rented by the Jewish Mission, and occupied by the Rev. Mr. Schwartz as a place of worship. The proposal, which was laid before the General Assembly, has been finally concurred in by the commission. The Rev. Robert Smith, one of the missionaries expelled from Hungary, has been appointed to Amsterdam, in order that he and Mr. Schwartz may immediately open the institution, and commence that course of preparation of gospel laborers which promises ultimately to tell so beneficially on the objects of the Jewish Mission. In addition to these, it is proposed to request Dr. Da Costa, well known in this country by his writings, as well as by his labors in the cause of Christ, to accept an office in the institution, and, along with him, to appoint another teacher.

THE ENGLISH SABBATH.

Rev. Octavius Winslow, after twelve years close attention to the duties of pastor of the Warwick-st. Congregation, in Leamington, England, started on a journey to Switzerland. He was, however, arrested by a serious illness at Paris, where he experienced some of the inconveniences of a Catholic country. In a letter to his church, he says:—

"What I have seen abroad has tended greatly to endear to my own heart the great and costly privileges with which, in our own happy country, we are favored; and has deepened the earnestness with which I am prepared to urge you to a higher appreciation of the blessings of an English Sabbath, a Protestant sanctuary, and a preached gospel."

Of the blessings of an English Sabbath, compared with any thing found on the Continent, those only who have traveled there can well speak. Yet we are reminded of the fact that few, in England, enjoy all they ought of a great privilege, simply because they have none but an English Sabbath left to them. It is well known, that Dr. Bound introduced the authority of the Decalogue to urge a different degree of attention to the observance of Sunday in the Church of England. He published a book in the year 1595, which became the text-book for the Puritans of that day, on this subject. It was this infusion of the authority of the Law into the motive for observing the day hitherto deemed a Papal Festival, which made Sunday, par excellence, the English Sabbath. Yet we believe that all of the blessings so esteemed by Mr. Winslow fall very far short of those which belong to the Bible Sabbath. Let those who would know what blessedness the truth can give, reject both Papal and English Sabbaths, and take hold on the truthful institution, as left to the world by Jehovah. This Sabbath was made for man; all others were made by man; and though there may be a difference between things made by man, there is a greater difference between them and the great work of God—the Sabbath of the Bible. BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Sunday Observance—Popery in France—The Madiais—Evangelical Alliance.

GLASGOW, September 24, 1852.

The half-yearly meeting of the Caledonian Railway Co. was held two days ago. This is the principal Scottish line, and the Sunday trains run upon it are therefore viewed by Sunday observers with much apprehension. Preparatory to the present meeting, they issued an Address to the Shareholders, in which it is stated, that "nearly every Railway Company in Great Britian" has become a Sunday trading one, and that probably not less than a thousand trains are now filled every Sunday with countless multitudes intent on pleasure or business, and that even "goods are also carried to an enormous extent on the same day." A bad argument, indeed, this [illegible] been chiefly on making gain, as it seemed to imply, that Railway Companies generally found Sunday trading to pay. At a former stage of the argument in opposition to this system, the Directors were indeed assured by the religious papers, that they would lose by such traffic. Even at the meeting which has just been held, this view, in opposition to what seems implied by the statements of the pamphlet, was urged afresh. Yet, neither formerly nor now, has the assertion been considered well founded; for Mr. McMiching's motion, that "the servants of the Company be rested on the Sabbath day, and that no systematic, predetermined work, be required from them in conducting traffic on the Lord's day," was again rejected. The motion had been concocted with great care to give to one of "the six working days" a sacred character, by calling it "the Sabbath day" and "the Lord's day;" but there is here an important difference between the names and the reality.

We have not reached the length of Sunday amusements which prevails in France and other kingdoms of Continental Europe. There their exhibitions are made, and balloons ascend, as a regular part of the boasted Sunday observance of Christendom, which we are to receive as supplementary to the defective Scriptural evidence of a changed Sabbath. But if we have not reached their standard, we are progressing towards it. If we are not permitted to make a Sunday show of a balloon ascent, we are not punished for making preparation on Sunday for the ascent of the balloon on Monday—for the whole of Sunday week was employed in inflating a balloon at Cremorne Gardens, London, which ascended the following evening, containing a party of twenty-five ladies and gentlemen. But not only are we progressing towards the French mode of observing Sunday, we are congratulated with the prospect of its attainment. "The Crystal Palace, then," says the Times recently, "will be our Versailles." There you have the Sunday's recreation about a dozen miles from Paris." But the correspondent of the Times informs us, that the French are in this respect now approximating to our own practice. In the same paper, from the leader of which we have just quoted, (17th instant,) he says, "The better observance of the Sabbath is making some progress in France." But as he furnishes us with the evidence of this progress, it may be proper to add, that it is summed up in the statement of the single fact, that the Mayor of a certain town has given notice to the owners of public houses not to supply drink during the hours of divine service, while the same correspondent, in the same communication, states that "the inauguration of the statue of Descartes took place on Sunday last at Tours."

We fear, indeed, that this care for "the hours of divine service" is only a care for the Popish church, which is receiving much aid in that country, for the service rendered by their clergy to the despot of the day. Nor is that church slow in availing itself of its opportunities for manifesting its natural spirit of hatred to religious liberty. Throughout France, Protestant churches and Protestant schools are continuing to be discountenanced and oppressed. In the last number of the Christian Times mention is made of two Baptist churches which have been suppressed, because "the Police were not able to watch them;" and, more recently, a third has been interdicted, without even that pretence being put forth. It is not merely the French Papists that are thus active in opposition to light and truth. Some time since the depots of the British and Foreign Bible Society in Pesth and Guns were closed by the Austrian Government, and the further circulation of the Scriptures prohibited. In consequence, 35,000 Bibles, in different languages, are now being exposed for sale at the fair in Breslau. But if Popery discountenances the reading of the Scriptures by the people, it is willing enough to supply them with miracles of its own sort instead. The Universe, the organ of the system at Paris, informs us that the Picture of "the Mother of Mercy" at Rimini has not ceased altogether to wink. But surely the miracle is less than it was, and the circumstance may be regarded as either more or less ominous, that the winking is "not incessantly, but at frequent intervals."

The melancholy case of the Madiais, husband and wife, is justly exciting much interest. To Protestants it is a sad thing to be told of persons condemned to the gallows for refusing to remain in a corrupt church. Mr. Cowan, one of the Members of Parliament for Edinburgh, recently addressed our Government, praying them to interpose in behalf of those worthy sufferers. Government replies, that they have been deeply interested in the case, and anxious to extend aid, which, however, it is the more difficult to do effectively, as they are not British subjects. The Genevan branch of the Evangelical Alliance has this week sent one of its members to join the English deputation to the court of Tuscany to intercede for them. In their letter, these Genevese suggest that deputations from other Protestant kingdoms should join in the movement—a suggestion which it is to be hoped will be acted upon. J. A. BEGG.

THE LAST HOOK FOR SUNDAY.

However multifarious the twisting subterfuges and the quibbling resorts of Sunday sticklers have been, ever since the Reformation, to sustain themselves in their wrong position in regard to the Sabbath, and from which they are constantly driven, like chaff before the wind, it is often amusing, if a matter of such grave importance can be esteemed amusing, to find the interminable quirks and evolutions of the "small fry" of that class of deluded Protestants, to maintain their superstitious reverence for a man-made Sabbath. In turn, we have had the plea, for not yielding to the scriptural injunction—A Jewish Sabbath—No Ante-Mosaic Sabbath—A seventh part of Time—First day of Creation—First day of Time—First day after Creation—First day really the Seventh day—The Fourth Commandment susceptible of change—The Spirit of the Commandment—Moral Law eternal, Positive Law transferable—Resurrection Day—Redemption greater than Creation—Sabbath done away—All days alike under the Gospel Dispensation—and a hundred more ridiculous ones. All these have had their time and their advocates, and have as often been cast aside, and something more tenable been sought for, rather than yield to the "Thus saith the Lord"—a lamentable feature, truly, in the controversy for the sacredness of Sunday.

I had an amusing encounter, the evening after my return from Plainfield, on my recent excursion to attend the Anniversary of the Tract Society, under the following circumstances.

One of our prominent citizens, whose family are Episcopalians, and who, by the way, is a most estimable gentleman, and who has been on the kindest terms with the writer ever since his residence in this place, remarked, on the eve of my trip to Plainfield: "You are going away for a day or two—going to deliver an Address, I understand, to your own people. Well, I hope you will let us see it afterward; I want to know whether you are insiders or outsiders." My reply was, "Sir, you can find out that from this small Tract, (handing No. 13 to him, which I had in my pocket,) whether the Seventh-day People are inside of the Bible for their Sabbath, or whether other denominations are outside of it for theirs."

He took it, and read it attentively during my absence, and on the evening alluded to, I had occasion to call at his residence, professionally. While there, the Episcopalian clergyman dropped in; and soon after being seated, the gentleman of the house remarked: "Well, Doctor, I have read your Tract, and it certainly appears, that you Seventh-day People are really insiders, so far, at least, as regards the Bible; but why make such difficulty in the community on the subject, when the law of the land requires the observance of Sunday?" "Because," I replied, "the observance of the seventh-day Sabbath is required by the Almighty, while the observance of Sunday is only the commandment of man. No man can serve two masters—he must either serve God or Belial—I prefer God's injunction; for no man, nor set of men, have power to confer sacredness on any day, or any religious rite, not expressly established by the Lord God." "But," said the amiable lady of the house, who, quite recently, has embraced the Roman Catholic religion, "the Church may, and our Church has, transfered the Sabbath from the seventh day to the first day of the week." "I grant the fact cheerfully," I replied; "you are right about the fact, but where did your Church get the authority from, to set aside the commandment of Jehovah?" "O, certainly," she retorted, "the Church has the power; else why should other denominations adopt Sunday as the Sabbath? Do you not think so, Mr. ——?" addressing the Episcopal clergyman, who all the while sat a mute listener, but whom I was anxious to hear express himself on the subject, as, on the eve preceding the Sunday before, he remarked to me, that he had no preparation for the next morning. I told him, in pleasantry, that I would give him one of my sermons, which he might preach as often as he chose, as his own, and I would not betray it; and sent Tract No. 13 to him. "No, madam," he replied, "the Church did not transfer the Sabbath, neither has the Bible done it. There is now no Sabbath—it has been done away." "No Sabbath?" the lady uttered in perfect amazement. "No, madam, no Sabbath; but the early Church established Sunday as a Christian Festival, to commemorate the Resurrection, and it cannot be regarded as any thing else than a Church Festival. The Sabbath was but a type, and passed away with the accomplishment of the thing typified in the Redemption." "How could the Sabbath be a type of Redemption," I inquired, "when the Sabbath was instituted before there was any transgression?" It was a poser to him; but still he thought, that somebody of the early church thought, that the Sabbath was not instituted until after the transgression; he, however, passed that point, and went on to maintain the propriety of observing the day solely on the ground of its being a Church Festival. After hearing all he had to say on that subject, I concluded my interview, as my hour for an appointment had arrived, by saying, that I was very happy to agree with both of them in some of their own views on the subject—with the lady, that her church had changed the day of the Sabbath, and equally so with the gentleman, that Sunday is, and always has been, nothing more than a Church Festival, without any other sacredness attaching to it than other saints' days or martyrs' days; but while they placed themselves in that sad predicament, I rejoiced in a more sure word of prophecy, and must adhere to the unadulterated Word of God—the "thus saith the Lord."

But, to come to the close of a note which I did not design to run to half the length it has already been extended, I do like things called by their right names, and I felt rejoiced, on that occasion, to find honesty enough in the clergyman to give Sunday its proper title and place; and were others equally honest, I should not have a word of controversy on the subject; but to hear professed Christians, on such slender grounds, constantly misuse the term Sabbath—applying it to a day the Head of the Church has never "sanctified"—"robbing God" of his own "hallowed" day—is no less unpleasant to my ears, than absolute blasphemy, in taking the name of the Lord in vain. So long as clergymen call it a mere "Church Festival," and the high "Courts of Justice" put it down as a mere "civil rest-day," to be changed to any day of the week at the pleasure of the Legislature, I am content, and shall not war with them; but spare, spare my ears from the desecration, the blasphemy, of calling Sunday the Sabbath; spare, spare my spirit from the awful mockery of trampling on the holy day of the Most High, and calling it an "unclean thing." Of all effrontery—effrontery the most arrant and brazen, to me, is, the bold daring of foisting upon the Sovereign of the Universe—the Majesty of Heaven—a day He never set apart with special blessing—telling Him, in their weekly service, that it is His holy day—this thine own appointed day—thy holy Sabbath—the rest of thy appointing. Can it be, that men, sane, and, on other subjects, sensible men—Protestant clergyman—will continue that effrontery?—or does God wink at it, for a time, and suffer them to go on thus, to let them destroy their error and perverseness by their own follies—their ranting hallucinations and contradictions—to subserve some other great end—to promote a greater and more perfect Reformation—to throw off their Dagon—their traditions, and the many taints of "papacy" which still infest the Puritan church.

The very diversity of opinion among Sunday sticklers, and particularly their bungling incertitude—the want of any distinct views to harmonize and blend their heterodox and discordant subterfuges, in support of their day—removes in a great measure the unpleasantness of the position of those who love and honor the statutes of the Lord. There seems to be no end to the motley phases put on by the advocates for Sunday; and confident am I, that if they could only see, at one glance, the incongruity of their own portraiture, all sensible persons would be disgusted, and become dissatisfied with it, on finding their flimsy foundation—a foundation not based on the Rock of Ages, but on the quicksands of tradition and superstition; and therefore I think it would be a profitable undertaking for one of our Sabbath-keeping brethren, who has leisure and the facilities at hand, to prepare a Tract, or a Volume, On the Variations of Sunday Sacredness. Will not some of the brethren undertake it without delay? W. M. F.

THE AMERICAN BIBLE UNION.

The Third Annual Meeting of the Bible Union was held in New York on the fifth and sixth days of last week; at which the reports of the Treasurer and the Board were presented, and addresses were delivered by a large number of persons, among whom was Eld. Wm. B. Maxson, of Leonardsville, N. Y.

From the Treasurer's Report, it appears that the Union received during the past year (including a balance of $4071 77 in the treasury at the previous report) $20,799 50. Of this sum it expended $5,279 on the revision of the English Scriptures, $747 49 on the Spanish Scriptures, $702 43 on the French Scriptures, $2,000 in appropriations to foreign fields, $1072 16 for printing and general expenses, and $6796 54 for agencies, salaries, traveling expenses, and room-rent—leaving a balance in the treasury of $4201 88.

The Annual Report of the Board states that during the year considerable progress has been made in the revision of the Spanish, French, and English Scriptures. Part of the Spanish is ready for stereotyping; contracts have been made for the revision of the Gospels and Acts in French; and the revisers of the English Testament are at work.

The evidences of personal and sectarian ill feeling were quite plenty in some of the addresses of fifth and sixth days; and we are glad to learn, that the exercises of those days were followed, on Sabbath-day, by a "Conciliation Convention"—a convention, the object of which was stated to be, "to deliberate upon the causes of the present state of feeling that exist in relation to the operations of the American and Foreign Bible Society, and the American Bible Union; and to devise some basis which would promote unity of action, or an amalgamation of the two Societies, and thus remove the unkindness of feeling and heart-burnings which all know had distracted the Church for some few years back." The Convention resulted in the appointment of a Committee of seven—three friends of the Bible Union, and three friends of the Bible Society, who together shall appoint the seventh—to take charge of all documents presented to the Convention, and report upon them at a meeting to be held within the year.

Church Building.—The Congregational Convention, held at Albany last week, had over 450 regular members. Its deliberations were of an interesting and important character, but we have not at hand the documents necessary to give a complete account of them. The following plan was agreed upon for raising $50,000 by collection, on the first Sunday in 1853, as a New Year's offering, to be expended in building churches in the Western States.

1. Pastors to preach on the subject.
2. That seven persons in and about New York be appointed as a Central Committee, to receive and disburse these collections.
3. This Convention to appoint Committees of three from each State, to superintend the collections in their various States.
4. When these collections are all received, should they be less than $50,000, the Committee may take other means to raise the amount.
5. When this full amount has been raised, than the Central Committee be empowered to distribute $8,000 to Ohio, $8,000 to Michigan, $8,000 to Wisconsin, $8,000 to Iowa, $3,000 to Indiana, $8,000 to Minnesota, $3,000 to Missouri.
6. A Committee of five shall be appointed in each State to receive the money and apportion it. No money to be given unless the Church aided be completed without debt, and no appropriation to exceed in amount $300, and the subscription to be double the amount given.

"The Largest Church in Kentucky."—Under this head, the Western Recorder, published at Louisville, Ky., makes the following statement, which furnishes a striking commentary on the oft-repeated slander, that the blacks are not able to govern and maintain themselves:—

"The First African Baptist Church in Lexington numbers seventeen hundred and fifty members. Under the care of Elder London Ferrill, an intelligent, zealous, and highly respected man of color, the church has grown in all the elements of prosperity, and is now as efficient a religious community as any in the State. The discipline is rigid, and the standard of church duty elevated. Harmony characterizes all the proceedings, and a zeal according to knowledge is manifested for the success of the truth by every member. Throughout the city and country, Bro. Ferrill exercises a powerful and salutary influence. He and the other officers of the church are conservators of the peace; and much more useful in preventing lawlessness among the colored population, than all the police. We desire them a still greater measure of success here, and a crown of unfading glory hereafter."

Baptists in Central Europe.—No longer ago than 1835, in the city of Hamburgh, the small number of six persons were baptized by Rev. Barnas Sears, D. D., then an American Baptist student in Germany, now Secretary of the Board of Education in the State of Massachusetts. Now the statistical report for the last year shows that the small band thus and then consecrated to God has become nearly four thousand, numbering as follows: 40 churches; 392 preaching-places; baptized 683; received by letter and restoration 211; died 36; dismissed 217; excluded 268; total number, 3,981.

Installation.—The public installation of Rev. A. D. Gillett as Pastor of the Broadway Baptist Church, New York, took place Wednesday evening, Oct. 6. The attendance was very numerous, and many of the pastors of the various Baptist Churches of the City were present. The exercises opened with prayer by Rev. Dr. Cone, which was followed by a sermon by Rev. Dr. Somers. An address to the Church was then delivered by Rev. Dr. Dowling. The right hand of fellowship was given by Rev. Mr. Taggart, and the Charge to the Pastor by Rev. Dr. Magoon.

Sunday Schools in Ireland.—The annual meeting of the Sunday School Society for Ireland, was held in London, August 23. The report stated that although 250,000 persons had emigrated within the year, the number of attendants at the schools had only fallen off 2000. There are now twenty-eight more schools than ever before, and the Society has under its care 222,268 children and adults.

Sabbath-School Celebration.—We learn from the Banner of the Times, that the Sabbath-Schools of DeRuyter, N. Y., held a union meeting on Fourth-day, Sept. 29. A. V. Bentley, Esq., presided on the occasion, and addresses were delivered by Messrs. Fisher, Cross, and Irish; after which all partook of a collation, provided by the ladies.

The Minutes of the forty-fourth session of the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference are printed. Parcels have been put up for the churches that have paid, and a copy will be sent to the clerk of each of the other churches. Individuals or churches desiring more, will receive them, post-paid, at the rate of one copy for two three-cent postage stamps.

European News.

The following summary embraces the principal items of European news received since our last.

In England, the Duke of Wellington's public funeral is postponed till after the assembling of Parliament on Nov. 11. The office of Commander-in-Chief is given to Lord Hardinge. The other offices held by the Duke have been distributed among various notabilities, Prince Albert getting one.

Sir Henry Bulwer has been to Rome to see the Papal Government. Cardinal Antonelli told him no closer relations could be established between Rome and England, till a Papal nuncio, were recognized at St. James. Sir Henry was also refused a sight of the papers in the case of Murray, an Englishman under condemnation of death in Rome.

Jenny Lind has given 400,000 rix dollars, or $100,000, to establish girls' schools in Sweden. It will be remembered that to this object she was said to have devoted the proceeds of her visit to America. This sum is certainly much less than she made in this country.

Ship Hoogley, 4th May from Melbourne, Port Philip, had arrived in the Thames with 6,643 ounces of gold, making, with the Douglas, 11,000 previously reported, an arrival within the week of 17,643 ounces, valued at £70,500.

Dr. John Stokoe, one of the physicians appointed by the British Government to attend Napoleon at St. Helena, died the other day.

Snow has already fallen in the North of Scotland. At Balmoral, on the 20th, there was a sprinkling.

Letters from Stratsburg of Sept. 20th, bring details of the inundation of the Rhine. The country was completely submerged to an extent of 40 kilometers. Six villages were under water, and a seventh appeared as an island in the center of a lake. Some of the embankments had been washed away, but at last accounts, by telegraph, the flood was subsiding. Letters from Lausanne and Fridau, Switzerland, also complain of heavy freshets there

Accounts from the Ile de la Reünion, (Bourbon,) are to 9th July. Small-pox was raging there at that date. A French vessel, the Grenouille, of Marseilles, has been pillaged and burned on the Western coast of Madagascar; the captain and part of the crew had been massacred, and one man taken prisoner by the chief or king of Ménahé. The outrage will doubtless produce severe retribution on the part of France.

"Uncle Tom's Cabin" in Europe.—The London Times, of Sept. 5, contains a statement from Clarke & Co., foreign booksellers, of the way "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was introduced to British readers, and of what they are doing to circulate it. As everything connected with this extraordinary book is a matter of general interest, we copy a part of the statement:—

An early copy was sent from America, the latter end of last April, to Mr. Bogue, the publisher, and was offered by him to Mr. Gilpin, late of Bishopsgate-st. Being declined by Mr. Gilpin, Mr. Bogue offered it to Mr. Henry Vizetelly; and by the latter gentleman it was eventually published for us. Before printing it, however, as there was one night allowed for decision, one volume was taken home to be read by Mr. Henry Vizetelly, and the other by Mr. Salisbury printer, of Bouverie-st. The report of the latter gentlemen, the following morning, to quote his own words, was, "I sat up till four in the morning reading the book, and the interest I felt was expressed one moment by laughter, another by tears; but thinking it might be my weakness and not the power of the author that affected me, I thought I would try the effect upon my wife, (rather a strong-minded woman.) I accordingly woke her up, and read a few chapters. Finding that the interest of the story kept her awake, and that she, too, laughed, and shed a tear occasionally, I settled in my mind that it was a book which ought and might with safety be printed." Mr. Henry Vizetelly's opinion coincided with Mr. Salisbury's; and to the latter gentleman it was confided to be brought out instantly. The week following the book was produced, and an edition of 5,000 worked off. It made no stir until the middle of June, although we advertised it very extensively. From June it began to make way, and sold at the rate of 1,000 per week during July. In August the demand became very great, which went on increasing to the 20th, at which time it became perfectly overwhelming. We have now about 400 people employed, in some way or other, upon the book, and about 17 printing machines, besides hand-presses.

Trouble with Cuba.—The recent course of the Captain-General of Cuba toward the ship Cornelia and the steamship Empire City threatens to make trouble between the United States and Cuba. The following are the facts, as near as they can now be ascertained:

The ship Cornelia was arrested and searched in the harbor of Havana on the charge of having a passenger on board without a passport; the man was sought for and not found, but in his stead another who was provided with a passport was seized, dragged from the protection of the American flag, and cast into prison. More than this, the letter-bag of the ship was broken open and ransacked, and those letters which the police suspected of evil were taken from it.

The case of the Empire City is less flagrantly insulting, but none the less calculated to produce indignation. It seems this ship employs a Mr. Smith, as Purser, and that the Captain-General had taken a dislike to Mr. Smith for having reported some trifling piece of news to the papers in New York, and required his dismissal. Capt. Porter, of the steamer, and his owners, refused to comply with the requirement. Hereupon, the Captain-General forbids the Empire City to come into the Harbor, and when she appears, orders her off, and will not allow either passengers or mails to be landed. Accordingly, Capt. Porter is compelled to take them to New Orleans, at great loss and inconvenience to them as well as to himself.

The Hudson River Railroad was completed and formally opened to Albany one year ago. Notwithstanding the extraordinary competition for freight and passengers, from the old established and popular channels, and the want of experience incident to the working of all railroads in their early stages, yet the receipts for the year ending Sept. 30, were $1,054,142 71.

The Disasters on the Hudson River.—In New York, on the 2d inst., the Grand Jury made a presentment to the U. S. Court in relation to the recent disasters on the Hudson River. The Jury say, that the North River boats are in the constant habit of violating the provision of the act of 1838, requiring that whenever a boat stops, steam shall be blown off, so as to keep the pressure as low as when the boat was under headway. This violation of the law for the safety of life, they say, "calls for the severest reprobation on the part of the community at large, and a vigorous exaction of the statutory penalties by the law officers of the Government." They express the opinion, that in case of life lost by this neglect, the parties will be subject to the legal and moral guilt of manslaughter. The Jury further state, that no adequate provision is made on steamboats for extinguishing fires or for escape from the boat; that there is no efficient system of subordination among officers and crew, and no uniform or badge whereby officers may be known; that officers are selected without proper regard to those qualities of self-possession, energy, &c., which are necessary to inspire confidence among passengers in cases of difficulty and danger; and they suggest that confidence be withheld from these modes of travel, until an improved system of management shall prevail. They finally refer to the constant racing against the railroads, and against time, which has for a long period prevailed; and they recommend a thorough exercise of public opinion as a remedy.

N. Y. State Temperance Alliance.—A meeting of the New York State Temperance Alliance is to be held at the city of Rochester, on the 19th inst., commencing at 10 A. M., when the course to be pursued by the Alliance respecting the approaching election will be determined upon. A General Convention of the friends of Temperance will be held at the same place on the following day, to which all pledged Temperance men, being legal voters, are invited. Public meetings will be held on the evenings of both days, and addresses delivered by eminent speakers from different parts of the State.

Liberty Party Nominations.—Liberty Party National and State Conventions have been held in Syracuse. The former nominated Wm. Goodell, of New York, for President, and S. M. Piper, of Virginia, for Vice-President. The latter nominated the following State ticket: For Governor, Wm. R. Smith, of Wayne; for Lieut. Governor, J. Preston Adams, of Jefferson; for Canal Commissioner, Charles Wheaton, of Onondaga; for State Prison Inspector, Wm. Shafcott, of Cayuga. Both Conventions adopted resolutions reäffirming the old issues of the Liberty Party.

SUMMARY.

The Hanoverian Consul at Baltimore has received information of the arrest, in Hanover, of a man named Frederick Nolecke, recently returned there from this country, and having in his possession $2,000 in American coin, a large gold medal, and a quantity of valuable jewelry—the manner of acquiring which he would give no satisfactory account of. He was an old convict in Hanover, and while in this country was arrested several times. He resided principally in Philadelphia and Baltimore. It is thought he may have been concerned in the Portsmouth (Va.) Bank robbery, and that the medal in his possession may be the Clay medal, which was stolen in New York.

We learn from the Kendall County (Ill.) Courier, that a bed of coal has recently been discovered about five miles south of Oswego. It was struck into by a person engaged in digging a well. The width of the vein has not been ascertained, but it was found to be six feet in thickness, and lies only five feet below the surface. Specimens of it had been tried in Oswego and pronounced to be a very superior article—equally as good as Pennsylvania coal. Should future explorations prove the existence of any considerable body of coal, of this character, so near Chicago, the importance of the discovery can scarcely be over-estimated.

The total taxation of the city of New York for 1852 amounts to more than the ordinary expenses (exclusive of schools and interest on debts) of twenty-seven States; more than the ordinary expenses of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Texas, California, Arkansas, Tennessee, Missouri, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Michigan! The actual expenses of all the States for 1850 were $5,673,121; the expenses of the city of New York in 1852 will be nearly $4,000,000.

The village of Hermann, in Missouri, is the center of a vine-growing district originally settled some fourteen years ago by a company of Germans. The soil of the country was poor, and did not yield good crops of grain or tobacco, and many of the first settlers left. In 1845, the experiment of grape culture on the hills—which are from 300 to 600 feet high, with a southern exposure—was tried, and successfully. There are now 437 acres devoted to the grape, and the manufacture of wine is carried on to a considerable extent. The village contains about 1,200 inhabitants.

The British Friend, the organ of the society of Friends, gives a notice of a somewhat singular fund—a fund for removing obstructions to matrimony among the lower class of Friends. A sum of £1800 has been raised, the interest of which is to be disposed of, according to the original purpose, "by a deed poll entered into by the subscribers." Ten pounds are paid to every woman and man, two years members of certain meetings, provided they are not otherwise worth £30.

During the month of September just closed, there arrived at this port 36,777 alien passengers from various foreign countries. By comparison with the corresponding month last year, there is shown an increase this year of 3191. The total increase this year in immigration, thus far, from the 1st of January last, over the year 1851 during a corresponding period, is 23,624.

Mr. Norton Peters, of Missouri, recently made a handsome speculation by driving sheep over-land to California. He started with 2500 sheep, and at Salt Lake he sheared them, and sold the wool for $2500. On reaching California, with 2000 of them in good condition, he was offered $18 per head for the lot, which he refused, being sure of higher prices.

Some Down-East operator has got a way of setting glass without putty. The window sash is made entirely of wood, the outside permanent. The inside is framed in such a manner that the parts can be readily removed, for the purpose of inserted the glass, which is placed between slips of India Rubber, which, when the parts of the sash are replaced, causes the glass to be perfectly firm. The moveable parts of the sash are secured to their place by a knob-screw, which makes a pretty finish.

Among recent importations at this port from South America are three specimens of the Electrical Eel. They were imported in a hogshead of mud and water from the Amazon, in which river they were captured. They were taken by the natives in baskets. The largest is four feet long, and as thick as a man's arm. Upon an iron rod (held in the hand) being applied to the electric organs of the fish, a shock is produced, proportioned in strength to the degree in which they are irritated.

Mr. McKay, of East Boston, is now at work upon a clipper-ship which will surpass in size and sharpness every merchant-ship now afloat or known to be in course of construction. She will be 300 feet long, have 50 feet breadth of beam, 28 feet depth of hold, with three decks, and will register over three thousand tons. She will be diagonally braced with iron, and built in every particular equal in strength to the best of ocean steamers.

An Oregon correspondent of the Com. Adv., in speaking of the famous Oregon Land Law, which gives a mile square of land to every actual settler married before a certain date, says that it set the whole country astir, and everybody got married that could. The scarcity of marriageable females, however, was such that in some instances girls of 14, 13, 12 and 11 years of age, were married, in order to secure the land perquisites!

At New Orleans, Oct. 7, Judge McCaleb rendered a decision on the McDonough will case, declaring null and void the claims of New Orleans, Baltimore, Louisiana and Maryland. The will is completely broken, and the property goes to the heirs at law. In declaring the share belonging to each heir, the executors were ordered to account for past administration to a Master in Chancery.

On Sunday night, Oct. 3, a little girl, scarcely 5 years of age, was found by the Sixteenth Ward Police, N. Y., in one of the streets of that Ward, having since the death of her mother, some weeks since, been deserted by her inhuman father, and left to provide for herself. She had been sleeping in wagons, boxes, or in almost any thing that would afford her a shelter. She was taken to the Alms-House to be provided for.

The Exchange Office of Mr. George Anderson, No. 7 Wall-st., N. Y., was robbed on Saturday afternoon, Oct. 2, of $11,000 in gold coin, by some daring thief, who entered the front door with a false key during a temporary absence of Mr. Anderson from his office, and stole the money from an iron chest, and then effected his escape.

Col. The Two Houses.

A wise man on a rock
Had firmly built his house; and there he slept
In safety, while the tempest o'er it swept;
Still it withstood the shock
Of stormy winds; oft the imperious flood
Had rushed in vain against it—there it stood.

So shall that man repose
In safety, whose immortal hopes are built
On him who has atoned for all his guilt,
And vanished all his foes;
No storms alarm, no terrors fill his breast;
On that firm rock he can in safety rest.

A fool upon the sand
Had built a splendid mansion, broad and high:
And there the home of mirth and revelry
Securely seemed to stand;
There he enjoyed his pleasure and repose,
And trembled only when a storm arose.

A little while it stood;
And then the rain came down, and the winds beat
Vehemently upon that country-seat;
And the strong, rushing flood,
With overwhelming and resistless swell,
Washed out the frail foundation—and it fell.

So falls the splendid tower
Of human hope, when man presumes to place
His own defective works beneath its base;
In that tremendous hour
When the terrific storm of death shall frown
And beat upon it, it must tumble down. [Ohio Obs.

Death of a Slave Trader.

Mr. Thomas Hutton, of London, in a paper presented to Parliament on the destruction of Lagos, thus sketches the life of Da Souza, one of the most active and influential slave traders on the coast of Africa :—

M. Da Souza, the notorious slave dealer, died about fifteen months ago; this man was in his 81st year when he died. He went to Whydah in the year 1792, in his 24th year. Various have been the rumors that occasioned his going there; he, however, himself once told me he came out as Secretary under the Portugese Government to their fort in Whydah, and remained three years in that service, and then returned to the Brazils, where I imagined he was born. He wished it supposed he was a Spaniard by birth, and was always treated so in courtesy, and styled Don.

The Portugese did not long continue to support their Government in Whydah, and the slave trade there soon fell into the hands of the most enterprising, the most so of whom was M. Da Souza. He had for many years an extraordinary run of good luck, and it was imagined had amassed a large fortune. His fame as a slave dealer gained him unlimited credit in Havana and Brazil, and ship after ship arrived from those places at Popo, Whydah, and Lagos, consigned to him, generally with full cargoes of merchandise and specie; the goods were recklessly landed in bamboo storehouses on the beach.

The accumulated cargoes brought upon him an immense amount of debt; of this he appeared utterly regardless, so long as it had the desired effect upon the natives to cause them to consider him possessed of inexhaustible wealth, and for the King of Dahomey to imagine the same, on whom he lavished vast sums of wealth, but who in return could never at any time supply more than a fraction of the amount of slaves for the large amount of property that was sent to him. Frequently from thirty to forty ships, in the year 1826, were lying in the roadsteads of Whydah, all consigned to Da Souza, who had landed all their cargoes, but in return could seldom supply more than four or five cargoes of slaves.

Many of the ships, after staying out twenty months to two years, from their light construction, went to pieces on the beach; others lost all their crews and were abandoned; some became prizes, and the general result was, as no account was kept whatever of cargoes landed, every species of extravagance, and expenditure took place, to the ruin of the owners. Some of them sent out supercargoes to see what the former were about. Frequently the fate of the second supercargo and ship and cargo went the way of the first. So lucrative, however, was the profit on slaves, or the want of them so much required, that some years elapsed before these reckless consignees to Da Souza began to grow cautious—in fact, not before many were ruined. In the interim a more rigid law had been passed respecting the capture of slave-tracing vessels.

The King of Dahomey, who thus had had, for years past, countless wealth poured in upon him, became at last exacting, when the rapid torrent ceased to flow as fast as formerly, and it took some years before he could, in the least, comprehend the causes that had diminished the supplies to his agent Da Souza, who had years before virtually become so, to have the monopoly of the trade, and who went annually to Dahomey, with tribute to the king, and vast supplies to his chiefs, to furnish them means for the next slave hunt. Year after year these supplies became gradually less; Da Souza having become gradually poorer, and troubled with a host of creditors in the Havana and Brazils. The principals or consignees themselves, in many instances, came to Whydah to claim their debts.

Da Souza, keeping no accounts, generally denied all knowledge of the parties or the business on which they had come; frequently he would absent himself, or be in Dahomey months, when a party of creditors arrived from the Havana or Brazils. Yet such was the nature of the trade, a lucky voyage or two enabled him to pacify the clamors of these distressed creditors. He treated them with country presents and an unbounded hospitality, and with tales of the endless resources of the king, who would at any time send him as many slaves as he pleased.

Various enactments took place, the cruisers were more vigilant than ever, and matters grew worse and worse. Merchants in the Havana sent agents to have interviews with the King; heavy complaints were made against Da Souza, which, for policy's sake, the King would not listen to, he himself not being the rightful successor, but upheld by Da Souza's influence and vast presents to the chiefs.

At last, after a few more years, it was arranged that agents from the Havana and Brazils might settle at Whydah, and Da Souza should give up shipping slaves, but to receive a commission of a doubloon for every slave that was shipped. On this he lived in the later years of his life. He had also raised up duties or contributions on every native who held a slave, as a certain amount per head, which enabled him latterly to keep up some appearance before the King and his chiefs; but this grew less and less, until he actually became tortured with the thought of want. When he died his stores were empty.

The King of Dahomey sent to have his property taken up to him, and his chiefs entered into the house, and all that could be found was simply a little furniture and some plate; but neither money, goods, nor any thing of value. This lesson has been most salutary to the King and his chiefs, to see that the man whom they considered was possessed of endless wealth, had died without the value of a keg of gunpowder in his stores to be fired over his remains, which is with them considered extreme poverty; thus confounding them, and shaking their confidence in the stability of the slave trade. Such was the end of one of the greatest slave-dealers of modern times.

Extract from a Whaleman's Journal.

Among the ailments to which sperm whales are subject, is the jumping tooth-ache. It operates on their nervous system as it does upon those of mankind, rendering them crabbed and fractious. Just at daybreak one morning, while we were cruising on the "off-shore" ground, a violent commotion in the water about two miles ahead, resembling breakers, attracted attention. It continued unabated till within fifty rods of it, when a sperm whale (for such it proved to be) threw his entire body into the air and fell back into his native element with a tremendous report. Of course the yards were hauled aback, and the boats lowered, but several minutes elapsed before it was deemed prudent to approach the monster. Finding however, that he had no idea of becoming quiet, we advanced with caution, and succeeded in securing one iron firmly in his back, which rendered him more restless. Giving him plenty of slack line, we removed to a respectful distance, hoping he would sound or retreat, but he was not disposed to do either. So, taking our oars, we pulled sufficiently near to give the boat-header an opportunity to lance him. He seemed to be aware of our intention, for he turned and rushed toward us with the design of giving us a fowing, which we narrowly escaped. During the next half hour he chased us, and it was with much difficulty that we avoided him. When near us he turned on his back and raised his jaw, bringing to view two handsome rows of ivory. Among terrific objects an enraged whale holds a prominent place.

An hour passed in unavailing attempts to accomplish the desired object, the whale becoming more furious, and the hope of conquering him growing fainter. At length, while the attention of the monster was directed towards us, the mate came upon him in an opposite direction and dealt him a death wound, relieving us of a burden of anxiety, which indicated itself in the pallid countenances and nervous agitation of the boat's crew. He was very reluctant to yield and death struggle was long and violent. If a cat has nine lives, as is sometimes remarked, that fellow had nineteen.

Before night his blubber was in the try-pots, and his jaw was stripped of its covering. On extracting the teeth, the cause of his singular movement was revealed. The cavities in several contained a large number of worms, an eighth of an inch in length. The teeth were perfectly sound, but the marrow or nerve of the tooth, which was an inch in diameter at the lower extremity, was in many of them entirely consumed by the insects that seemed to have bred there. Mr. Mechi's Model Farm.

Yesterday, (says the London Morning Post,) a large party of agriculturists and others assembled at Tiptree Hall, in pursuance of an invitation, to examine the crops on Mr. Mechi's model farm—the new system of irrigation lately adopted by him—and the trial of some agricultural machinery.

The company arrived about 11 o'clock, and having partaken of refreshment, proceeded to view Mr. Mechi's farm, which extends over 172 acres of ground, which, ten years since, was a barren waste. About one-half of this ground now bears a luxuriant wheat crop, the remainder being occupied with clover, mangel, cabbage, swedes, &c., all bearing testimony to the excellence of the management. The company was first conducted through the wheat fields, in which Mr. Mechi explained, and showed by practical experiment, how he throws liquid manure over the land by means of steam-power and a small hose. This manure, the refuse of the house and the farm, is collected in a tank, and kept in constant agitation by means of compressed air. It is then mixed with water, and distributed over the farm, from various standards, by hose, as occasion may require, Mr. Mechi maintaining that it tends materially to improve the crops, as the sewage of manure, being delivered on the land in a liquid state, immediately sinks into it, and, from "chemical affinity," combines with the earth. The length of each hose, from the standards of which we have spoken, is about 200 feet, and the manure is thrown in a shower a distance of about 60 feet more. Mr. Mechi stated, that though applying this liquid manure to his gardening operations, he had not done so to his wheat until some of it was accidentally allowed to run over a portion of the land, and the effect in improving the value of the crop was so instantaneous and undeniable that he determined to apply it throughout, and the result was, that his wheat, which before was extremely backward, had at once sprung into a magnificent crop. The quantity of wheat sown was about five pecks to the acre, of which nearly two-thirds was supposed to have been destroyed by the wire worm, yet it was expected to produce, at an average, about five quarters per acre.

The reaping machines of Messrs. M'Cormick and Mr. Hussey as manufactured by Messrs. Crosshill and Mr. Garrett were then tried, and all of them cut the wheat with the utmost expedition and regularity, but that of Mr. Crosshill appeared to us to be most valuable, from the manner in which the corn, when reaped, was laid in heaps by the laborers to form into sheaves. A trial of Mr. Hussey's machine, as manufactured by Mr. Garrett, having also been made on the clover, which it cut equally well, Mr. Mechi took the company over his clover, mangel, cabbage, and swede fields, the whole of which were in excellent order—the majority of them having been treated with the liquid manure only—and the host explained that it was his intention to thin the swedes and cabbages, in order to give the remaining crop room and nourishment to grow to a greater size. Mr. Mechi contends that, under the system adopted upon this farm, the whole of the filth and garbage of London and other large towns might be immediately rendered valuable for manuring the adjacent country districts, thereby affording an advantage to both, to the one by cleansing, and the other by fertilizing.

The Miner's Journal estimates the receipts of the Reading Railroad this year at two millions and a half of dollars.

Barrows' Rotary Steam Engine.

On Wednesday, Sept. 22, at the invitation of Ebenezer Barrows, Esq., we accompanied him on the first trial trip of his new miniature steamboat Rotary, fitted with his improved rotary engine. The boat is 70 feet long, and the engine cylinder only 30 inches in diameter, and 12 inches in length, with a steam way of only 2¼ inches in depth, or of an area of 27 square inches, and as the steam in this passage acts upon only two pistons at once, the entire surface acted on by the steam is only 54 square inches, or about equal to that of a cylinder 8 inches in diameter. With an average pressure of about 45 pounds to the square inch, the boat was propelled, against a strong head wind and tide, at an average rate of about nine miles an hour—the trip from the Battery to Yonkers and back, about 36 miles, against tide both ways, occupying 4 hours and 5 minutes; the upward passage being against a strong head wind. During a great portion of the trip, the speed was much higher than that we have given as the average made, and must have reached 11 or 12 miles an hour, but owing to the quality of the coal provided, the fire had to be almost entirely withdrawn soon after starting, the fire-bars being so covered with clinkers as to almost entirely stop the draught, and during this time the steam was unavoidably allowed to descend to 22 lbs.

On the fire being renewed, the boiler, a very small one, got up steam to 90 lbs., the engine working the whole time, and cold water being continually fed in. We think it necessary, in justice to Mr. B., to state the disadvantages under which his experiment was made. The consumption of coal required to propel this boat is only about 110 lbs. per hour. The engine throughout worked beautifully and regularly, and we do not recollect ever having been in any steam vessel where the vibration was so imperceptible. The room taken up by the machinery is less than that of an ordinary two-horse power engine, so that the economy of space is great.

Upon the whole, we think the experiment, especially as a first one, was very successful, and under more favorable circumstances a vastly better result will be accomplished. The engine, notwithstanding the small area of steam surface, has been proved to be capable of propelling the boat with a very low pressure of steam. We are assured by Mr. B. that the friction of the engine is so slight that it only requires a pressure of two and a half pounds to overcome it and set the engine in motion; this is about one-half the friction allowed by engineers. With a large vessel there is no doubt that an extremely high speed could be obtained. [Scientific American.

"Poor Poll."

There was a lady who had buried all her relatives, and who lived secluded from the world, with no other companion than a parrot of the largest and most beautiful species. This bird had been her mistress' favorite from infancy, and besides being expert in a variety of pleasing tricks, was fondly affectionate and uncommonly docile. Between the two was that strength of attachment which only those beings feel who have but a single object to love in all the wide world, whose affections are undivided.

Few persons, probably, have ever attempted to make a parrot useful; but this one, so well taught and obedient was she, would bring to her mistress' order any small article, such as a thimble or spool of thread, and again, when commanded, return it to its place. Thus they lived—Poll and her mistress—year after year, few persons ever intruding upon their solitude.

But one day a gentleman, who was passing, had his attention attracted to the house by the unnatural screeching of the bird, and its wild fluttering against the window. On entering, he found Sarah, the mistress, lying upon her bed very ill—dying. She had only sufficient strength to say that she had not left her bed for more than a week, and that Polly had all the while furnished her with food from a closet in the room, till to-night, finding her dear mistress could eat nothing, she had given the alarm and summoned aid. Begging the gentleman to be kind to poor Poll, Sarah died.

Some women came and prepared the body for the grave. From her cage just by the head of the bed, the bird, silent and apparently wondering, watched the proceedings, and when all was finished, and she saw her beloved mistress lying there so still, she addressed her with the customary "Good night, Sarah," many times repeated,

At last, as though convinced that the ever kind voice would reply to her no more, and like one who feels that henceforth he is desolate, friendless, the parrot turned sorrowfully away, and in plaintive tones bemoaned herself; "Poor Poll! poor, poor Poll!"

Sleep.

No person of active mind should try to prevent sleep, which in such persons only comes when rest is indispensable to the continuance of health. In fact sleep once in twenty-four hours is as essential to the existence of mammalia as the momentary respiration of fresh air. The most unfavorable condition for sleep cannot prevent its approach. Coachmen slumber on their coaches, and couriers on their horses, whilst soldiers fall asleep on the field of battle, amidst all the noise of artillery and the tumult of war. During the retreat of Sir John More, several of the British soldiers were reported to have fallen asleep upon the march, and yet they continued walking onward. The most violent passions and excitement of mind cannot preserve even powerful minds from sleep; thus Alexander the Great slept on the field of Arbela, and Napoleon on that of Austerlitz. Even stripes and torture cannot keep off sleep, as criminals have been known to sleep on the rack. Noises which serve at first to drive away sleep, soon become indispensable to its existence; thus a stage coach stopping to change horses, wakes all the passengers. The proprietor of an iron forge, who slept close to the din of hammers, forges, and blast furnaces, would awake if there was any interruption to them during the night; and a sick miller, who had his mill stopped on that account, passed sleepless nights until the mill resumed its usual noise. Homer, in the Iliad, elegantly represents sleep as overcoming all men, and even the gods, excepting Jupiter alone.

The length of time passed in sleep is not the same for all men; it varies in different individuals and at different ages; but it cannot be determined from the time passed in sleep, relative to the strength or energy of the functions of the body or mind. From six to nine hours is the average proportion, yet the Roman Emperor, Caligula, slept only three hours, Frederick of Prussia and Dr. John Hunter, consumed only four or five hours in repose, while the great Scipio slept during eight. A rich and lazy citizen will slumber from ten to twelve hours daily. It is during infancy that sleep is longest and most profound. Women also sleep longer than men, and young men longer than old. Sleep is driven away during convalescence, after a long sickness, by a long fasting and abuse of coffee. The sleepless nights of old age are almost proverbial. It would appear that carnivorous animals sleep in general longer than the herbivorous, as the superior activity of the muscles and senses of the former seem more especially to require repair. Good News for Dyspeptics.

As the United States is par excellence the land of dyspepsia, the following may be of interest :—

Among the papers read at the last sitting of the Paris Academy of Sciences, was one by M. Corrisart, the great nephew of the celebrated man of that name, on the improvement of the digestion of weak stomachs by the use of the gastric juice taken from animals. A great deal has been said and written on this subject, but as yet we have very few, if any, proofs of the means as a general plan of treatment, although there may have been cases in which the gastric juice taken from the bodies of slaughtered domestic animals may have been used by man with temporary advantage. Nor does M. Corrisart furnish any practical proofs of the correctness of his theory. He contents himself with discussion, but appears to have no doubt in his own mind that indigestion in the human stomach arises entirely from the want of a sufficient quantity of gastric juice, and that if the deficiency were supplied from the sources of which he speaks, the digestion would be perfect. As this gastric juice, in its natural state, is of a taste and appearance which would be repulsive to most patients, M. Corrisart has proposed that it shall be reduced to the state of powder paste, &c., and mixed with the elements.

The idol Juggernaut is probably the coarsest image in India. The figure does not extend below the loins; it has no hands, but two stumps in the place of arms, on which the priests at times fasten hands of gold. The priests, perhaps mortified that the object of their adorations should be so hideous, attempt to account for it in the following manner, "Some thousands of years ago, Maharaja applied to the celebrated manufacturer of gods to make a new idol. This request was granted, on condition that the Maharaja should be very patient, and not interrupt the work, as it could never be completed if any attempt was made to see the progress. The caution was not duly attended to. The prince endeavored to see what progress had been made, and it became necessary that he should be satisfied with the imperfect image. When two new moons occur in A'shad, (part of June and July,) which is said to happen about once in seventeen years, a new idol is made. A nimb tree is sought for in the forests, on which no crow or carrion bird was ever perched; it is known to the initiated by certain signs! This is prepared into a proper form by common carpenters, and is then intrusted to certain priests, who are protected from all intrusion; the process is a great mystery. One man is selected to take out of the old idol a small box, containing the spirit, which is conveyed inside the new; the man who does this is always removed from this world before the end of the year." The head clerk of Puri, himself a Hindoo, says that this box contains a small quantity of quicksilver, said to be the spirit of the god. As the process of renewing the body of the idol is rather an expensive one, the ceremony costing from $2,500 to $3,000, it is quite likely may not again take place.

Damages against a Town.

Maria E. Mason recently brought a suit against the town of Easthampton, Mass., for the recovery of damages, ($10,000 being claimed by the plaintiff,) for an injury received by the upsetting of a sleigh, while riding on a road in said town. It was referred by a rule of Court to referees. At the time of the accident, (December, 1850,) the plaintiff being then a teacher in the Easthampton Seminary, was returning in company with others from Northampton. Several sticks of timber had been placed on the edge of the road, on both sides, within the limits of the road, but not within the road as ordinarily traveled. They were put there to be used on a bridge, a few rods distant, then undergoing repairs. There were four timbers on one side of the road and three on the other, leaving a distance between them, for the passing of vehicles, of about fourteen feet. The right runner of the sleigh struck the end of one of the timbers, and thereby the sleigh was turned over, and the plaintiff thrown out with such violence as to occasion a serious injury to the hip-joint, from which she has been suffering, more or less, ever since. The defendant relied upon two grounds of defense: 1. That there was no such defect or obstruction in the way as to make the town liable; 2. That there was a want of proper care and prudence in driving. Evidence was also introduced bearing upon the question of damages, (in case the above points were decided against the town,) in reference to the extent of the injury and the probability of ultimate recovery. The case was submitted, by mutual consent, without argument; and the referees awarded to the plaintiff of the sum $930 for damages, and the costs of the suit.

THE LINE-OF-BATTLE SHIP PENNSYLVANIA.—This ship, which cost the nation $800,000, built at Philadelphia in 1835, is now lying at the Norfolk Navy Yard, and has recently been converted into a ball-room for the entertainment of the officers on that station. She is the largest ship in the American Navy, and the most costly. She carries 140 guns, and the only voyage she ever made was from Philadelphia to Norfolk. A correspondent of the Utica Gazette, in writing from Norfolk, Sept. 10, speaks of the ship as follows: The narrow inlet, which is her present quarters, not allowing her to swing at her anchor with the tide, and exposing constantly the same side to the sun, her timbers have decayed, and would require an immense outlay to replace. The sand has formed bars around her, the oysters have taken up their beds beside her and fastened her to the bottom, and if she ever moves again, it will be done by carrying the country with her.

"At the last drawing of the Spanish State Lottery, eight poor little Savoyards, who gained their livelihood as shoeblacks at Barcelona, won the great prize—40,000 piasters, about $39,000. One of them heard of it while on the way to clean a gentleman's boots. He went on and finished his work, took his two quartos—about a cent—for it, and then hunted up his companions to give them the joyous news. On the way he met the poor widow—rich in children—of a former official, who, when she was in prosperity, had done much for the Savoyard, and once when he was sick, had received him into her house and nursed him. He now hastened to the widow, and made known to her his good fortune, and the end of their sorrows. He afterward held a council with his friends to decide in what way to render her their assistance, and proposed that they should give her 10,000 piasters from the common stock. Without hesitation the proposal was accepted, and then away to the Church to thank God for their good fortune. They afterward divided the remaining 30,000 piasters equally, and immediately left Barcelona for Savoy via Marseilles, in the steamboat."

AN EVENTFUL LIFE.—Gen. Thomas Jefferson Sutherland died at Iowa Mission, Nebraska Territory, on Sept. 7th. The General had an eventful life of it. In youth he is said to have served under Bolivar in the war of Columbian liberation, rising to the rank of lieutenant. He afterward figured largely in the Anti-Masonic excitement. Our own first acquaintance with him was a lawyer of low standing at the bar of Erie Co., in this State. In 1837 he embarked as a volunteer patriot in the Canadian rebellion, and served on Navy Island under Mackenzie and Van Rensselaer, but without much distinction. When that enterprize was abandoned, he went up Lake Erie with a view to a flank movement against the British forces. Here it was that he became a General, and was soon after taken captive by Col. Prince of the Canadian Militia, on the ice off Sandwich. His surrender gave great dissatisfaction to his followers, who thought him deficient in bravery and stratagic qualities. The Canadian court sentenced him to transportation, and we believe he spent some time in New South Wales, whence, with some of his companions, he was pardoned on the intercession of our Minister at London. For the last year or two he has been living in the wilds of Nebraska.

VARIETY.

We have seen the drawings of a new invention, which seems promising, for preventing great damage by railroad collisions. The idea is to have the ends of the cars and platforms built with one corner projecting far beyond the other, or diagonally instead of square. Accordingly, when they come together with great violence, the force of the shock will be relieved, and the cars, instead of breaking to pieces, will simply shove each other off the track. In the projecting corner the brakeman is to stand, where, in a collision, his position will be free from danger. The inventor is Mr. Seleck, of Greenwich, Conn.

An old copper mine of extraordinary richness has recently been discovered on what is called the Hill Vein, in the Lake Superior country. Certain circumstances, recently brought to light by its discovery, indicate that it was worked long before the discovery of America by Columbus. The richness of the mine may be imagined from the fact that Mr. Mendlebaum, the manager, in causing it to be explored, had a mass of copper, which weighed 2,390 pounds, removed from the surface of the vein. There is certainly much mystery connected with these ancient traces of mining operations, discovered, from time to time, in the copper region of Lake Superior.

The Warsaw New Yorker says that Mr. Augustus Watrow, of that town, made a wager of his rifle, a seven shooter, against the sum of eighty dollars, that he could fire, at six rods distance, inside of a two shilling piece, seven shots in ten seconds. It was done in eight seconds, and he won his money. This we call sharp-shooting. At another time, while in Pennsylvania, on his annual hunting tour, he started a number of deer. Without re-loading, or leaving his tracks, he killed four of them, and shot the horns from another.

On the 28th ult. William H. F. Heare, of Hampshire County, Va., put an end to his existence in a very singular manner. Having raised all but the bottom rail of a fence near to the house in which he resided, he inserted in the opening a rock, which kept the rails far enough apart to allow him to place his neck between them. He then (so it is supposed) took another rock and knocked out the one which he had placed between the rails, which, falling down on his neck, caused suffocation.

"Numerically, madam, what is the population of Riverhead?" "There is a considerable number of Presbyterians," she replied, "a few Methodists, some Baptists, and a few Sweedenborgers tew." Enlightened by her direct and off-handed answer, I then asked, "What is the orthodox and evangelical state of the community in the village?" "Well, some goes for Scott, and some for Fillmore; and Webster, he's got a few friends tew, I guess."

Mr Charles Mowry, of Auburn, issues a card to the following effect: "The subscriber, of this city, has invented an arrangement by which the elasticity of compressed air can be used to propel railroad engines any distance required. The air is compressed by water power, or otherwise, and carried in a tube or pipe the whole length of the road. I have taken measures to secure the patent right for the same."

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

The Universal Observance of the Sabbath in Millennial Times.

Although we have shown that the Sabbath was given by God to our first parents, and was instituted in the garden of Eden ere it was polluted by man's trangression—and that it is fitted and was designed to hold an important place in relation to the whole human family—yet, looking at the fact that a general apostasy of the church of Christ has taken place, as foretold by Paul, (2 Thess. ii. 3,) a prophecy spoken, we have good reason to believe, in reference to this as well as to other truths, it becomes an interesting question, Does sacred prophecy shed any light on the subject of the Sabbath's revival? An answer to this question seems desirable in a full discussion of the authority of the change made. If, in reference to the past, we are entitled to conclude that the Scriptures give no warrant for that change which men have made, we might be ready, indeed, to expect, that when the promised "Times of Refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord"—"the Times of Restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began," (Acts iii. 19—21,)—that men, then actuated by a spirit of holiness, should "remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," in memorial of God's all-perfect work of creation. What, then, is the truth in this respect? Are we really furnished with divine light to guide our hope and expectation in regard to the observance of the Sabbath in the better time, still future, but speedily approaching, when again "out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem"—when "many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob, and He will teach us of His ways, and we will walk in His paths," (Is. ii. 3,)—when the will of God shall be done on earth even as it is done in heaven, and when "the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea?" When the glories of redemption shall be seen, felt, and ackowledged universally, does the "sure word of prophecy" testify also the continued memorial of the might, and majesty, and goodness of God, evidenced through all creation?

There is no branch of the inquiry which seems less to have engaged the attention of men giving any consideration to the subject—not excepting even those who have labored most zealously and faithfully for the church's return to true Sabbath observance. Yet, surely, it is neither uninteresting nor unimportant, that here also we should know and maintain the truth as revealed by God through the prophets. "Secret things," indeed, "belong unto the Lord our God, but those which are revealed belong to us and to our children for ever." And as "we are saved by hope," so are we encouraged by the assurance that the law of the Lord shall yet prevail. For Sacred Prophecy does indeed speak—and that with no uncertain sound—of the revived observance of God's own "holy day" by all the nations of the earth. Certainly, the darkness with which the chronology of the prophecies has been beclouded, through the systems of misinterpretation of the Divine Word which have long prevailed, (even now only partially removed,) has contributed not a little to the continuance of the delusion under which the unauthorized change of the Sabbath has been maintained.

It may aid us in the investigation of this point, to confine our attention, in the first instance, to a consideration of what the Scriptures record of the privileges and responsibilities of the house of Israel; and thence to extend our inquiry to the relation between them and other nations in regard to the observance of the weekly Sabbath. Now, with respect to Israel and Judah, it is undeniable, and is conceded by all, that the sanctification of the Seventh Day was imperative, as enjoined by one of the Ten Commandments, all of which were included in the Law given them through Moses. That this obligation continued until the death of Christ, at least, requires no proof; while the opinion that the authority of the law upon Israel was even then annulled, is wholly without foundation in the Word of God. And surely a law so solemnly instituted, so publicly and formally promulgated, and so long confessedly obligatory upon them, would require, if its sanction was designed to cease, an explicit repeal. Whether this has been intimated as having taken place, or whether that sanction remains, and will continue to do so, the following considerations will, we trust, enable the reader to determine.

It will be remembered, that the descendants of Abraham were separated from other nations by virtue of God's covenant made with the patriarch, in his own behalf and theirs. Of this covenant, circumcision is the token or seal. God's promise is, "As for me, behold, my covenant is with thee, and thou shalt be a father of many nations." "And I will establish my covenant between me and thee, and thy seed after thee, in their generations, for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee, and to thy seed after thee. And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession, and I will be their God. And God said unto Abraham, Thou shalt keep my covenant, therefore, thou, and thy seed after thee, in their generations. This is my covenant which ye shall keep between me and you, and thy seed after the: Every man-child among you shall be circumcised. And ye shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskin; and it shall be a token of the covenant betwixt me and you. And he that is eight days old shall be circumcised among you, every man-child in your generations, he that is born in the house, or bought with money of any stranger, which is not of thy seed. He that is born in thy house, and he that is bought with thy money, must needs be circumcised; and my covenant shall be in your flesh for an everlasting covenant. And the uncircumcised man-child, whose flesh of his foreskin is not circumcised, that soul shall be cut off from his people; he hath broken my covenant." Gen. xvii. 4—14.

Contemplating, therefore, a period when Abraham's posterity should have so multiplied as to form "many nations," this statement intimates that the covenant relation towards them all shall abide, and that the obligation to perpetuate the token of it, in their flesh, shall equally continue, so long as he has a seed on earth. "In their generations" the covenant is "an everlasting covenant." Without seeking at present to enter upon a consideration of all that may be implied in the provisions of the covenant, we remark, that it embraces, in the divine purpose, the whole natural descendants of Abraham, and that the imprinted seal distinguished them as a people appreciating its privileges. Some, indeed, less immediately connected with them, were equally included, as belonging to their respective households; and, under the Hebrew economy, provision was even made for individual voluntary additions of those who were not under such obligation to unite themselves with the people of Israel; but every individual so incorporated with them, was required to accept the national covenant seal, thereby thenceforth becoming truly identified with the chosen race. In the promise of God to Abraham, quoted above, his most remote posterity are placed under the responsibility of maintaining the imprinted token, being all included as parties to the covenant, and as sharing in the privileges it conferred. Its neglect, by any individual, at any period, throughout their generation, is here denounced by the Lord as a dire transgression—"he hath broken my covenant."

The covenant, thus solemly entered into, guarantees to the children of Israel the promised land "for an everlasting possession;" and to it, and its pledge of divine faithfulness, continual reference is made in Scripture, in relation both to God's past dealings and His future promises in behalf of that people. It was in fulfillment of its stipulations that they were brought out of the land of Egypt; and when delivered on that occasion, the commemorative and typical Passover was instituted—which also was declaraed to be a perpetual ordinance. Concerning it God says, "This day shall be unto you for a memorial; and ye shall keep it a feast to the Lord, throughout your generations; ye shall keep it a feast by an ordinance for ever." Exod. xii. 14, 24, 42. This, then, is a national rite, and was on no account to be partaken of by a stranger, unless both he and his sons had, by circumcision, become incorporated with Israel. Exod. xii. 45, 48. In this respect, however, there is an express distinction between the Passover and another important ordinance of the Mosaic economy; for while the uncircumcised stranger was forbidden to take part in the eating of the paschal lamb, it was imperative upon him, if present at the appointed season, to observe, with Israel, the day of atonement. "This shall be a statue for ever unto you, that in the seventh month, on the tenth day of the month, ye shall afflict your souls, and do no work at all, whether it be one of your own country, or a stranger that sojourneth among you. For on that day shall the priest make an atonement for you, to cleanse you, that ye may be clean from all your sins, before the Lord. It shall be a Sabbath of rest unto you, and ye shall afflict your souls, by a statute for ever." Lev. xvi. 29—31. Thus, repeatedly, is this ordinance, also, declared to be, to Israel, "a statute for ever."

Again, concerning the First-Fruits, it is appointed unto them, "Ye shall eat neither bread, nor parched corn, nor green ears, until the self same day that ye have brought an offering unto your God; it shall be a statute for ever, throughout your generations, in all your dwellings." Lev. xxiii. 14. So, in like manner, in respect of the Feast of Pentecost: "Ye shall proclaim, on the self same day, that it may be an holy convocation unto you; ye shall do no servile work therein; it shall be a statute for ever, in all your dwellings, throughout your generations." Lev. xxiii. 21. The same is said of the Feast of Tabernacles: "Ye shall keep it a Feast unto the Lord, seven days in the year; it shall be a statute for ever, in your generations; ye shall celebrate it in the seventh month. Ye shall dwell in booths seven days; all that are Israelites born shall dwell in booths, that your generations may know that I made the children of Israel to dwell in booths, when I brought them out of the land of Egypt; I am the Lord your God." Lev. xxiii. 41—43.

There are other of the more minute observances of the Levitical appointments, which are declared to be perpetually obligatory, to which we do not at present specially refer; but it is, for our purpose, worthy of note, that besides occupying a place in the Decalogue, the Weekly Sabbath is farther embodied in the code of Israel's national institutes, and is there declared to be to them of perpetual observance: "Speak thou unto the children of Israel, saying, Verily, my Sabbaths ye shall keep; for it is a sign between me and you throughout your generations; that ye may know that I am the Lord that doth sanctify you. Ye shall keep the Sabbath therefore; for it is holy unto you. Every one that defileth it shall surely be put to death; for whosoever doeth any work therein, that soul shall be cut off from among his people. Six days may work be done; but in the Seventh is the Sabbath of rest, holy to the Lord; whosoever doeth any work in the Sabbath day, he shall surely be put to death. Wherefore, the children of Israel shall keep the Sabbath, to observe the Sabbath throughout their generations FOR A PERPETUAL COVENANT. It is a sign between me and the children of Israel for ever; for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, and on the seventh day He rested, and was refreshed." Exod. xxxi. 13—17.

It is no part of our present object to dwell upon the penalty of Sabbath desecration thus decreed. In our day and in our circumstances it might seem extreme; but with the instruction vouchsafed, and the example which the children of Israel enjoyed, the profanation or rejection of God's holy and blessed Sabbath must have been regarded as a sin of awful presumption and daring impiety; and the dishonor which it was fitted to cast upon the Lord, no doubt required the infliction of capital punishment. But it is to the prospective authority of the Sabbath, implied in the text, to which we chiefly point. It is an ordinance to be continued to them "throughout their generations, for a perpetual covenant,"—an abiding sign that it is the Lord their Maker and Redeemer who sanctifieth the children of Israel "for ever,"—while the reason of its observance is the same, now and for ever, that "in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, and on the seventh day He rested and was refreshed."

CURIOSITIES OF GREAT MEN:

Their Moments of Composition.

Among the curious facts which we find in perusing the biographies of great men, are the circumstances connected with the composition of the works which have made them immortal.

Bossuet composed his grand sermons on his knees; Bulwer wrote his first novel in full dress, scented; Milton, before commencing his great work, invoked the influences of the Holy Spirit, and prayed that his lips might be touched with a live coal from off the altar; Chrysostom meditated and studied while contemplating a painting of St. Paul.

Bacon knelt down before composing his great work, and prayed for light from heaven. Pope never could compose well without first declaiming for some time at the top of his voice, and thus rousing his nervous system to its fullest activity.

Bentham composed after playing a prelude on the organ, or whilst taking his "ante-jentacular" and "post-prandial" walks in his garden—the same, by the way, that Milton occupied.

Saint Bernard composed his Meditations amidst the woods; he delighted in nothing so much as in the solitude of the dense forest, finding there, he said, something more profound and suggestive than any thing he could find in books. The storm would sometimes fall upon him there, without for a moment interrupting his meditations.

Camoens composed his verses with the roar of battle in his ears; for the Portuguese poet was a soldier, and a brave one, though a poet. He composed some of his most beautiful verses at the time when his Indian slave was begging a subsistence for him in the streets. Tasso wrote his finest pieces in the lucid intervals of madness.

Rosseau wrote his works early in the morning; Le Sage at mid-day; Byron at midnight; Hardouin rose at four in the morning, and wrote till late at night.

Aristotle was a tremendous worker, he took little sleep, and was constantly retrenching it. He had a contrivance by which he awoke early, and to awake was with him to commence work. Demosthenes passed three months in a cavern by the sea-side, in laboring to overcome the defects of his voice. There he read, studied, and declaimed.

Luther, when studying, always had his dog lying at his feet—a dog he had brought from Wartburgh, and of which he was very fond. An ivory crucifix stood on the table before him, and the walls of his study were stuck around with caricatures of the Pope. He worked at his desk for days together without going out; but when fatigued, and the ideas began to stagnate in his brain, he would take his flute or his guitar with him into the porch, and there execute some musical fantasy, (for he was a skillful musician,) when the ideas would flow upon him as fresh as flowers after a summer's rain. Music was his invariable solace at such times. Indeed, Luther did not hesitate to say, that after theology, music was the first of arts. "Music," said he, "is the art of the prophets; it is the only other art which, like theology, can calm the agitation of the soul, and put the devil to flight." Next to music, if not before it, Luther loved children and flowers. That great gnarled man had a heart as tender as a woman's.

Calvin studied in his bed. Every morning, at five or six o'clock, he had books, manuscripts and papers carried to him there, and he worked on for hours together. If he had occasion to go out, on his return he undressed and went to bed again to continue his studies. In his later years he dictated his writings to secretaries. He rarely corrected any thing. The sentences issued complete from his mouth. If he felt his facility of composition leaving him, he forthwith quitted his bed, gave up writing and composing, and went about his out-door duties for days, weeks, and months together. But so soon as he felt the inspiration fall upon him again, he went back to his bed, and his secretary set to work forthwith.

Cujas, another learned man, used to study when laid all his length upon the carpet, his face towards the floor, and there he reveled, amidst piles of books, which accumulated about him. The learned Amyot never studied without the harpsicord beside him; and he only quitted the pen to play it. Bentham, also, was extremely fond of the piano forte, and had one in nearly every room in his house.

Richelieu amused himself in the intervals of his labor, with a squadron of cats, of whom he was very fond. He used to go to bed at eleven at night; and after sleeping three hours, rise and write, dictate or work, till from six to eight o'clock in the morning, when his daily levee was held. This worthy student displayed an extravagance equaling that of Woolsey. His annual expenditure was some four millions of francs, or about £170,000 sterling.

How different the fastidious temperance of Milton! He drank water, and lived on the humblest fare. In his youth, he studied during the greatest part of the night; but in his more advanced years he went early to bed—by nine o'clock—rising to his studies at four in summer and five in winter. He studied till mid-day; then he took an hour's exercise, and after dinner he sang and played on the organ, or listened to others' music. He studied again till six, and from that hour till eight he engaged in conversation with friends who came to see him. Then he supped, smoked a pipe of tobacco, drank a glass of water, and went to bed. Glorious visions came to him in the night, for it was then, while lying on his couch, that he composed in thought the greater part of his sublime poems. Sometimes, when the fit of composition came strong upon him, he would call his daughter to his side, to commit to paper that which he had composed.

Milton was of opinion, that the verses composed by him between the autumnal and spring equinoxes were always the best, and he was never satisfied with the verses he had written at any other season. Alfieri, on the contrary, said that the equinoctial winds produced a state of almost "complete stupidity" in him. Like the nightingale, he could only sing in summer. It was his favorite season.

Pierre Corneille, in his loftiest flights of imagination, was often brought to a stand still for want of words and rhyme. Thoughts were seething in his brain, which he vainly tried to reduce to order, and he would often run to his Thomas "for a word." Thomas rarely failed him. Sometimes, in his fits of inspiration, he would bandage his eyes, throw himself upon the sofa, and dictate to his wife, who almost worshiped his genius. Thus he would pass whole days dictating to her his great tragedies; his wife scarcely venturing to speak, almost afraid to breathe. Afterwards, when a tragedy was finished, he would call in his sister Martha, and submit it to her judgment; as Moliere used to consult his own housekeeper about the comedies he had newly written.

Racine composed his verses while walking about, reciting them in a loud voice. One day, when thus working at his play of Mithridates, in the Tuileries Gardens, a crowd of workmen gathered around him, attracted by his gestures; they took him to be a madman about to throw himself into the basin. On his return home from such walks, he would write down, scene by scene, at first in prose, and when he had thus written it out he would exclaim—"My tragedy is done," considering the dressing of the acts up in verse as a very small affair.

Magliaecchi, the learned librarian to the Duke of Tuscany, on the contrary, never stirred abroad, but lived amidst books and lived upon books. They were his bed, board and washing. He passed eight and forty years in their midst, only twice in the course of his life venturing beyond the wall of Florence; once to go two leagues off, and the other three and a half leagues by order of the Grand Duke. He was an extremely frugal man, living upon eggs, bread and water, in great moderation.

The life of Liebnitz was one of reading, writing and meditation. That was the secret of his prodigious knowledge. After an attack of gout, he confined himself to a diet of bread and milk. Often he slept in a chair; and rarely went to bed till after midnight. Sometimes he was months without quitting his seat, where he slept by night and wrote by day. He had an ulcer in his right leg which prevented his walking about, even had he wished to do so. [Eliza Cook's Journal.

A SOLEMN SCENE.

The Rev. George R. Williamson, pastor of the Dutch Reformed Church at Amity, N. Y., was among the victims of the Reindeer. The Christian Intelligencer has an account of the manner in which the news of his death reached his parishioners—an affecting narrative, which we copy:—

"The pastor, Rev. George R. Williamson, did not reach home on Saturday evening, according to his known arrangements. On Sunday morning the congregation assembled; and the absence of the minister, together with the report of a distressing casuality upon the Reindeer, filled the minds of all with great uneasiness. A messenger was dispatched to Albany for particulars as to the steamer; and one also to Niskayuba, to request Mr. Talmage to conduct the afternoon services at Amity. No definite tidings had arrived up to half-past three o'clock, and the fearful apprehensions concerning the fate of Mr. Williamson and family, supposed to be among the passengers, covered every face with gloom. The worship commenced amid an unbroken stillness like to that a of death scene. While prayer was being offered in behalf of the absent ones, if they were in a state of suffering and affliction; in behalf of bereaved relatives, from whose embrace dear friends had been suddenly snatched; in behalf of the anxious congregation, that they might be prepared for the approaching tidings, and sanctified in the result, the messenger arrived from Albany. Handing into the pulpit a copy of an extra issue from the press, he took his seat trembling and weeping. The congregation listened attentively to a discourse, uttered with quivering lips, from the words of Solomon:—'Boast not thyself of to-morrow, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth.' The subject was illustrated by allusions to the Henry Clay, the Atlantic, and the Reindeer; especially did God bring home the subject, in this last providence, to the preacher who was now occupying the pulpit, and to the people now listening to him. 'It is no time for a human sermonizer to make an application of this discourse, for a voice from heaven is about to address you in a manner infinitely more impressive. Your beloved pastor is not, for God has taken him. When God is speaking, let man forbear.'

"Thus ended the services; and the scene which followed may be partially imagined, but cannot be described. It was one universal burst of sorrow and weeping. A short season was spent in humiliation and prayer, and delegates were appointed to attend the funeral, supposed to take place at the city of New York."

THE AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY.

The origin of this important institution was thus sketched by Chief Justice Williams, of Connecticut, President of the Society, at its late Anniversary in New York:—

Little more than a quarter of a century since, a few pious gentlemen of this city, observing how the increase of our population exceeded the increase of our religious instruction, and how many of our people seldom or never heard the living preacher, met to consult as to the best mode of meeting this state of things.

They could devise no better way than by the distribution of Tracts through our extended country. Something of this kind had been adopted at the time of the Reformation, and infidel philosophers had made use of similar means to effect that great Revolution in France which has since had such a prodigious effect upon the world. There were indeed Tract Societies at that time in some of our own States, but having no bond of union, with few exceptions, their influence could not be extensive.

It was thought, therefore, desirable that an institution should be formed in some commercial city, which should unite the whole Christian community who professed evangelical sentiments in one common effort for the diffusion of those great religious truths in which they agreed; and that the commercial city of our country should be the place of its location, that from this great center of business a circulation might easily be diffused through every part of our country, and perhaps the world itself.

After consulting with some of like sentiments from other places, and particularly with those who were connected with other societies then existing, a public meeting was held at the City Hotel in this city, on the eleventh day of May, 1825, where the American Tract Society was organized, and a constitution formed, under which, with some slight alterations, the Society now acts—no act of incorporation having been obtained until sixteen years after.

The object of the Society, as expressed in the constitution, was 'to diffuse a knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ as the Redeemer of sinners, and to promote the interests of vital godliness and sound morality by the circulation of religious tracts calculated to receive the approbation of all evangelical Christians; and, to secure this end, the officers and directors were chosen from different denominations of Christians, and the publishing committee was to contain no two members of the same ecclesiastical connection. And more completely to guard a point so delicate, it was provided that no tract should be published that any one member of this committee objected to. Upon this Publishing Committee and the Corresponding Secretary the labor and responsibility of the publication rest.

At the head of this committee was first placed the venerable Dr. Milnor, whose memory will be ever dear to the friends of the Society for his sound judgment, his comprehensive views, his ardent zeal, to which, as chairman of this committee for twenty years, he contributed his inestimable services.

Last named on that committee at the organization was the Rev. John Summerfield, a youth of high hopes and splendid endowments, whose eloquent effusions will never be forgotten by those who heard him—when on seraph wings he seemed to soar, as if to join those who already surround the throne where he was soon called.

"Early, bright, transient, chaste as morning dew,
He sparkled, was exhaled, and went to heaven."

The other members of that committee, with the Corresponding Secretary, still live, revered and honored, to testify for God and this cause. The part they have borne in this great work remains to be told when their is ended; long may it be before that time work shall come.

The object of this Society, thus formed, was extensively approved by the friends of evangelical religion; but the doubts felt by good men as to the permanency of such a union caused fear and trembling to many hearts. Some Christian men ventured to predict that it could not succeed; but as the committee in one of their reports says, 'the object was undertaken not without humble confidence in God, that it originated in his Spirit, and that by his almighty power he would carry it forward,' and much prayer went up to heaven for its prosperity.

The danger anticipated was, that there would arise conflicting opinions among the members of the various denominations of which the officers were composed, which would interrupt the harmony of their counsels and terminate the union so happily formed. It was indeed an experiment of no ordinary character, and much more doubtful as to the result than that of the Bible Society, as it required much more constant care and watchfulness. Success could not be expected without great candor, ardent piety, and heavenly wisdom in those who were to take the lead. But such was the object to be attained, and such the confidence of the religious community in the character of the persons chosen to accomplish it, that the institution has acquired a strength and importance which its advocates dared not anticipate.

By the liberality of friends, principally in this city, the Society were provided with a convenient house and grounds to commence their operations. Several of the most important local Tract Societies consented to unite with and become branches of this Society; so that during the first year this institution received into the Treasury above $10,000, and printed about 8,000,000 pages, of which about 3,600,000 were circulated by sales to existing societies at reduced prices, or as delivered to subscribers and distributed gratuitously.

CONGREGATIONAL SINGING.

Lowell Mason, now in Europe, in a recent letter to the New York Musical World, speaks warmly in favor of congregational singing. He says:—

"I am a great lover of music; I delight to listen to an orchestral performance, and never intend to omit an opportunity of hearing a good concert. But on the Sabbath day, when one wishes to turn his thoughts upward, and bring himself into converse with the Father above, I love the great vocal chorus, plain and unpretending though it be; and laying no claim to either science or art, yet it grapples with the spirit of worship, draws it out, and bears it with certainty and rapidity towards the object of its search, and penitence, and thanksgiving, and adoration, fill the soul. Oh, that those who love the worship of God in our happy land, knew the power of song to their aid; and knew, too, that form of song so well adapted to their ends. I love the choir; I would spend day sand nights in its trainings, and labor without being weary in attempts to bring it to perfection; I would listen to it on the Sabbath, be made sorrowful by its tones of penitence, strong in faith and confidence by its full, and scientific wrought harmonies, jubilant by its hosannas and hallelujahs; but even this is not enough. In addition to all that a choir can do, I want the plain song of the people, above art, above every thing save Him in whose presence it hastens one, and before whose throne it fills one with the spirit of them who sing without ceasing, 'Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and blesing.' I heard the congregation singing hymns of praise today; the loud organ led them on, binding all together, so that the voices were as the voice of one man; the grand chorus filled the house of the Lord; it seemed to say, Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of hosts! let the whole earth be filled with his glory; and I came away, wishing the people of New England could hear it too until they should know what we mean when we speak of congregational singing."

VANITY OF LIFE.

The following, from a late speech of Mr. Benton, is a touching exhibition of the vanity of political ambition:—

"I have gone through a contest to which I had no heart, and into which I was forced by combinations against life and honor, and from which I gladly escape. What is a seat in Congress to me? I have sat thirty years in the highest branch of Congress, have made a name to which I can expect to add nothing, and I should only be anxious to save what has been gained. I have domestic affections, sorely lacerated in these latter times; a wife whom I have never neglected, and who needs my attention now more than ever; children, some separated from me by the wide expanse of oceans and continents, others by the slender bounds which separate time from eternity. I touch the age which the Psalmist assigns for the limit of manly life, and must be thoughtless indeed if I do not think of something beyond the fleeting and shadowy pursuits of this life, of all of which I have seen the vanity. What is my occupation? Ask the undertaker, that good Mr. Lynch, whose face, present on so many mournful occasions, has become pleasant to me. He knows what occupies my thoughts and cares; gathering the bones of the dead, a mother, a sister, two sons, a grandchild; planting the cypress over assembled graves, and making the spot where I and those who are dear to me are soon to be laid; all on the sunset side of the Father of Floods, the towering city of St. Louis on one hand, the rolling stream of the Missouri on the other, and where a cemetery of large dimensions is to be the future necropolis of unnumbered generations. These are my thoughts and cares, and the undertaker knows them."

THE LITTLE WORD "NO."

Last winter I spent a short time in a pleasant family in a neighboring State. They were wealthy, influential, and, so far as I could judge, a Christian family. The farmer had at different times occupied a prominent place in the legislative and judiciary departments of his State. He held office in the church; he had erected, and preserved through years of trial that made him prematurely gray, the family altar; and, as one who knew him well remarked, it was doubtful if a shadow could be cast upon his character. He was honorable and upright in business; courteous, kind, and forbearing in his intercourse with the world. The mother, an estimable woman, professed herself willing to do and suffer for Christ, hoping to die and reign with him. The only daughter was a mild, lovely girl; but the sons—and here was a mystery.

The eldest, a child of uncommon promise, entered at an early age upon a vicious career of drinking, gambling, and licentiousness, which ended in forgery and crime, until he was cast out of the family circle as one unknown, and, after a term in prison, found his home in one of the vilest haunts in a Southern city. The second, following in his footsteps, was awaiting in the county jail a trial that might sentence him for years to the State's Prison. Children of prayer, of pious teaching and example, the fact was to me inexplicable. I expressed my wonder in the hearing of an old man who had known them from birth. Said he, "I can explain in a few words; it is from the father's want of power to say no."

When they were beautiful children, and it needed but a word to guide them, he neglected to say no. As years rolled on, and he noticed the first steps in the way of wrong-doing, he excused them on the plea of youthful exuberance of spirits. And when they went too far, and he strove to curb them, the boys by caressing, arguing or bickering, had their own way, for it grieved him to say no. In after years, when their souls were blood stained with crime, when, with all the yearnings of a father's heart, he took them again to his home, striving by gentleness to win them to the way of life, he dared not say

Reply to Bro. Crandall—Concluded.

I do not intend to review Bro. C.'s argument in all its details. It is sufficient for me to notice it, only so far as will serve to place my own views fairly before the public. If I can show that my views are according to the Scriptures of Truth, those of my assailant must necessarily fall to the ground, however plausible they may seem.

The embodiment of all our churches in one great central organization, denominated a General Conference, or the embodiment of a given number of them in an extended organization, called an Association, in which disciplinary authority is vested, is the one idea, in view of which Bro. C. shapes his whole argument. He throws an air of plausibility over this view, by considering how the churches and ministers would be circumstanced, if brought together at the Lord's Table on anniversary occasions, provided some of the churches had not been, in the opinion of all the rest, perfectly orthodox in their discipline; taking for granted, of course, that Associational or Conference communion is not liable to the charge of irregularity.

It is in strict keeping with the same idea, that he speaks of "ministers, as public men, holding an office of the highest responsibility, authorizing them to administer the ordinances throughout the whole body." I know not that I can express my own ideas, on this point more clearly than I have already done. I know of no organized body throughout which a minister has authority to administer the ordinances, except the particular church to which he belongs, or of which he is the acknowledged pastor. The New York church, for example, is the body to which my authority to administer the ordinances is limited. Should I visit the church at Plainfield, or Berlin, I have no doubt that the privilege of administering the ordinances would be freely granted to me, but it would be merely as a matter of courtesy. As a right due to me, I could not claim it, notwithstanding that church, and the one of which I am pastor, both belong to the same Association. Nor am I able to see, that "the act of one church, when it associates with another, constitutes a declaration of its willingness to receive the pastor or minister of the other as an administrator." I do not see, that "by that act they affirm his right to officiate among them;" nor do I see, that "any interpretation of the act of association, which disallows that point, makes a farce or sham of the whole transaction." All this may be very clear to Bro. C.'s keen-sightedness; but to me such doctrine appears better suited to Presbyterian and Prelatical denominations, than to those which recognize such an independency as Christ has given to his churches.

I believe, that when the Lord Jesus Christ has called a man to the ministry, and the church of which he is a member has ascertained that call, and properly authenticated it, he has authority to go forth and preach the word to all who are willing to listen to him. He has authority, too, to administer baptism to 'him that believeth.' And should he baptize a sufficient number of believers, he has the right to gather them together and constitute them into a separate church, they themselves agreeing to the transaction. And then, if they are willing, he may administer to them the Lord's Supper. And if Bro. C. means nothing more than this, when he talks of recognizing ministers "as public men," or (as in a former communication) "ministers at large," we need have no dispute. But it is evident, that he means more than this. He means that the denomination has an organized existence. That organization embraces a given number of churches, and includes certain geographical limits, throughout which each and all of our ministers have the right to administer the ordinances. This is certainly his meaning, if I am capable of understanding him.

If the denomination has an organized existence, similar to that which obtains with Presbyterians, Methodists, Episcopalians, and other consolidated sects, I think it quite time that it were understood. The public has a right to be informed on this point. Those who wait at our doors for admission, under the impression that our church government is strict congregationalism, will not be very well pleased, if they find out, afterwards, that there is a central tribunal where power is lodged. It is time that it were understood, whether our churches are consolidated, or simply associated; whether they are associated for government, or merely for advice, comfort, and mutual edification; whether they are bound together upon the principle of uniformity, or simply that of unity. As I have always conceived, the denomination, as such, has no organized existence. The term "Seventh-day Baptist Denomination," is not like the term "Presbyterian Church," which designates the total number of Presbyterian congregations throughout the country as consolidated in one central organization; but it is one which simply designates the aggregate of those throughout the country who hold substantially the same views, without any reference to consolidation or central organization. If a church should start into existence to-morrow, in the State of Tennessee, holding substantially the same views held by the churches in Rhode Island, and symbolizing with them in practice, that church would be a part of the Seventh-day Baptist denomination, although it should never unite with any of our Associations, or with the General Conference. Ecclesiastical legislation could not make it otherwise, and any attempt to do so would be about as wise as to undertake to determine by civil enactments what shall be the color of a man's skin. Indeed, the term "denomination," as applied to Seventh-day Baptists, First-day Baptists, Quakers, and several other persuasions, is very much like the term race, as applied to different classes of men. If we see a man with a black skin, flat nose, thick lips, woolly hair, projecting heels, and other unmistakable features, we need no legislation to determine whether, or not, he belongs to the African race. Or, if we see one with white skin, thin lips, and smooth features, we need not inquire what government he lives under, or what his political creed is, in order to know whether he is a Caucasian. Quite as unnecessary is it to ask whether a church is connected with the General Conference, or one of the Associations, to know whether it belongs to the Seventh-day Baptist denomination. Its resemblance, in all essential points, to other Seventh-day Baptist churches, shows where it belongs.

If I am right in this view, the whole of Bro. C.'s argument about ministers being ministers of the denomination, holding a connection with the denomination irrespective of their connection with the churches, amenableness to the body, &c., falls to the ground; and I need not pursue it in its various applications. It is a mere chimera, which vanishes when the sophistry that originates it is discovered.

Bro. C. says:—

> "I hold to just such independency of the churches as will make them equally independent. But the idea that primary bodies may confederate, or associate, and yet be absolutely independent, and unamenable as to whether their doings shall comport with the objects of their organization, or not, is an impracticable abstraction. It is nothing else than to declare all organic, constitutional, confederate, or associational obligations, null, and at one stroke to resolve the mass into its original elements. No organization can endure the shock of such a doctrine; and those who maintain it must not be surprised if the reward of disorganizers should be theirs."

And who has set forth any such doctrine as is here complained of? Certainly, I have not. Let the reader consider the following paragraph, extracted from "remarks" upon Bro. C.'s communication in the Recorder of June 17th, and he will see that I hold no such views:—

> "That the Association has a right to free itself of those churches 'which, in faith and practice, do not harmonize with its object,' (see Art. 1st, Const.) is admitted. We also admit, that every Community, which is in any degree an independent one, and not wholly subjected to the control of some extraneous power, must have power to enact by-laws for itself, and to expel such members as are guilty of a violation of them. This seems essential to its existence. But the question which demands our serious consideration, is whether churches have a right to subject themselves to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of an Association, Conference, or any other organization. Have they any right to surrender their independence? Does not their allegiance to the Lord Jesus Christ, as the only Head of the Church, forbid it? Ought not each church to manage its discipline, in a sense of its responsibility directly to Christ, the same as if there was no other church in the world? Has not Christ invested it with a disciplinary authority over its ministers? And has it any right to surrender this authority to any other organization?"

Lest I should weary my readers, I pass, for the present, my correspondent's remarks upon ordination, to notice a personal imputation, making me responsible for all the troubles which have rested upon the churches in Rhode Island for some years past. Bro. C. would fain have our readers believe, that myself and others "succeeded to give such a shape to the doings of the Association at its last session, as very seriously to invalidate the action of the preceding session; and yet, instead of amending that act, went right on to commit more acts of the same kind." What he means by this last sentence, I know not. But so far as I am personally concerned, I am not aware of having maintained one set of views at one session of the Association and another set at another. If I have, as you say to me, "let it be proved, not insinuated." I have never denied, that the Association had any right of jurisdiction in the case, when the proposition was to free itself of those churches which in faith and practice did not harmonize with its object. But I do deny, and always have denied, the right of an Association to walk into the churches, meddle with their discipline, deal with their ministers, or sit in judgment upon the character of individual members. My advice, "that the church complaining of being injured should lay its complaint before the church to which the minister belonged whom they charged with doing them wrong," was just what I should give again under like circumstances. The church complained to, refused to take the matter up. I expected that the next thing would be to bring the case before the Association. At least, I thought it altogether probable, that the aggrieved church would take that course; and so it did. The communication of the aggrieved church to the Association was referred to a special committee, of which I was chairman. That committee recommended the Association to appoint a Council to investigate the matter, and report accordingly. And now, as I was chairman of that committee, I suppose I must be responsible for the course recommended. Very well, be it so. But why did I recommend the appointment of a council? Was it because I thought the Association had the right to exercise ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the church complained of? Was it because I supposed the Association might walk into the church, meddle with its discipline, and order things to be thus and so? Was it because I supposed there was any right of jurisdiction directly over the minister complained of, or over any other of its members? Not at all. My sole object was, that the Association might ascertain whether the accused church had become so corrupted in faith and practice, that it could not longer "harmonize with its object," and was therefore worthy of being no longer in connection with the Association. And when, the following year, the council submitted its report at Berlin, and an attempt was made, upon that, to go into the exercise of jurisdiction directly over the offending minister, instead of first dealing with the church, I dissented from the course proposed most decidedly. My dissent, however, was overruled, and jurisdiction was exercised directly over the minister himself.

Such is a simple statement of the facts in the case. Yet, from the manner in which I am represented by my opponent, one would suppose that I had suddenly wheeled about, and maintained at Berlin a doctrine directly the opposite to that which I had maintained at Shiloh. But our readers, having heard both sides of the story, will now judge for themselves.

It is perhaps due to the occasion to say, that though I disagreed with the Association at Berlin as to a point of order, and though I still hold the same views which I then expressed, I do not thereby intend any justification of the cause of the offending minister who has been referred to, nor of the church which has espoused it. Considered merely as a moral question, it wears about the same aspect that it did some four years ago, when I was called to sit in council on the case, and when my opinion was freely expressed.

As Bro. C. has fully relieved his conscience by setting forth "a most disheartening and sad state of things, from which the Seventh-day Baptist churches in Rhode Island are suffering still"—a condition of which "no word is so descriptive as chaos"—and charging that "this state of things results more from the course you [I] have taken than from any thing else;" and, withal, has represented me as employing all the influence of my editorial position, and the whole power of our press, to crush brethren and churches, &c., &c., I trust he will enjoy all that satisfaction which a good man feels in having discharged his duty.

A PALESTINE MISSION.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

In contemplating the advantages promised to us in the Palestine Mission, they are multiplied at every view; especially should we be able to connect with it the benevolent enterprise of the manual labor or agricultural colony, to give employment and bread to the destitute converts to Christianity, and the humble applicant for charities distributed by Christian hands. Few of the missionary efforts of modern times have had such an ally. Our missionaries generally must labor for years to obtain a footing on a foreign field, and then the slow progress of reaching the moral sensibility of the people by metaphysical means alone, wears out the lives and energies of the missionaries, before the effects of their labor are developed. But in case of securing an interest in this agricultural enterprise, we are able to make a practical demonstration of the objects and effects of the Gospel, in ameliorating the sufferings of humanity, and rendering life joyous and happy, as well as in encouraging the hope of a glorious immortality.

The Scriptures must needs be fulfilled, which have promised, that at the expiration of the dispersion, when the land has enjoyed its Sabbaths, "I will cause the showers to come down in their season; there shall be showers of blessing. And the tree of the field shall yield her fruit, and the earth shall yield her increase, and they shall be safe in their land, and shall know that I am the Lord, when I have broken the bands of their yoke, and delivered them out of the hands of those that served themselves of them." Infidelity has rejected the promised restoration, because it was supposed that nothing but a miracle would restore their land to fertility; but the science of agriculture is removing the greatest obstacle to the consummation of the prophecy. And are we blind to the fact?

The Valley of Artas, now cultivated by Christian hands, begins to attract the attention of the traveler, and, strange to say, induces an exhibition of cupidity in those who should be above such motives, and an exhibition which would never have appeared but for the fact that the enterprise was controlled by Sabbath-keepers, who appeal to us, Seventh-day Baptists of America, to sustain them in the hour of their trial. Paul saw in a vision a man of Macedonia, who prayed, saying, "Come over into Macedonia and help us;" and we have had more than a visionary call from men of Palestine. Let the Sabbath-keeping philanthropist, and more especially the warm-hearted Christian, take a view of the prospect of a pleasant valley, of considerable extent, cultivated by Sabbath-keepers, (though Jews,) under the influence and control of Christian enterprise—their prejudices weakened by Christian charities and kindness, and their families open to the instruction of Sabbath-keeping missionaries—the mission school established in the week, and the Sabbath-school, for their children, and the chapel for the parents on the Sabbath—(for they that ask of Christian philanthrophy employment for themselves, and bread for their children, will not withhold them from Christian instruction and influence,)—and the view must awaken his ardor to realize the prospect and hasten the consummation.

But perhaps we have waited already too long. While we have been thinking coolly on the policy of affording aid and influence, the adversaries of the truth that we hold dear have pounced on the feeble band of pioneers; and although, from the last accounts, the Lord had sustained their courage, and they had raised their cry anew to us for help, they may be overcome, and lost to this enterprise, for want of that encouragement we might and should have afforded. And who among us is able to wash his hands before the world, and much less before God, and say, We are innocent of the fate of these lovers of God and his holy Sabbath, and of the delay which has attended our deliberations, temporizing policy, and vascillations, respecting this mission, since more than fifteen years ago we solemnly engaged to enter upon it? J. BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

GLASGOW, October 1, 1852.

The need of a more perfect reformation of the Church of England, to entitle her in any way to be called Protestant, is pressing itself upon public attention. The distinction between her and the Church of Rome is evidently very little, when tried upon the most vital questions. There can be little doubt that the confessional is a source of pollution in the practice of the priests, and that absolution is made an encouragement to crime. In the practice of the Church of England, however, confession and absolution have been to a great extent in abeyance. Yet, retained in her formulas, and approved by some at least of her early authorities, both were at all times ready to be revived by individuals so disposed.

In the present day, a party by no means insignificiant, in respect both of talent and numbers, has strong leanings towards the ritual of Rome, while some of her Bishops, instead of checking, are encouraging the tendency. Last month, the Bishop of Oxford addressed a letter to the Churchwarden of St. Mary's, in consequence of a parishioner having complained to him that the Rev. Mr. Turner had preached a sermon advocating confession and priestly absolution. The sermon having been examined by the Bishop, he declared that the confession and absolution which it insisted upon were of that modified form which the Church of England affirms, as distinguished from that practiced by the church of Rome. In the latter, he declared, confession was enforced upon all as necessary; while in the former it was voluntary and without probing the thoughts.

Within the last few days, an extra-judicial and therefore less satisfactory investigation has been made at Plymouth, by the Bishop of Exeter, of charges of a similar nature brought against the Rev. Mr. Prynne. The investigation was undertaken in consequence of the objection made by the Rev. Mr. Hatchard to bring his young people to the church of Mr. Prynne, which the Bishop had appointed as that for his place of confirmation. In the origin of the matter, we have therefore an inconsistency, and an evidence of the power of prejudice in blinding the mind. Mr. Hatchard has great objection to the practice of confession, but seems to have none to confirmation—although it is not more scriptural; and he remains connected with a church which, by its standards, is declared by its dignitaries to sanction both. It seems pretty evident, that the Bishop of Exeter, one of the most Romanizing in the English hierarchy, came to the investigation with the determination to justify the accused, and accordingly to prevent as far as possible the adducing of evidence which was to be tendered. So sensible of this was Mr. Hatchard, that he declined to take part in the examination of the witnesses. Part of the evidence was declared unfit for the public eye, and one of the witnesses to have confessed to sin of deepest dye, in the very investigation; but it was proved, that in a room connected with the church, Mr. Prynne was accustomed to receive persons in secret for confession—to question them as to sins of uncleanness, he says in a judicious way; the young women (one of them not more than twelve years of age) say in a very immodest manner—that the orphans in a Protestant nunnery were directed or required by their superiors to go to regular confession—and that the priestly absolution was given. The Bishop saw nothing wrong in this—says it is not inconsistent with the doctrines of the Church of England—spoke of the great blessing of confession as enjoined in the Book of Common Prayer, which, he says, attaches great importance "to the doctrine of confession and to that of absolution"—and appealed as authority for both to Cranmer, Ridley, Lattimer, Hooper, &c. And so thorough a traditionist is the Bishop, that in mock modesty he exclaimed, "Now I, for one, do not wish to be a better Protestant" than those named. But whether he wished or not, it is surely high time that such unscriptural practices be discarded, by whomsoever sanctioned, or by whomsoever introduced.

About twelve years ago the well-known dramatist, Sheridan Knowles, had an engagement at Plymouth theather. The late Rev. T. Willcocks, then editor of the "Devonport Independent" newspaper, in conjunction with the Rev. T. Horton and the Rev. J. Webb, published in that paper an exposure of the injurious influence exercised by the theater. Knowles defended the stage, and for weeks a warfare on the subject was maintained. His three assailants were all Baptist ministers. Whether anything said in the course of this discussion had any influence on his future course, is unknown; but Mr. Knowles has latterly become a member of the Baptist church in Bloomsbury, London, of which the Rev. William Brock is pastor—he having been previously baptized by the Rev. Dr. Innes of Edinburgh. He some time ago published a work against Popery, and has lately been giving instructions on Pulpit Delivery, to the students of Stepney Baptist College. J. A. BEGG.

CHRISTIANITY ADAPTED TO HUMAN PROGRESS.

Man is ever longing for something beyond his present grasp. He possesses, and is unsatisfied—attains, and still desires other attainments—has pleasures, yet is ungratified. An instinctive impulse leads him into all kinds of schemes, for enjoyment—all kinds of speculation, for possession. Sea and land are traversed to find something to meet the cravings of the soul—yet, when all that the world can afford is obtained, the soul is left poor and struggling. Worldly possessions turn to bitterness, and the spirit looks away towards the Infinite and Eternal for satisfaction.

This condition of the human mind, joined with its religious tendencies, has led man, in different ages of the world, to broach various systems of religion; but mind is capable of indefinite progression, and any religion that is not adapted to such a growth, is not the religion for man. Man soon outgrows the systems which he has constructed for himself, or else arrives at their culminating point, and there remains stationary or retrogrades.

All systems of false religion lack the element adapting them to progressive development. They carry their votaries to a certain point, and there stop. They may please the fancy—they may be very poetic—but they want the power of giving life and growth. They are not suited to the march of mind—are not expansive, constructive. The system of Boodhism was progressive to a certain point; but beyond that point if could not go—immobility took possession. One third of the human race, long since, came up to the highest point of development granted by it, and for ages they have presented but a stereotyped edition of humanity as the fruits of the system. Such, also, is the case with Islamism. It has reached its ultimate. The Cailifs have nothing to do but to watch with respectful attention over its declining age. Such is the fate of all religious systems not ordained of God. If there is any particular adaptedness in them to the wants of man, that adaptedness will soon bring man up to their highest point of development, to be followed by immobility or decay.

How is it with the religion of the Bible? It comes forward to renovate the world. Is it like the various other systems that have been started with professedly the same object in view? Is it soon to accomplish its mission—raise man to its ultimate capacity—then to die out, from the simple fact of there being no longer any use for it, in the higher stages of civilization? Or, does it, like many of the innovations, tear down the foundations on which man has found a foothold, without offering him any other basis?

The Christian religion has been answering these questions for the last eighteen hundred years. While false religions cannot carry man beyond a fixed point, the true meets him at every point of his progress, pronounces forgiveness to the penitent seeker, and leads him up to higher degrees, and opens to him more beautiful prospects. It commences with the individual, growing from the heart outward. Every individual receiving it becomes a center of growth and radiation. It affects its possessor, not as a petrifying, stultifying, or devouring element; but gives strength, and growth, and beauty. It walks humbly and carefully with the feeble in intellect, and is found sufficient to tax the powers of spirits of mightiest grasp; yes, it presents a theme that angels have not been able fully to comprehend. It is prepared to meet the spiritual necessities of the feeble-minded Hottentot, the sedate Chinaman, the wandering, warlike Tartar, the dreamy German, the cool, calculating Britton, the versatile Frenchman, and the utilitarian American—elevating and perfecting all. Man, in his upward march, will never get so high but what religion can elevate him. This is true, not only of this world, but it proposes to step across the confines of this earthly existence, and accompany the spirit along its eternal pathway, presenting prospects that are ever brightening, and retrospects that show a course of progress and triumph.

It is, also, the great elevator of nations. All other systems have found a point beyond which they could not carry a nation. The Christian religion enters among savages; soon they are found throwing off their savageness—civilization and progress take its place. It removes evil and sin, and gives justice, and mercy, and peace, and every national good. The course of every nation where it has taken up its abode, has henceforth been upward and brightening.

Prophecy, as well as its past history, assures us, that its future course is to be developing and progressive—that it is to re-construct the whole moral machinery of the world—that it is to furnish the lever, the place to stand, and the motive power, for moving the world—and that its influences and effects are to become more radiant with heavenly glory, unto the perfect day.

A religion of such characteristics demands like characteristics in its recipients. They must be thoroughly imbued with its spirit. They must be earnest and careful seekers after truth, and, when found, its willing followers, wherever it may lead. They must not be sticklers for stereotyped editions of theological systems, constructed by finite rather than infinite wisdom; but they must ever seek the pure, unadulterated, developing principles of the Bible, as illustrated in the life and death of Christ. They must be earnest laborers for their own and the world's progress—ever building up and perfecting the good—their hearts beating in unison with Infinite Love. MACOM.

AMERICAN BIBLE UNION.

In a brief account of the Anniversary of this institution, given in the Recorder last week, it was stated that "the evidences of personal and sectarian ill feeling were quite plenty in some of the addresses of fifth and sixth days; and we are glad to learn, that the exercises of those days were followed, on Sabbath-day, by a Conciliation Convention," &c.

I presume the writer of the article supposed that he had sufficient grounds for such a statement, but I must take the privilege of saying, for myself, that I differ from him widely. I heard the greater part of the addresses that were delivered during the two days of the meeting—in the evenings I did not attend—and I must say, that though there were decided evidences of the attachment of the speakers to their denominational tenets, I could discover very little, if any, manifestation of "personal and sectarian ill feeling" On the contrary, it seemed to me, that an eminently Christian and catholic spirit pervaded the exercises, from beginning to end; and I heartily endorse the sentiment of a brother of our own church, who pronounced it "one of the best meetings that he ever attended."

I am sorry to be under the necessity of appearing over my own proper signature, on this subject, and of disclaiming all responsibility for, and participation in, the account referred to; but my friends of the Bible Union will accept this statement, that I was not aware that such an article had been prepared, till I saw it in print. T. B. B.

☞ The writer of last week's notice of the Bible Union's Anniversary has re-perused the reports of the speeches referred to, and finds no reason to modify his language in relation to them. That "a brother of our own church" regarded the meeting as "one of the best that he ever attended," is no proof that it was free from "sectarian and personal ill feeling," since that element is quite essential to a good meeting in the estimation of some. We do not appreciate the "necessity" of our coadjutor's appearing over his "own proper signature" to disclaim "all responsibility for, and participation in, the account referred to, inasmuch as it has been announced, and is supposed to be generally understood, that he never appears except over his own proper signature, and therefore nobody would be likely to lay upon him the responsibility of an anonymous article.

REWARD OF SABBATH LABOR.—On Sabbath, July 25th, there might have been seen, on a farm in the town of B., Erie county, N. Y., some twelve or fifteen men engaged in mowing, spreading, raking, and drawing hay, notwithstanding the pleasant season for hay-making. This farmer continued his work till Thursday, when he finished his haying. He had filled two large barns, and the top of a large cow-shed, with which the barns were connected. He estimated the amount of hay at fifty tons. On Thursday night the barn was struck by lightning, and burned to the ground. Fear God and keep his commands.

☞ The above paragraph is going the rounds. On referring to the almanac, we find that the 25th day of July, which is here called the "Sabbath," was the first day of the week, or Sunday. What commandment is there against working on that day? None at all. But there is a commandment which forbids working on the seventh day, commonly called Saturday. "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work." We wonder if these people did not work on Saturday, the 24th, as well as on Sunday, the 25th, of July. If they did, and if God punishes people for disobeying his commandment by burning up the fruit of their labor, the calamity spoken of should not surprise us. The wonder is that such like are not more frequent.

BAPTIST MISSIONARY CONVENTION.—The New York State Baptist Missionary Convention was held in Brooklyn last week. From the Treasurer's Report, presented on that occasion, it appears that the receipts last year (including $3,125 borrowed) were $9,434 29, and disbursements $9,341 26. One question before the Convention related to the sale of The N. Y. Baptist Register; it was finally determined to transfer the whole interest to Alex. M. Beebe, who has long been the editor, for $2,500. Another subject of discussion was a proposition to authorize the Executive Committee to create a Building Fund, for the purpose of aiding feeble churches to erect meeting-houses, and of erecting such houses in destitute districts. The subject was finally referred to the Board.

SPECIAL MISSIONARY DEPUTATION TO BURMAH.—The American Baptist Missionary Union is about to send a special deputation to Burmah. At a meeting in Brooklyn, last week, Rev. Mr. Bright stated that the reasons of this expedition being set on foot were chiefly to be found in the great changes that must necessarily be made in the missionary operations in Burmah, growing out of the reopening of that country, and conquest of it by British arms. Nearly all the southern part of Burmah was now under the rule of the East India Company, and that portion embraced many of the richest fields of Missionary enterprise. The deputation consisted of Rev. Dr. Peck and Rev. Mr. Granger, (Providence,) and would represent the Executive Committee at a Convention of the missionaries in Burmah, to be held next year, for the purpose of making new arrangements in view of the changes in the condition of the country. The deputation would also visit the Greek Mission, and several other Foreign Missions.

The American Temperance Union offer 300 Maine Law Tracts, to be sent by mail, postage prepaid, for $1.

Protestants in France.—A French paper, upon the statements of which much reliance is placed, estimates the Protestant population of France at 1,500,000. The Calvinists and the followers of the Confession of Augsburg receive aid from the State. The former have five hundred and eleven ministers, and six hundred houses of worship, distributed among sixty-three of the eighty-six departments of France. One hundred and twenty-one of them are situated in the department of Le Gard. Two hundred and forty-five pastors preach the doctrines of the Confession of Augsburg. Strasbourg has a larger number than any other city, to wit, 30,000. There are 15,000 in Paris. There are twenty-five departments where there are more or less Protestants belonging to no consistory, to no authorized temple. The department of Le Gard offers the greatest variety of Protestant sects, among which may be found Quakers, Protestant Reformed, Methodists, and Darbists. These latter oppose the establishment of a special consecrated ministry, holding every man to be a priest at will.

Benevolence of French Protestants.—The oldest religious Society among the Protestants of France, the Bible Society, was founded about thirty years ago. Most of the other Societies among them have been founded within twenty years. The following statement of their receipts last year, is given by the American and Foreign Christian Union, and shows a gratifying advance of evangelical piety and zeal in that country:—

	Receipts in francs.
Refuge for Protestant Children,	37,559
Religious Tract Society,	64,600
Protestant Bible Society,	36 144
Sou Protestant Society, (Miss.)	12,122
Evangelical Society of France,	150,202
Evangelical Foreign Missions,	88,970
French & Foreign Bible Society,	101,000
Central Protestant Society for Evangelization,	51,215
Society for the Encouragement of Public Instruction,	43,395
Institution of Deaconesses,	60,000
	645,207

From this it appears that these ten Societies raised about $118,000, and expended nearly $120,000. There are local Societies, chiefly of a home missionary character, at Bordeaux, Lyons, Lille, and at Strasburg, whose receiptsare not included in the preceding statement, which, if added, might make the amount come up to $140,000, if not $150,000.

Anti-Slavery Missionary Society.—The American Missionary Association refuses membership to slaveholders, and declines their contributions. Its sixth annual meeting was held at Bangor, Me., when the Treasurer reported thirty-one thousand dollars received during the last fiscal year. The following is a summary of its operations:—

The People's College Association held a meeting at Seneca Falls, N. Y., on Fourth-day, Oct. 13. In the absence of the President, the chair was occupied by S. D. Tillman. Thirty-three new members were added. Several addresses were delivered by friends of the Association, among whom were Mr. Bascom, Dr. Cutcheon, Prof. Evans, Rev. Mr. Caldwell, Miss Stone, and others. It was determined to apply for a charter during the coming session of the Legislature. It was also agreed, that in the appointment of future Committees, ladies shall be represented. The following resolution was adopted by a unanimous vote:—

Resolved, That the course of studies usually pursued in our Colleges, being largely devoted to the study of the dead languages, and copied from that of European institutions, is not adapted to the wants and condition of a free people:—That the first and paramount objects of a College System should be, not only to give the student a full, clear, and accurate knowledge of the physical laws by which the universe is governed, but also to teach the best practical application of those laws to the work of the artisan and the agriculturist.

A Church that never has Dismissed a Minister.—A correspondent of the Central Christian Herald, writing from Windsor, Ct., says:—

It is a remarkable fact, that from the settlement of this town down to the death of the last pastor, whose remains are interred in this venerable spot, and who died in 1835, a period of over two hundred years, there never had been a pastor dismissed from the church, but they have died in the possession of the love and confidence of the people. The first of these pastors was Rev. Mr. Wareham, who died in 1770, nearly forty years after the settlement of the town. The last was Rev. Henry A. Rowland, who died in 1835, in the seventy-fifth year of his age, and the forty-second of his ministry. A case like this, where a church has not dismissed a pastor during a period of two hundred years, will hardly find a parallel in the history of our country.

We understand that fraudulent tickets to California passengers are again being issued, and warn those bound to the Golden Region to buy only of owners of steamers, and not of pretended agents.

European News.

One week later news from Europe has come to hand since our last, of which we make the following summary.

From England there is no political news of importance. The American Guano Expedition to the Lobos Island, was creating considerable uneasiness among the dealers in Guano and the Peruvian bond-holders. Fears of a collision were entertained.

The harvest in the North of England was almost brought to a termination. The general impression was, that the wheat crops, on the whole, would be under the average in quantity, while the quality in most instances is inferior.

Violent gales had raged in the English and Irish Channels during the week, and had caused much destruction of shipping. The only American vessel reported is the Emporium from America, which went ashore on the Coast of Northumberland. The crew and passengers, including three females, were saved.

Four emigrant ships for Australia sailed from Liverpool within a few days, viz: the Tancred, Ben Nevis, Shackamaxon, and Catharine Mitchell.

Wm. Crafts, the Boston fugitive, writes a long article in The Morning Advertiser, in reply to some strictures in Dickens' Household Words on slavery. Among the chief patrons of Crafts and his wife in England, are Lady Byron, and her daughter, Lady Lovelace.

Serious damage has been done recently by inundations at Naples.

The Paris journals are principally occupied with chronicling the progress of the President through the Southern Departments. At Grenoble, Avignon and Marseilles, the President was received with the most extravagant outward demonstrations of joy. Beneath all this current of popular rejoicing, however, there are plain indications of secret dislike and hatred to his rule. This is proved by the discovery of a well planned conspiracy to assassinate the President at Marseilles, where a formidable infernal machine, planted in a house on the street through which Louis Napoleon was to pass the next day, was seized by the police. The machine was composed of 250 gun-barrels loaded with 1,500 bullets, besides four blunderbusses similarly charged with grape shot. This battery, if fired during the passage of the cortege, would have completely swept away the President and all his attendants. Many of the conspirators were arrested.

Great activity prevails in the French Navy Yards. The Government have completed contracts with Mr. Stewart, an American, for 1,000 masts of Florida pine.

The Government of Spain has ordered honors to be rendered to the memory of the late Duke of Wellington. Gen. Castanos, who served under Wellington, is just dead—aged 95—and will be buried with national solemnity.

From Burmah we learn that the steamer Phlegethon had been up the river to Prome to reconnoitre, and it was believed a general advance would be made as soon as four or five additional regiments reached Rangoon.

Four days Later.

—After the above was in type, four days later news was received by the Arctic—the Liverpool dates being Oct. 6.

We regret to have to record the total loss of the ship Mobile, Capt. Tarbox, of and for New Orleans, from Liverpool 27th ult., with a crew of twenty-three hands and sixty passengers, all of whom, with the exception of nine, perished. The Mobile sailed from the Mersey, on Tuesday morning, with a fair wind, and made a rapid rate throughout the day. At midnight the Captain went below, leaving the second mate in charge, with orders to steer west-south-west, and to call him (the Captain) at 2 o'clock, or sooner, if the weather became threatening. At midnight the wind was blowing a fresh breeze from east-north-east, with a heavy sea, which soon increased to a violent gale. On the Captain coming on deck at 2 o'clock, he found the ship on a lee shore, from which it was impossible to extricate her—the second mate having, it is said, mistaken his orders, and kept the ship on a west-north-west course. At 2½ she struck heavily on Arklow Bank, and shortly afterward commenced to break up. Efforts were made to launch the boats, but in consequence of the high sea they were fruitless. A few hours after the vessel struck the weather moderated; and at 11 o'clock on Thursday morning two schooners hove in sight, and immediately bore down to the wreck. One of them, bound to Glasgow, took off four sailors and the only surviving passengers, and the other took the remaining four sailors and landed them at Wexford, whence they have been forwarded to Liverpool. As an instance of the little chance it was thought there was of any one on board being saved, an incident occurred which is worth relating. In the cabin was a lady passenger who had upward of £500 in gold in her possession, which she offered to one of the sailors, but he rejected the proffered gift, as he would have no chance to use it. In a few minutes a sea swept the lady overboard; the sailor, however, was among the saved. Capt. Tarbox and all hands exerted themselves to the utmost to save the ship, until one after another they were washed away and perished. The Mobile was 1,000 tuns burden, and nearly new.

A great sensation has been made in Paris by the assassination of Mr. Morton, correspondent of the London Daily News, by Mr. Bower, correspondent of the London Morning Advertiser. It would seem that Bower had suspicion of criminal intimacy existing between his wife and Morton, and the latter coming into his apartment at a moment when these suspicions had received confirmation, Bower struck him on the neck with a dinner-knife he had in his hand, and killed him on the spot.

M. Zucchi, a chemist in the employ of the Viceroy of Egypt, has discovered the means of clarifying the oil extracted from the grains of cotton, and rendering it of use in manufactures. The Viceroy has secured to the discoverer the exclusive right, for ten years, of clarifying and selling the oil.

The Marquis de Dammartin, Mayor of Uzes, in the Gard, was murdered on the 30th ult. A shot from a musket was fired at him as he was leaving his house at an early hour of the morning. Neither the cause of the crime nor the perpetrators are known.

Kossuth is residing in privacy at Kensington-terrace, Brompton, London. M. A. Lemny, his late Secretary, has just been expelled from Malta by order of Gov. Reed, who assigns no reason for this high act of Police.

Intelligence has been received at Vienna, from Syria, that the Druses are everywhere arming, and that an insurrection in Palestine is apprehended.

Intelligence has been received from Hong Kong, China, of the execution, at that place, of a French missionary named Bonnard. No details are given.

California News.

The steamship Illinois, with California dates to Sept. 16, arrived at New York on the 13th inst. She brought 284 passengers, and nearly $2,000,000 in gold dust.

The Illinois passed the wreck of a vessel bottom up, which appeared to be a brig of about 150 tuns, nearly new, and sheathed with metal; her spars and sails which were lying along side, all appeared to be quite new; her hull was of a clipper build, and the rudder rounded at the bottom. There is no doubt but the catastrophe was of very recent occurrence. The name of the wreck could not be seen.

The accounts from the agricultural districts of California are highly favorable, the harvest being abundant in quantity and rich in quality.

In the gold regions, new and valuable discoveries are announced, and quartz mining still promises to yield liberal returns.

The appearance of the cholera, both at San Francisco and in the interior, has excited considerable alarm; but the disease was limited in its ravages; and few cases occurred which were not the result of imprudence or previous debility.

Our advices present the record of an unusual number of crimes and outrages, from some of which loss of life ensued.

Some trouble had occurred in Calaveras County, among the foreign population, originating in the shooting of a Chilean by an Italian. The latter was seized by the Chileans, and preparations made to execute him. This called out the French and Italians, and a war was soon declared by the assembled parties. The military appeared, and measures were taken to quell the rebellion. The murderer was taken into custody, and finally sent to Stockton for trial. Quiet was eventually established among the rioters.

In Sacramento, meetings had been held and resolutions passed condemning the manner in which the parties having charge of the relief train, conducted it. It is asserted that these parties are selling water to the poor, distressed emigrants, at a dime a draught, and a dollar per gallon, besides many more acts that are revolting in their nature, and which are only intended to promote the sordid selfishness of the agents, at the expense of the suffering emigrants.

An interesting ceremony among the Jews took place in Sacremento on Friday, Sept. 3d, in the form of dedicating their synagogue. It being the first occasion of this ceremony that has occurred on the Pacific, it consequently drew together a large assembly of ladies and gentlemen.

A company of passengers left Panama for San Francisco March 7th, and reached San Blas in 93 days, 19 dying on the way. Thence to San Francisco took 65 days, during which 18 died. The tale of suffering endured by those who at length arrived at their destination, is beyond all description. For the last 13 days they had been on a pint of water only per day; and altogether without bread. In fact, they had been all but famished.

The Polynesian contains an account of the loss of the Schooner Marianne, on her passage, loaded with a miscellaneous cargo, from Hanalei to Honolulu. She was struck with a squall and sunk. She had on board fourteen natives, one Frenchman, one Portuguese (the captain,) a son of Rev. E. Johnson, and a colored man. All perished except the colored man.

Singular Discovery of old Bank Notes.—A large quantity of old papers, which had been accumulating in the store-rooms of the late Dr. Wing, for many years, were put aside to be taken to the paper-mill some days since. On overhauling them, a small parcel was found, inclosed in a piece of Oram's New York Price Current of August, 1804. When opened, it was found to contain $15, as follows:

A $10 bill of the "Farmers' Bank of Troy," No. 1,766, dated Feb. 22, 1802; John D. Dickinson, President, and Hugh Peebles, Cashier. On the back of the bill was written the name of "John Potter."

Also, a $2 bill on the "Bank of Albany," No. 342, dated Aug. 24, 1804; Jer. V. Rensselaer, President, and G. W. Van Schaick, Cashier.

Also, a $3 bill on the "New York State Bank," No. 917, dated June 20, 1804; John Taylor, President, and John M. Yates, Cashier.

These notes appear, from a written memorandum on the wrapper, to have been set aside to pay a bill. But they never performed their intended functions, and have been lying idle, judging from the date of the paper inclosed, at least forty-seven years. They were probably wrapped up by the late Matthew Gregory, father-in-law of Dr. Wing.

It so happens that the three Banks which issued these bills fifty years ago, are still in existence, ready to redeem these venerable relics of their youth. They are curiosities in point of engraving—presenting a striking contrast to the finished work found upon the bank notes of the present day. [Albany Jour.

A Ship and Crew destroyed by Lightning.—Wilmer & Smith's Liverpool Times, Oct. 2, says that on Saturday intelligence was received at Lloyd's of the total destruction of the ship Maise, of Queenstown, Pearson, master, by lightning, on the 3d of August last, when off the island of Malta. The ship, being on her passage from Ibrail to Queenstown, was overtaken by a violent thunderstorm. At half-past 10 P. M. the vessel was struck by lightning, which passed down her mainmast, and, striking the hull, separated it in two pieces, fore and aft. The ship instantly went down, with the crew, fourteen in number, and two passengers. Captain Pearson, on rising, caught a floating spar from the wreck, on which he continued to buoy himself up, and for seventeen hours afterward he kept himself above water, when he was happily descried by a Maltese coasting vessel, and landed at Queenstown, Ireland, the whole of the crew and passengers having perished.

"I omitted to mention in my last, that I was attacked by a fleet of nine piratical junks on the coast of Hainan. The ship was between the land and the junks, wind light, and the pirates within a quarter of a mile of me, when they all bore down upon the ship, beating their gongs and firing with double-shotted guns. The guns, however, were too heavily shotted, and fell short of us. The breeze providentially freshed, and I soon got clear of them; but for this, nothing could have saved us, for some of the junks had mounted sixteen guns, and had from forty to fifty men on board."

Air-Line Southward from New York.—The "Florence and Keyport Company" is incorporated by the State of New Jersey, to hold a capital of 20,000 shares, of $100 each. They own the property at Keyport, below Staten Island, which is on the air-line from New York to Philadelphia. They have a plank road already finished for one-third of the distance from Keyport, 36 miles, to Florence, below Bordentown, on the Delaware, and when this is completed, they will be able, by ferries at both ends, to carry passengers between New York and Philadelphia for $1. Should they get a railroad, the time required will be reduced to four hours. Another railroad is projected to Cape May, thence across Delaware Bay by a ferry, thence in a straight line across the Peninsula to the Chesapeake, opposite Norfolk, bringing that place within ten hours of New York. [Independent.

Railroad Accident.—On Thurday, Oct. 7th, a terrible accident occurred on the Boston, Concord and Montreal Railroad. An extra train was coming from the steamboat Dover, at Meredith Village, en route for the State Fair at Meredith Bridge. Soon after it started, a car coupling broke, while on a spile bridge near the Weirs. Before the accident could be repaired, another extra train from the steamer Dover ran into it, and a most heart-rending scene ensued. A number of platform cars were jammed together, and great injury of life and limb ensued. Six persons were killed outright, or so wounded that they died within twenty-four hours. A large number were badly injured.

SUMMARY.

Thompson's Bank Note Reporter says: The following Banks have recently been organized under the General Banking Law of Indiana, and have commenced business under favorable auspices; Plymouth Bank, at Plymouth, C. D. Clark, President; State Stock Bank, at Logansport; Public Stock Bank, at Newport, W. H. Marston, President. The notes of these Banks we quote at ¾.

The Troy Post says that six of the persons who are alledged to have been connected with the recent outrage at Shaw's, in Berlin, have been committed by Justice Brintnall for trial. Their names are David Lamphier, Ira Adams, Martin Coon, William Cahar, Peter Whitbec, (brother of the person killed,) and John Collins. They were all committed on a charge of arson in the first degree.

Michael Timmons, who stated that he was from New York, committed suicide on the 7th at Pittsburgh, by opening his abdomen with a razor! He was at the time in the hospital, suffering under an attack of severe diarrhea. It appeared that the unfortunate man had been so harrassed by his disease, that life became intolerable to him, and in a fit of mental aberration, he destroyed himself.

At Pittsfield, Mass., a few nights since, Dr. Root heard somebody trespassing upon his pear-tree, and, running out suddenly, surprised the rogue, who ran off without so much as bidding the Dr. good night, and leaving a gold watch hanging to a twig of the tree, which the owner of the pears pocketed, probably well contented with the whole operation.

A vessel will sail from Baltimore for Liberia, Oct. 30th, and from Norfolk, November 1, with 300 emigrants, mostly free-born persons, principally from Virginia and North Carolina. Another vessel will sail from Wilmington, N. C., about the 1st of November; upwards of one hundred persons have applied for passage from that port; and on the 1st of December, a third expedition will sail from New Orleans.

Hon. Elisha Whittlesey has received a letter from Mr. John P. Brown, of Constantinople, in which it is stated that his Imperial Majesty, Sultan Abdal-Majid, is about to contribute a block of marble from Byzantium to the Washington Monument. The block will bear the cypher of the Sultan, and a proper inscription.

Thompson's Reporter gives the following as a list of the Banks in Washington City, the notes of which are good: Bank of America, G. Smith, Pres.; Bank of the Metropolis, old; Bank of Washington, old; Exchange Bank of Selden, Withers & Co.; National Bank, secured by Virginia Bonds; Patriotic Bank, old.

The Washington Republic states that the circulation of the suspended Union Bank of that city amounts to about seventy thousand dollars, from six to ten thousand dollars of which, it is estimated, are held in Washington by various individuals.

A dispatch dated Milwaukie, Friday, Oct. 15, 1852, says: Yesterday, a woman named Ann Wheeler, formerly of Cleveland, where her friends reside, shot a young man named Lace, in the street, with a pistol. Lace, who is a married man, had seduced her, and reported the fact in the saloons of the city.

A dispatch dated Boston, Friday, Oct. 15, says: The first snow-storm of the season occurred in this city this morning. Passengers from Albany report that in the western part of the State snow fell this morning in some places to the depth of nearly an inch.

Rev. S. B. Treat declines the honorary degree of D. D. recently conferred upon him, contrary to his known wishes, he being conscientiously opposed to receiving it; and he respectfully asks that no title be connected with his name, which does not belong to all his brethren in the ministry.

On Friday evening, Oct. 15, a collision occurred on the Utica and Schenectady Railroad, between the passenger train going East and the freight train bound West. The engine was somewhat damaged, but no one injured. The accident occurred between Herkimer and Little Falls.

An astounding case of embezzlement is under legal investigation in New York. The great banking firm of Brown, Brothers & Co. have brought a charge against their confidential clerk, Augustus Bowen, of having embezzled the sum of $220,000, which he has lent, since July, 1851, to D. A. Comstock, a broker in Wall-street. Comstock and Bowen are both in custody. The latter is a son of Mr. William E. Bowen, of Philadelphia, one of the partners of the firm.

Bill Ross, a free man of color, was sentenced at Richmond, the other day as follows: For stealing Mrs. Goold's watch, 39 lashes: For robbing Mr. Miller's shop, 39 lashes: For stealing from Mr. Bachroch, 39 lashes: Total 117 lashes. The Times of that city says: "The first instalment was administered last Thursday; the second, yesterday; and the third will be paid somewhere about Thursday or Friday next."

The Island of Porto Rico and the adjacent islands were visited on the 26th September by a severe hurricane, which did much damage to the shipping. A New York brig was totally lost off Inagua, and many others dismasted. A French ship was also lost in the harbor of St. Thomas.

The steamer Tuscumbia struck a snag near Memphis, on the 10th, and sunk in 9 feet of water. Cargo partly saved. The steamer H. D. Bacon struck the wreck of the Chillicothe at Island 10 and sunk, proving a total loss.

Col. Blodgett, who has recently come over the Plains, estimates the emigration to the Pacific by that route at 40,000 persons, with 8,000 wagons and 60,000 cattle. He passed more than 150 new graves, many of which have been torn open by the wolves.

The 'long-shore-men of New York—the men who load and unload ships, and rig them for sea—are on a strike for higher wages. $1.50 per day has for a long time been the price of labor among them, but they want an advance of 25 cents per day, which they will doubtless get.

The fare from New York to Boston, by the Stonington Line and the Fall River Line, has been reduced to $1.50—cheap enough, surely. The Stonington Line is the pleasantest for winter, and its boats—the C. Vanderbilt and the Commodore—are unsurpassed.

The Buffalo Courier learns that Messrs. Wards are preparing to build two of the largest size steamers this winter, to run in connection with the Michigan Central Railroad. They are to be in every respect superior to anything ever afloat on the lakes.

Frederick Keriger, a German, grinder in the cutlery establishment of Lamsons, Goodnow & Co., Shelburne Falls, Mass., was recently caught by one of the belts leading from the grindstone to the main drum, and thrown some ten feet against the shop so violently as to kill him instantly.

The Poughkeepsie Eagle says of the Hudson River Railroad: The work of laying down a double track, to extend ultimately throughout the whole length of the road, has been commenced and is vigorously prosecuted on three different sections.

The Boston Atlas says a boy named John Roberts, 12 years of age, was sentenced by Justice Rogers, on the 2d, to 6 months' imprisonment in the House of Reformation, for being a confirmed truant from school.

Thompson's Reporter cautions the public against taking the notes of the Springfield Branch of the Ohio State Stock Bank, as counterfeits are in circulation, so well executed as to be almost impossible of detection.

The Stonington line has brought down the fare between New York and Boston to $2 for cabin passengers and $1 50 for deck. The Vanderbilt and the Commodore run in connection with the Stonington Railroad.

The Richmond Examiner, of the 14th ult., says: "On Wednesday last, a gentleman near Fredericksburg, Va, sold to an Alabama planter 100 negroes for $45,000.

The keepers of eating houses in New York have united in raising prices about 50 per cent., on account of the extraordinary price now borne by meats of all kinds.

At Cincinnati, Oct. 10, a resurrectionist was shot dead in the city burying ground as he was disinterring a corpse.

There were, according to the report published in the New Orleans papers, 26 cases of yellow fever in that city last week.

At the Oneida Agricultural Fair, John C. Hastings received a premium of $1 for half a peck of Maiden's Blush—apples.

A negro, who had attempted to violate the person of a white lady, was recently hanged by a mob in Fayette Co., Tennessee.

Mr. F. O. J. Smith, of telegraphic notoriety, is said to have recovered a verdict of $50,400 against the Portland Gas Co.

A movement will be made in the Legislature of Michigan, at the next session, for the passage of a Free Banking Law in that State.

Gov. Foote of Miss. has designated Thursday, Oct. 14, as a day of Annual Thanksgiving in Mississippi.

Birth-Days.

BY MRS. LYDIA H. SIGOURNEY.

Bright birth-days, in the happy home!
A tender love prepares
Fond gifts to please the precious child
That dwelleth on its prayers.
It showereth o'er the blooming youth
Blessings and tokens sweet,
And bows before the hoary head
To pay an offering meet.

The birth-day of the absent! Thought
On winged scroll shall fly
To distant realms, or stranger climes,
Beneath a foreign sky;
Or bear that love o'er ocean waves,
That fierce with anger frown,
Which many waters cannot quench,
Nor all their billows drown.

The birth-day of the dead! Be sure
That sacred date to keep;
Send portions to the sick and poor,
And dry the eyes that weep;
Wrap garments round the sinking form,
Homes for the orphan find,
And bid the light of knowledge beam
Upon the darkened mind.

Spread wide the page that speaks of God;
Speed on the mission-band,
O'er western vales, o'er Asia's wilds,
Or far Liberia's strand;
Give teachers to the prairie-child;
Shed hope o'er souls forlorn;
Speak kindly words to erring hearts
That feel the sting of scorn.

Remember those who climb the shroud,
And plough the surging main;
Breathe through the prison-gate,
On sin's despairing train;
For all mankind let deeds and prayers
Of pure good-will be given,
So shall the birth-days of the dead
Help thine own soul to heaven.

The Perils of Ballooning.

To the Editor of the London Times:—

SIR: I was one of the passengers in the balloon which went up from Cremorne Gardens yesterday evening, and as our aërial voyage and dangers may interest your readers, I send you a short account of them.

We ascended at 6 P. M., with the wind nearly due west. There were, including M. Poitevin, the manager, 22 persons. We quickly reached a hight of one mile, and though there was a strong wind when we started, at that particular elevation it was nearly dead calm, and for some minutes we were stationary. We, however, rose higher, until we were one mile and a half high, and there we again found the same strong wind. At this time the first mischance occurred. It seems that the valve, by the constant rain, had become immovable and could not be opened. The aëronaut pulled at the rope till he was nearly black in the face, but without effect, and we still ascended. The fact of the valve being out of order was known to but five or six in the car, as M. Poitevin spoke in French to his assistant; but I, as one of those five or six, felt very uncomfortable, and made a mental calculation as to how long we could exist, going higher and higher, without food, water, or even cigars—for the latter we were not allowed to console ourselves with for fear of igniting the gas. At last the united efforts of two or three passengers, at the risk of snapping the ropes, pulled open the valve, and all was right once more.

We now, with quieted minds, could look around us, and splendid indeed was the view We were skirting the south of the Thames, and could see the whole of London, which looked ridiculously small, while the river appeared as a small mill-stream.

At an altitude of two miles we passed over the Greenwich Railroad, and proceeded onward to Blackwall and the Docks, which we saw like small basins, directly under our feet.

Leaving Middlesex we entered Essex, and began to descend, passing over Plaistow Level at an elevation of about half a mile. The numerous herds of horses grazing here were much alarmed, and scampered about in every direction. We now left these marshes and came over cultivated ground, and descended rapidly, too rapidly, I thought; but, alas, all the ballast had been thrown out before this.

Closer and closer did we come to the ground; at last the two grappling irons, which were hung down some 80 feet below the car, touched the earth, and dragged along it. The wind was strong, and we were rushing along about 20 miles an hour. Beyond pulling up the ground, they did not check our speed, and I quickly saw that at the rate we were coming down, and at the rate we were advancing, a severe collision was inevitable. Knowing that if free from the car I should escape its greatest violence, I clambered up two of the ropes toward the balloon, and thus suspended felt but little of the violent concussion sustained by those below, which threw many down.

We remained stationary for some ten seconds, and I was congratulating myself on the voyage having terminated with no serious result, when, to my astonishment, up we went again. I turned round and saw M. Poitevin pulling at the valve rope, but alas, it was soon evident that it had become jammed again!

Up we went some 80 or 100 feet, passing through the air at great speed, and then down we came again, with very much greater force than the first time, and I, who was then standing in the car, and holding on by the side ropes, was much bruised and hurt.

Before any one had recovered from the second concussion, we were once more off the ground, some 30 or 40 feet high, and rushing along, impelled by the high wind at as great a speed as ever.

Matters now began to look serious, and I, who had tried to laugh at even the last descent, felt inclined to do so no more. The valve was evidently permanently closed, and though two or three of the passengers lent their aid to open it, it resisted all their efforts. The gas in the balloon was not sufficient to hold the car off the ground at any time, but quite enough to lift it up and allow the wind to act upon the enormous surface of balloon At this point M. Poitevin behaved, as indeed he did throughout, very well and intreated every one to sit or lie down, (for standing was out of the question,) and on no account to attempt to leave the car, as doing so would necessarily endanger further the lives of those remaining, by making the car lighter. He spoke in French, but it was repeated in English.

Again we descended, and passing near a churchyard struck against a bank with awful violence, and the car, catching in the hedge and against the trunk of a tree, was once more stationary for possibly 20 seconds. Had all now sat still I believe we should not again have ascended, and many countrymen, who were running after the balloon, would soon have come up, and adding their weight, by holding on to the car, would have enabled us all to alight.

Again did several of the passengers, as well as myself, entreat the others to remain quiet, but while we were yet speaking one man jumped out. Who he is no one knew; but we may thank him and two others for all we went through afterward.

The weight being lightened, the balloon again rose. We cleared the hedge and started again.

At the next descent two more men, whom I had seen preparing for the spring, left the car, and, though one was thrown flat on his face—which I rejoiced to see—they escaped, I believe, without injury.

The car was now much lighter, and we ascended again more than 80 feet, and then descended, passing through one gate and two hedges ere we touched the ground. The violence of this concussion exceeded all the previous ones, and the car was for a moment standing on its end. I was standing and holding by the ropes, and also were two others; the remainder were lying down, one on top of the other, at the bottom of the car. I expected that several of these would be thrown out, and my arms were nearly jerked out of their sockets by the violence of the shock.

Either those two gentleman or myself could then with safety have sprung on the ground, but they, I suppose, as well as myself, felt how wrong such an act would be, and to what certain destruction we should be condemning a poor lady who was nearly senseless at the bottom of the car, as well as any who remained with her.

Quickly did the car right, and quickly did we proceed with our voyage, amid the groans of many who were much hurt.

At the next descent one gentleman was thrown from one end of the car to the other, and put out his knee-cap.

I remember but little more. All my energies were devoted to avoiding the force of the collisions and to prevent my being thrown out of the car.

We were dragged on in this way, some say two miles, but I should think one and a half miles. We passed over water, we knocked down pailings, we caught on an iron gate or rail—in short, we had some seven or eight more descents, and I saw no end to this unpleasant proceeding.

The wind appeared to me to increase, for the shocks were certainly greater each time we touched the ground or struck against a tree or bank. My strength was nearly exhausted, and there were, I believe, none who did not feel that our position was one of imminent peril.

The rate at which we now tore along was so great, from the increased force of the wind, that to have left the car at all would have been difficult, more especially as we never now remained stationary for an instant.

This scene, so likely to have had a tragic termination, was brought to an end by two large hayricks, against which we were clashed, and which were too substantial for even our huge balloon to break through. We now all sprung out, and at the same moment the silk rent from top to bottom, and allowed the whole of that huge volume of gas to escape.

Thus ended our adventures by air and land, and I believe all felt, as I am sure I did, that we had a wonderful escape.

We found ourselves at Eastham in Essex, and wet to the skin, much bruised and hurt. We were glad to find that the North Woolwich Railway station was not above two or three miles off.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
LONDON, Sept. 21. ONE WHO SAW AND FELT IT ALL.

Kossuth on Emigration.

The following letter of advice, to an emigrant to America, appears in the Newcastle (England) Chronicle:—

DEAR SIR,—In your letter of the 18th instant you ask me, at the request of your men, about the prospects of agricultural laborers and coal miners in America. I feel honored by this confidence, and gladly give you my impressions. The United States, especially the Western portion of the country—Wisconsin and Iowa—offer most favorable chances for emigration, especially to every industrial agriculturist who has some capital, £100 or £200.

There is not the slightest doubt that in a very short time he must succeed, as the value of the land increases materially by the natural progress of the settlements towards the West, while the farmer has, besides, all the benefits of his industry by his annual crops. Congress land, at $1 25 (equal to five English shillings) the acre, fetches, when cleared and brought under cultivation, in a very few years, ten to fifteen and more dollars the acre. There are, besides, such facilities for the education of the children, to whom the social equality opens the most honorable career, that I strongly advise emigration to every agriculturist who has some capital.

The daily laborer encounters more difficulties. Wages amount commonly in the West (besides board and lodging, which is given to the laborer,) to eight dollars (thirty-four shillings) a month; for an agriculturer in harvest time, one dollar a day, but hired labor is not so much required as in England, the farmers in the West being all small proprietors, who work their fields themselves.

As to the wages of the coal miners I have no experience, but I know that extensive coal fields are worked all over the Union, especially in the State of Pennsylvania, and skilled laborers always find employment.

With sincere thanks for your sympathy, yours faithfully, L. KOSSUTH.

Saving Seed-Corn.

Mr. F. Holbrook, a distinguished farmer of Brattleborough, Vt., has published a long communication on the subject of cultivating Indian corn, in which we find the following mode adopted by him in selecting seed-corn:—

While upon my present subject, I will say a word about saving seed-corn. All experienced farmers are aware that the productivenesss and early ripening of any kind of corn depend very much upon the manner of selecting the seed. I have a long-eared variety, which I have been planting and improving for some ten or twelve years; and although during that time I have tried, I presume, a dozen other sorts, I give the first-named sort the preference. Whatever may be said in favor of a change of seed, as regards other crops, there is no need of changing seed-corn, provided proper care is used for the yearly selection of that for planting. By proper attention to this matter, a variety may be perfectly adapted in its habits to a given climate and soil, and changed much for the better as to productiveness. The difference in product between careful selection in the field and taking seed at random from the crib, will, in a very few years, be much in favor of the former mode—the soil and cultivation being in both cases alike.

As soon as the earliest ears are thoroughly glazed, I go over the field myself, selecting from those stalks that are "stocky" and vigorous, and that produce two good ears. The selected ears are taken immediately home, braided, and hung up in a dry, airy place. When I commenced with my favorite variety, it was difficult to find twin ears; but now they are abundant. My crops also ripen ten days earlier than at first. I will not mention the length of ears that might be found in my fields, but will say to you, Mr. Editor, come and see for yourself.

Proper Size of Farms.

No error is more universal than for tyros in farming operations to suppose, that the business of farming may be pursued without means, and that first crops may be obtained from the soil without any additions. Nor is this error confined to the uninitiated only—for many farmers continue to plod on, trusting simply to the waste materials of the farm for manures, and raising small crops at full expenture for labor, and no expenditure for manure, and much less amount of labor as compared with the increased amount of crop. For these reasons many farmers fail of success, and they are generally constrained to follow this practice from having farms of too great size, and insufficient cash capital for their proper management. Current cash means, equal to twenty-five dollars per acre for the amount of land in use, is absolutely necessary for success, and even this sum is the very smallest amount that can be used with profit. With such an amount the farmer may buy his fertilizing materials at proper seasons of the year, have them properly prepared, and use them in the most economical manner. He may then have every acre of his farm in condition to produce a maximum amount of profit. When labor is misapplied, it is lost forever, but if an excess of manure should be used, it still remains, if properly prepared before use for future crops, and with many amendments it appears to be nearly or quite impossible to use an excess quantity. As an instance, suppose a crop be raised with ordinary manuring, the labor of culture twelve dollars per acre, and the crop resulting forty bushels of shelled corn. Let us suppose a similar acre, to which thirty dollars' worth of manure is applied, thirteen dollars labor, and the product a hundred bushels of shelled corn—it will readily be seen, counting on the corn alone, the first crop, the corn being worth fifty cents per bushel, makes a loss to the farmer of four dollars; and probably leaves his land impoverished, while the last makes a gain of seven dollars in corn, leaving the land improved, certainly to the value of half of the cost of manure applied, and the next year, in the succession of crops, the ratio of profit will be materially increased in favor of the more highly manured land. With many of the heavier crops the labor constitutes two-thirds of their cost, and, therefore, if the crops can be increased by the application of manure, without material extra labor, such excess of crop is at much less cost, and yields much larger profit. Lake Michigan Fisheries.

Accident recently directed our attention to the amount of business now doing on Lake Michigan in the single item of catching and packing fish. For many years the island of Mackinac was the only point on the Northern Lakes where the white fish and trout could be found, packed for transportation. So exclusive and so long was the trade confined to that little island, that its name was imparted to them, and fish caught in Lakes Huron and Michigan at the present time, perhaps hundreds of miles from it, are now known as "Mackinac White Fish or Trout," while but a tithe of the whole number caught are found near its shores. A few Indians or half breeds, until within a few years past, were chiefly depended upon for the limited annual supply, which was only sufficient to give them a bare support. Others who engaged in the business, though not confining themselves exclusively to it, have cleared therein large sums of money. Gradually, and almost insensibly, the fishing trade has increased on the two lakes mentioned, from thousands of barrels to tens of thousands annually, and not less than from eight to ten thousand persons are employed on or directly dependent upon the fisheries of Lake Michigan alone. There is a district in the south end of this lake, embracing the islands, bays, and mainland, extending North and South about seventy miles, from which there will be shipped this year not less than fifty thousand brrrels of fish, which will command in market about $250,000. To those unacquainted with the extent of this trade, the amount will appear enormous, and yet, as large as it has proved, it is conducted in a manner that will not permit it to yield by at least 25 per cent that profit which it could be made to yield. Those engaged in it are generally men of small means, who are not able to provide themselves, after procuring nets, boats, &c., with the supplies necessary for their support during the fishing season. Hence they are made dependent upon the fitful visits of a sail vessel prompted to visit their grounds occasionally to turn a penny.

Receipts for Housekeepers.

To Make Tea Cakes.—These are prepared the same as bread, substituting for the water warm milk, with a little butter melted in it, and sugar; let it rise; knead it into thin cakes, which bake on an iron plate over the fire.

To Make a Plum Cake.—Take a pound and a half of flour, a little ale yeast, half a pint of milk, eight ounces of sugar, the same quantity of butter, and a little mixed spice; make it into a dough before you add the currants, of which put in as many as you please.

Pound Cake.—Take flour, butter, and powdered sugar, of each one pound, eight yolks and four whites of eggs, and a few caraway-seeds; first beat up the butter to a cream —keep beating it one way; then gradually beat in the eggs, sugar, and flour. Bake it in a warm oven for an hour and a quarter. Cover the sides and bottom of the tin with buttered paper.

Seed Cake, cheap and good.—To half a quartern of dough put about six ounces of good dripping, the same quantity of sugar, a few caraway-seeds, and one egg. Mix all together, put it in a tin or deep dish, and bake it.

Doughnuts.—Work up a pound of butter with a pound and three quarters of sugar; add three pints of milk, four eggs well beaten, mace and cinnamon to the taste, and flour enough to make a stiff dough as for biscuit, with a pint of yeast. Set it in a warm place; when sufficiently risen, roll it into sheets, cut them into diamond-shaped pieces, and fry them in hot lard.

Gingernuts.—Six pounds of flour, a pound and a quarter of butter rubbed into a pound and three quarters of sugar; a quart of treacle, four ounces of ginger, a nutmeg, and a little cinnamon. Make the dough stiff, and then knead it hard for some time. Cut them into cakes, and bake. They will keep good a long while in a closely covered stone jar.

To Fry Tripe.—Wash the tripe, and dry it well in a cloth. Cut it in long pieces about three inches wide. Make a thick batter of egg, flour, milk, a little minced onion, and a little salt. Dip the tripe into the batter, and fry it in lard or good dripping, of which there must be sufficient in the pan almost to cover the tripe. Fry it of a light brown, and garnish with fried parsley.

To Fry Parsley.—Fried parsley is used only for garnishing. It must be well dried first, and then fried in hot butter or dripping. Lay it on a sieve before the fire, to drain the fat from it. In garnishing, place it round the edge of the dish.

American Climate and Longevity.

On a volume of Valentine's Manual of the Corporation of the City of New York for 1852, the Literary World has the following paragraph:—

"Mr. Frederick Depeyster furnishes an account of the Tontine Association, the holders of a valuable site in Wall street. This profitable 'life annuity with benefit to survivorship' dates from the year 1795, when 203 shares were subscribed for at $200 each, the rights of each subscriber or his representatives in the investment depending upon the life of a certain nominee selected at the outset. Its history is remarkable for the unusually high average of human life of the nominees, of whom last year there were sixty survivors—a longevity about one-third greater than the average of European estimates. This is worth noticing, as it is not an uncommon notion with foreigners that the duration of life is shorter in America than abroad. A further fact, stated in this connection by the Journal of Commerce, will refute this notion. 'About fifteen years ago a President of the New York Life Insurance and Trust Company addressed 5,000 circulars with tabular forms to as many families. Of these about 3,000 were returned completed, showing an average longevity greater than was ever before exhibited in an actual compilation since the days of men were shortened. The papers were forwarded to London, and excited universal astonishment. The list embraced all professions and occupations.'"

That our climate predisposes us to meagerness is no doubt true, but this is no indication of ill-health; on the contrary, the absence of all superfluous adipose matter it one symptom of the most perfect condition of the human frame. A man who looks like an Englishman in this country is in danger of apoplexy. We are, no doubt, in respect to physical make, the most spare of civilized nations, whether this be owing to the dryness of our climate or to its vicissitudes of heat and cold. But if we learn anything from barbarous tribes, we may learn from the Arabs that the greatest degree of meagerness is consistent with uninterrupted health, with the greatest activity and the longest duration of life. The Arab race in the African deserts is remarkable for the extreme dryness and attenuation of its muscular development; the muscles of their arms and legs being compared to whip-cords by those who have described them; yet no people in any part of the world live to a greater age; none are more free from disease, and none more remarkable for activity and courage.

NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA.—The Express, with the help of tables in Mr. Hunt's "Merchant's Magazine," compares the relative numbers of population in New York and Philadelphia. It concludes:—

According to this showing, the population of the City of New York is 160,767 more than that of Philadelphia, with all her suburbs included. Leaving out the suburbs, and taking the estimate for Philadelphia proper, as furnished above, (121,417,) there are 396,128 inhabitants more in New York proper than in Philadelphia. If New York were to include her suburbs, the account would stand something like this:

City proper,	515,545
Brooklyn,	102,000
Williamsburg,	31,000
Total,	648,545
Philadelphia and suburbs,	354,778
New York and suburbs excess over Philadelphia and suburbs,	293,767

REASONS FOR SELECTING A RESIDENCE.—In his address to the throng which crowded to meet him at his late visit to Marshfield, Mr. Webster said:—

"Many persons, when they come through these pine woods and over these sand hills to see us, wonder what drew Mr. Webster to Marshsfield, of all places in the country. Why, gentlemen, I tell them, have told them often, it was partly good sense, but more good fortune. I had got a pleasant spot upon the sea —I had lands about me diversified—not very rich, and I never had any great fancy for rich lands, they are generally flat and heavy and without variety—and I told them my fortune was to fall into a kind neighborhood, among men with whom I never had any difficulty—with whom I entered into a sort of well understood covenant, when I came among them, that I would talk with them upon farming and fishing, and of neighborhood concerns, but I would never speak a word to them, or they to me, on law or politics. They have kept their side of the bargain, and I have kept mine."

BRUISING APPLES.—The Working Farmer says, in speaking of the great success of R. L. Pell, and the high prices he gets in foreign markets, "Mr. Pell has occasionally made a thumb-dent in an apple, and after tying a label to the stem, placed the apple so dented in the center of a barrel of sound apples, requesting his agent in England to report the result. The report has always been, that more than half of such apples have been found decayed." How absurd, then, to club or shake apples from a tree, or even to tumble them by basketfuls, when hand-picked, into barrels!

IMPORTANT DISCOVERY IN NAVIGATING SHIPS AT SEA.—It may not be generally known that the latitude of a ship cannot be taken if the sun and horizon be not both visible at the same time, and that the artificial horizon used on land to obtain the latitude of a place cannot be used at sea, owing to the constant motion of the ship destroying the horizontal surface. We understand that Mr. Brinsden, of Mont Saint Hilaire, C. E., has perfected a mode for using the artificial horizon at sea, so that it is perfectly uninfluenced by the motion of the ship, and the latitude may be taken at all times when the sun is visible. Such a discovery will tend much to the security of floating property, the preservation of the lives of our hardy sailors, and must command the attention of merchants owning ship property.

MAKING BEESWAX.—To prepare wax, put into a large kettle about as much comb as is taken from a hive; fill the kettle with water, and heat to boiling. Then dip off the comb and wax into a cloth strainer, and press the wax out with a wooden spoon or paddle on a board, one end of which stands in a tub or pail. When the comb is all worked up, empty the kettle, put the wax into it, fill with water, and heat until the wax is all melted. Take off the kettle and let it stand half an hour, or until the scum begins to harden, which gives time for all the fine dirt in the wax to settle into the water. Crowd the scum one side, and with a tin dipper carefully dip off the melted wax into tea-cups or tin dishes to cool into cakes. This method insures wax of the first quality.

EATING GRAPES.—This valuable and delicious fruit is now in season, and remarkably fine both in size quality. One of the most scientific and popular cultivators, in answer to a question as to the proper method of eating them, states that it would be well to observe the following rules, namely: When in health, to swallow only the pulp; when the bowels are costive, and you wish to relax them, swallow the seeds with the pulp, ejecting the skins. When you wish to check a too relaxed state of the bowels, swallow the pulp with the skins, ejecting the seeds. Thus may the grape be used as a medicine, while, at the same time, it serves as a luxury, unsurpassed by any other cultivated fruit. A man or woman may eat from two to four pounds of ripe grapes per day with benefit. It is well to take them with, or immediately after, your regular meals.

JEFFERSON COUNTY CHICKENS.—There are some original ideas in the Black River Country, with which the Watertown and Rome Railroad has recently brought in contact with the Metropolis. With an eye to our Thanksgiving dinners, some enterprising genius has put in operation a new system of taking chickens to market. It is simply a railroad car on the principle of a refrigerator, the sides, bottom, &c., filled with some non-conductor of heat, and attached to the axle by an ingenious gearing, which drives a bellows pump or other cooling machine, which expels the hot air and keeps the contents cool. Such a car was loaded with chickens and other fixings at Watertown, a few days ago, and passed over the several railroads toward New York. [Tribune.

A READING PEOPLE.—There are in St. Louis, as the Shepherd of the Valley states, forty thousand Roman Catholics; and yet the editor complains that his list of subscribers in the city is less than one thousand! And his list in both country and city is about fourteen hundred! This state of things exists, notwithstanding the repeated appeals made by the Archbishop to the people in behalf of the paper. Does any one need further evidence that Papists are exceedingly disinclined to be a reading people?

VARIETY.

A short time since, two little boys were flying a kite in Glasgow Green; the kite had attained a considerable elevation, when a vivid flash of the electric fluid struck the kite, and in the twinkling of an eye, the kite, tail and paper appended thereto, and the greater part of the twine, were consumed, leaving the poor fellows staring in utter amazement at the disappearance of their favorite.

The 13th of September, this year, was the completion of a century since the introduction of the "New Style," as it is called in the calendar. The New Style differed from the Old by omitting eleven days after September, 1st, or calling the 2d the 13th, and by beginning the year on January 1st, and not on Annunciation, or 25th of March. The length of the legal year 1752, was, therefore, only 282 days, or about 40 weeks.

Farmers cannot be too particular in keeping cattle, horses or sheep from the new shorn meadows, until a good crop of grass has grown up. If the roots are eaten down too closely, the next year's crop will be much lessened. Not a hoof should go into meadows after they become soft from fall rains, or a still greater injury will be done. Meadows, to be profitable, should have good care.

We seem to have been impressed by our Creator with a natural love of flowers. They are the playthings of childhood and the solace of declining age; they draw away the soul from materialism to idealism, from the fleeting shadows of external to the imperishable riches of internal life. Let, then, all cultivate a love for flowers, for they are charged with a message of good to all.

All wet lands should be ditched and underdrained, for it may truly be said to be throwing time, labor, money, and manure away, to cultivate lands that are surcharged with water. To lime or manure such lands is only a waste of time and means.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

EXPLORATORY VISIT TO CANADA.

In compliance with instructions from the Executive Board of the Missionary Society, Bro. Wm. M. Jones made a tour into Canada, during the past summer, for the purpose of ascertaining what might be the facilities for establishing a Seventh-day Baptist Mission in that country. He left New York about the 4th of July, and returned about the beginning of September, having been absent some two months. His journal notes some interesting facts; and that the readers of the Recorder may know what was accomplished, we place a few extracts before them.

"On my way to Albany, I conversed with two French Canadians, and gave them tracts. Both had been raised Roman Catholics, but were now fast becoming Infidels. One of them gave me a card of introduction to his brother, the editor of a paper published in Montreal.

"Coming down Lake Champlain, I found opportunities for conversation and tract distribution. A passenger who stopped at Port Kent, accepted some tracts, and promised to give them to his minister.

"At Rouse's Point, I met a Catholic, who at first refused to accept a tract, but finally took it, saying, that if he found any thing in it contrary to his religion, he would burn it. You will bear in mind, that Rouse's Point is near the village of Champlain, where the Bibles were burned a few years since."

Aided by letters of introduction, Bro. J. visited the Grand Ligne Mission, that he might avail himself of what information he could obtain there with regard to other regions in Canada, their spiritual destitution, facilities for reaching them, &c.

"This station is near the Railroad from Rouse's Point to Montreal. It is a country place; the premises comprise 80 acres of land, with suitable buildings for mission purposes. The Mission House is of stone, and ample for the accommodation of twenty-five students, four professors, family, &c. The Chapel and Day School Room are one, and in the Mission House. There are about 30 scholars in the primary school, who are taught gratuitously. The young men, students in the academic department, are all, or nearly all, converts from the different stations, and are boarded and taught gratuitously."

At Grand Ligne, our brother had striking evidence of the perfect panic which the doctrine of the Sabbath not unfrequently produces among First-day people, when they have reason to apprehend an attempt, on our part, to conduct our operations any where within their territories. Very significant advice was given him; as, for instance, "1st. Great prudence; preach Christ, and not the Sabbath. 2d. Seek out a station far, far from all present Protestant stations. 3d. It would be better, far better, for the cause of Christ among the poor and now too much distracted Canadians, if we would content ourselves at home, in the United States, where people are better prepared to make all due allowance for so many differences among Christians. 4th. The fear was expressed, that our course in Canada would bring a great scandal upon the cause of our Redeemer," &c., &c.

"From Grand Ligne I came to Montreal, and made arrangements for printing the 'Appeal for the restoration of the Sabbath' in French. Had the promise of its being out in one week. In the mean time, I was busy in making acquaintances, inquiries, and observations, and had a few opportunities for tract distribution. The editor of the French Baptist paper had promised to aid me in revising the translation of the 'Appeal,' but after going over about one third of it, excused himself, and I submitted the rest to the editor to whom I had already received a card of introduction from his brother on board the steamboat. This editor is a Catholic, and says that the Appeal contains a powerful argument. I wanted to put an advertisement in his paper, but he refused, on the ground that it would call down the wrath of the priests, all for nothing."

"Here, at my boarding house, I have frequent opportunities of seeing Canadians from the country. One man who goes to Australia has accepted tracts, and promised to take them with him. Another, an Episcopalian, received some, and promised to read them. Several have been taken from the parlor table by boarders and country people."

"Visited St. Hyacinthe and St. Pie. At the latter place is a Baptist missionary station, located in the country, three miles from the village, on the bank of the Yamaska river. A primary school of forty, and a young ladies' school of twenty scholars, are connected with the mission. I left some tracts at this place, and talked with some who seemed considerably interested to know something of this new and strange doctrine."

"At St. Hyacinthe, distributed a few tracts, and conversed with several; among others, two farmers from near Vermont, who manifested quite an eagerness for tracts. St. H. is quite a pretty village, built on both sides of the Yamaska river, 13½ miles from St. Pie, and 30 miles from Montreal, on the St. Lawrence and Atlantic Railroad. It has a population of three thousand, also a large Catholic Church, College, and Convent. There is no Protestant mission there. One of the Grand Ligne colporteurs visits the place occasionally. It seems to me, that some of our people are very much needed there.

"I also visited the Pedobaptist mission at Point aux Trembles, nine miles from Montreal. They have a boy's and girl's school numbering about eighty. Like the Baptist mission schools, board and tuition, and in some cases clothing, are furnished gratuitously. The mission owns a farm here of 110 acres. There are six stations connected with this mission; one is in this city, (Montreal.) They have had a missionary here for twelve years, and the average number of hearers is fifteen! The school at Point aux Trembles was commenced eight or ten years ago, with only two or three scholars. The progress of the gospel at all the missionary stations is very slow."

In a few days, Bro. J. visited St. H. again, from which place he writes to the Board more fully.

"My Catholic landlord here introduced me to three families belonging to 'the church,' and of course known as Protestants. They received me very politely, and invited me to preach for them. They have no minister, and there is no Protestant preaching in the place. In the evening, called again upon two of these families, and conversed upon religion. They expressed considerable anxiety about their situation as sheep having no shepherd. They wished for some Protestant preaching, and especially for a Protestant primary and select school. There are none but Catholic schools here.

"While in Montreal, I met with a distinguished gentleman of this place, who invited me to visit him, in case I came here. Yesterday morning, I called upon him at his residence; found him in his library, and received a cordial welcome. He knew beforehand my profession, and to what denomination I belong. He took me, first, through his house, which is a sort of country farmer's palace. Two or three things interested me; his intelligence, as also that of his family, his collection of curiosities, and his library. In the latter I was shown two Bibles—Protestant versions—of great antiquity. He also took me about town and country in his carriage, and over his farm, into his gardens, &c. The courteous treatment I received from him and his family will not soon be forgotten.

"In the afternoon of yesterday, called upon an English family, and had quite an interesting interview. They belong to 'the church,' yet expressed a wish for some Protestant minister to preach in this place, and to settle among them.

"Towards the close of the Sabbath, to-day, I went over the river, and called upon an English family, and, I am happy to say, a very pious one, and, as is usual in such cases, a poor family. Found two French Canadian ladies in this house, both Protestants, one of whom has, within two weeks, been driven from her home, because, through the simple reading of the Bible, she had been converted, and left the Romish Church. Before leaving them, I took the French Testament, read the 16th chap. of Acts, explained it, and then prayed with them. The husband, wife, and daughter, and the two sisters, made a respectable French audience. They were all much affected. At my first introduction, the gentleman remarked, 'We are only a few Protestants here, and are like sheep having no shepherd. O that you, or any good minister of Jesus Christ, would come and preach to us. You can preach in French, and I suppose the French Canadians would stone us; but then we must bear that." Then followed a long conversation on the Sabbath question; myself occupied in answering questions, and giving explanations. I thought that this interview was worth coming all the way to Canada.

"At supper, my Catholic landlady, and her cousin, who is a very rigid Catholic, made inquiries respecting our belief, and particularly about the Sabbath. Since commencing this letter, two ladies—one a member of 'the church'—called to inquire if I was going to preach to-morrow. I wish it was to be in French, but those inviting me to preach fear the Catholics, and objected. I have not urged it, but could I persuade myself that I should have a few to hear me, I would venture to give out the notice. The Catholic priests exercise great influence all over the country. It is very different here, about getting up meetings, from what it is in Hayti, or in our own country. I speak now of French meetings. Here, more than in Hayti, the missionary must walk (tout doucement) very softly. He cannot, in any country, act with the same forwardness in a Catholic family as in a Protestant. He must be content to talk on all subjects, watching a fit opportunity for a conversation on religion. O, there is no telling how much wisdom, patience, and love, are necessary among a people so blinded, and so much on their guard against the encroachments of Protestants. Truly, the disciple of Jesus needs, among Catholics, the wisdom of the serpent, and the harmlessness of the dove.

"As I expected, my mission has thus far cost me much anxiety, many prayers and tears. Lower Canada must be a vast missionary field; and O that our people were ready to establish a mission in it."

"Aug. 9. Met a congregation, yesterday, in the Court House of St. Hyacinthe, numbering about thirty. They paid very good attention; some even wept. Just before dismission, a gentleman passed the plate, and as I was going out, called me back, and gave me the proceeds of a small collection, several voices exclaiming, 'The laborer is worthy of his hire.' The congregation would have been larger, had more notice been given. Was informed, that four individuals were in attendance who expected me to preach in French, they not understanding English. That's just the way a stranger gets taken in. Regretted very much that I did not know it. Promised them, if I came again, I would give them a sermon en français. It is so understood, in case I visit St. Hyacinthe again.

"Yesterday afternoon, visited Mr. —— again. Saw the new convert from Romanism. She seemed filled with fears, in view of establishing missions in this country. Her friends who turned her out of doors, are very bitter in their opposition. One of them, however, is becoming more friendly. My visit the day before, and my preaching yesterday, led to a conversation between Mrs. —— and one of her Catholic neighbors, who finally accepted the loan of a French Testament, and promised to read it. Good may come of it. Before leaving, sang and prayed with the family en français.

"Mr. —— informed me of two men, living four or five miles from town, who are anxious some Protestant should visit them. He himself is very anxious that our Society should commence a mission here, so as to have a school, and the gospel preached."

"In the afternoon, Mr. ——, the gentleman from whom I had received such courteous treatment at first, called, and gave me two French letters of introduction to gentlemen in Quebec; and, on leaving, requested me to send him any thing I chose in the way of publications, and he would read them."

"I would have staid longer at St. Hyacinthe, but for a previous engagement to go to Saguenay. A gentleman from New York wanted the company of some one who could speak French and English. I wanted some one to accompany me, on account of ill health. So we agreed to go together. I am happy to say, that my health is now better than it has been. My spirits, too, are refreshed by the kind reception I met at St. Hyacinthe. At my first visit, I was favorably impressed with the appearance of things there, and now am still more so. I think there is an open door for us in that city—(it is a city corporation, through containing but 3,500 inhabitants)—more so than there was at Port de Paix, when I first went there, and as much so as we can expect to find, at first, in Canada."

According to arrangement, Bro. J. took passage for Grand Bay, on the Saguenay river, about 420 miles north-east from Montreal, and on his passage, enjoyed several opportunities, with some of the passengers, for religious conversation, and for presenting our views upon the Sabbath question. Arriving at Grand Bay, he found a village of some fifty houses, and left tracts with some few families, and a copy of the Sabbath Recorder. He also visited Cacouna, some thirty miles further up the river, near lake St. Johns. There he preached to about a dozen persons, and two or three gentlemen contributed enough to pay for the use of the room for the meeting. He also distributed French and English tracts among the people. One lady, a Baptist from Quebec, requested a copy of the Address to the Baptists. A French Canadian of some intelligence, and a strict Catholic, conversed a long time with him on the merits of the Catholic and Protestant doctrines.

Bro. J. also visited Quebec, and Indian Lorette, nine miles north-west of Quebec, of which he says, "It is one of the healthiest and pleasantest places I have seen in Lower Canada. I am of the opinion, that it would be a good place for a mission station."

"The vicinity of Quebec attracted my attention, as being very healthy and beautiful in scenery, as well as containing a dense population. In fact, it is the prettiest and most attractive part of Lower Canada that I visited. The country, on each side of the St. Lawrence, rises gently, till it terminates in hills and mountains. The farm houses are so arranged, that they present the appearance of one continuous village. At Indian Lorette, one has a fine view of the country on both sides of the river. This village is reached, from Quebec, by a daily omnibus, for twenty-five cents, over a first-rate macadamized road. It is situated on both sides of the falls of St. Charles river, and about four miles from Lake St. Charles. The mountains in the rear are within three or four miles. The village on one side of the river is inhabited by half-breed Indians; on the other, by French Canadians. Each have a Roman Chapel. Old, or Ancient Lorette, is within three or four miles. The country around is quite thickly inhabited. The winter there is said to be two or three weeks longer than at Montreal. There is a section of country north of the St Lawrence, between Montreal and Quebec, which I very much wished to visit; but did not, for want of time."

On his return, Bro. J. visited St. Hyacinthe again, and preached there twice, once in French, and once in English. He says—

"In case the Board establish a mission in Canada, I should advise a still further exploration. The missionary could employ, very profitable, four of five months in visiting those principal points which have, as well as those which have not, been visited. St. Hyacinthe should be made the central stopping place, or home temporary, till it should be determined more satisfactorily where to make a permanent station. For my own part, I see not why St. Hyacinthe is not the place for us."

"I heartily wish the Board was able to establish a mission in that country. I think you have reason to feel enlisted in its behalf, and am sometimes amazed at the stupidity of the denomination about a mission among Catholics. But I would by no means keep them from reinforcing the China mission, nor from entering Palestine. If they are riper for a mission to Palestine, (as I think they are,) than for one to Canada, go to Palestine first, and to Canada afterwards. Let us commence somewhere in earnest. It does seem to me that the Board would be sustained in occupying either of the proposed fields. I do feel, that the time has come for farther and more enlarged action. May the Lord of missions arouse us to the great work before us."

MASON'S REPLY TO THE SCOFFER.—To a young infidel, who was scoffing at Christianity because of the misconduct of its professors, the late Dr. Mason once said: "Did you ever know an uproar to be made, because an infidel went astray from the paths of morality?" The infidel admitted that he had not. "Then don't you see," said Dr. M., "that by expecting professors of Christianity to be holy, you admit it to be a holy religion, and thus pay it the highest compliment in your power?" The young man of course had no reply to make.

THE LAW DIVINE.

Say not the law divine
Is hidden from thee, and afar removed;
That law within would shine,
If there its glorious light were sought and loved.

Soar not on high,
Nor ask who thence shall bring it down to earth;
That vaulted sky
Hath no such star, didst thou but know its worth.

Nor launch thy bark
In search thereof upon a shoreless sea,
Which has no ark,
No dove to bring this olive-branch to thee.

Then do not roam
In search of that which wandering cannot win;
At home! at home!
That word is placed thy mouth and heart within.

O! seek it there;
Turn to its teachings with devoted will:
Watch unto prayer,
And in the power of faith that law fulfill.

PROF. THOLUCK AND DR. CHALMERS.

It fell singularly in with the current of Dr. Chalmers' thoughts, that, when engaged in the study of the German philosophy, Professor Tholuck, of Halle, visited Edinburgh. He took an early opportunity of spending an evening with him, at the house of the friend with whom he resided. "Dr. Chalmers," says this friend, "seated himself on a low chair close to the learned German, and listened with an air of genuine docility to all he said, throwing in a stray characteristic observation now and then, always, however, in the way of encouragement, never in the way of contradiction. Dr. Tholuck had published some verses of a religious character, which had given umbrage to some sect or other. He showed the lines to Dr. Chalmers, who, admiring them, observed that he had often been taken to task himself for a similar latitudinarianism; 'for, my dear sir;' he added, 'some people have a very fine nose for heresy.' While Dr. Chalmers was sitting in this posture, drinking in all that was said to him, Tholuck turned to his host, and said in German, that he had never seen so beautiful an old man. The words coming out so suddenly, in an unknown tongue, instantly changed the whole expression of Dr. Chalmers' face from that of happy acquiescence to one of puzzled amazement, which was in the highest degree comic, and this effect was not lessened by his eager putting of the question, 'What is it, sir, that he says?'—a question impossible to answer, and yet not easy to evade. The result of this interview was an amount of mutual confidence and esteem, as deep and sincere as it was sudden. Dr. Tholuck took an early opportunity of returning the visit, and spent some hours with Dr. Chalmers, urging upon him in the most direct and homely way, the necessity of directing his mind to the study of the German Theology, for, as it was from that quarter the bane had come which was poisoning the simple faith, so it was there alone that the antidote could be found. The day before Tholuck's departure, Dr. Chalmers called upon him, and found him at his mid-day repast. He sat with him only for a few minutes, and said little, but looked at him constantly with an expression of earnest interest and affection. He rose to take leave; and, instead of taking him by the hand, he threw his arms round his neck and kissed him, while 'God bless you, my dear friend,' broke with apparent difficulty from his overcharged heart. After he was gone, it was noticed that a tear had gathered in the eye of him who had received the apostolic benediction and seal of brotherhood from one he loved and venerated so much. His only observation was a half-muttered, half spoken, eben ein kuss—even a kiss." [Hanna's Memoirs.

WILLIAM GOODELL.

The aged Mr. John Adams, for many years preceptor of the Academy at Andover, Mass., and now a Sabbath-school Missionary in Illinois, writing a letter to a Sabbath-school in New York, gave the following facts in the early life of Rev. Mr. Goodell, the well-known missionary in Turkey.

"The first time I saw him was at my door, as I was leaving the house to open the academy, after a short vacation. He addressed me modestly, and inquired, 'Are you Mr. Adams?'

"'Yes.' 'Well, I want to enter your academy.' 'Very well, go with me.' 'Can I have 'charity?'' 'That will depend on circumstances. If, upon trial for one quarter, you are found worthy, you can receive aid from our 'charity fund.' I can give you no other encouragement at present.' 'I wish I had not come.'

"Upon this, I perceived the tears were dropping; he was evidently dissappointed; I said to him, 'Your are poor, your father cannot aid you in obtaining an education, you say. If it be so, do you expect to be fitted for college, then to pass through college, and then to complete your preparation for the ministry—all this without trials?' This had the desired effect. He recovered himself, taking his handkerchief, which his good mother had manufactured, to wipe away his tears, and followed me along till we entered the academy.

"I took his name, age, and residence; gave him a Latin grammar, and assigned him a seat. Before the close of the morning session, I called him to recite his lesson. He repeated all the first page 'verbatim,' notes and all; then the second, then the third. I said, 'You must have studied the Latin grammar before.' His reply was, 'I never saw a Latin grammar before you gave me this.' He went on in his studies with great rapidity and accuracy. In our daily spelling exercises, I never knew him to misspell a single word. In short, he proved himself to be an excellent scholar, a pious and devoted youth. He obtained all the charitable aid he needed. He had no more tears to shed but those of gratitude.

"When he came to Andover, he did not come by railroad, for at that time there were none. Neither did he ride in the stage, for this would have cost money, of which he had none. But he came a journey of several days on foot, bringing his all with him, in a wooden trunk or box made by his own hands, and lashed to his back.

"After he had been in the academy about a year, I consulted him about my writing to Mr. Solomon Goodell, a wealthy uncle of his in Vermont. He said, 'It will do no good. Uncle is a hard-working man, and is careful of every copper. He thinks that boys ought to work, instead of idling away their time in getting larning.' After several weeks, notwithstanding this discouraging account, I wrote to his uncle as good a letter as I could, commending to his favorable notice his very worthy nephew.

"After several months, a stranger rode up to my door and handed a scrap of paper in the form of a letter to me, in nearly the following words: 'Sir, I send you a pair of fat oxen for William Goodell, in your school.' This present was unexpected, and may have led the way in opening his heart to give very generously to the Education Society, and to other benevolent objects. He gave by hundreds of dollars in his life-time, and finally bequeathed the bulk of his property to charitable institutions.

"William Goodell, though poor and depressed at first, was sustained in the academy, and then in Dartmouth College, and through a three years' course at the Theological Seminary, Andover; and, soon after, entered upon his missionary labors. These, for about 20 years, I shall not attempt even to name. They are well known to the churches. After he had finished the last verse of his translation of the Bible into the Armeno-Turkish language, I seem to see him fall upon his knees, agitated and grateful with pious emotions, the tears rolling down his cheeks, and fervent prayer ascending to God from a full heart, that he would now bless his own word, put into a language which the common people could read, and could understand." [Am. Mess.

MIRACLES IN THESE DAYS.

The following anecdote was related at the Congregational Association, at Pittsfield, by Rev. Mr. Ellis:—

He went recently, he said, four miles before breakfast, in Franklin, to see John Colby, 89 years old, who had lived till 86 an infidel. He then fell into great distress of mind, and was impressed as with a voice from heaven—"Go to the Bible." "Go to the Bible?—why, I have never learned to read." But he went, and learned to read by slow process from the first elements, and obtained peace in Christian hope, to the wonder of his neighbors, and the vexation of his wife and family. Daniel Webster, hearing of the facts, visited his early acquaintance. "John," said he, "what is this I hear of you?" "O, Daniel," he replied, "you are a great man; you make laws in Congress; but this book contains better laws than what you make." He returned to his tenant's house from the interview much impressed and very thoughtful. He was inquired of with solicitude, "Mr. Webster, what is the matter with you, are you sick?" "Ah, Taylor," said Mr. Webster, "there are miracles in these days—John Colby is converted."

"UNCLE TOM."

In the many criticisms on Mrs. Stowe's great work, no objection is so common as that of exaggeration, or overdrawing in the finale of Uncle Tom's death. All who read the newspapers agree that whippings to death do occur, but all will not or cannot believe that any one, for conscience's sake, has died by the lash here in this glorious nineteenth century. Those 'niggers' who are whipped to death are desperate characters—persons who have worn out the patience of overseers and masters by crime and laziness.

Well, in the summer of 1839, we were in Louisville, Ky. As no great change has ever taken place in our opinion on this slavery question, we were at some loss then for a place to go to preaching, and used on Sabbath to walk out to a grave-yard, or into the fields, or up and down the streets in search of sermons. One forenoon, passing a little frame church, on Walnut street, if we remember rightly, we heard the voices of a congregation singing. Brother Samuel, who was with us—it was farther down the street than would have been thought safe for a woman to walk alone at mid-day—said it was a congregation of Methodists, and a missionary station, he thought, but assured us he had once dropped in and heard a sermon he liked.

We went in and took a seat. A plain looking elderly man preached in the style usual for Methodist preachers in country places—all about religion, its comforts in life and triumphs in death. Like Uncle Tom, he insisted, with great earnestness, that it was 'a great thing to be a Christian.' Religion—it made the weak strong, and the meanest most honorable. To illustrate this grand truth, he told an anecdote, as something coming within the range of his own knowledge, of an old slave who had 'got religion.' His master was kind, but irreligious and reckless, and was withal much impressed by the earnestness of his servant's prayers and exhortations. But one day, one evil day, on Sabbath too, this same kind master was drinking and playing cards with a visitor, when the conversation turned upon the religion of slaves. The visitor boasted that he could 'whip the religion out of any 'nigger' in the State, in half an hour.'

The master, proud of possessing a rare specimen, boasted that he had one, out of whom the religion could not be whipped. A bet was laid, and the martyr summoned. A fearful oath of recantation and blasphemous denial of his Saviour was required of the old disciple, upon pain of being whipped to death. The answer was, 'Bress de Lord, Massa! I can't!'

Threats, oaths, entreaties, and noise were tried, but he fell on his knees, and holding up his hands, plead, 'Bress de Lord, Massa, I can't! Jesus, he die for me! Massa, please Massa, I can't.'

The executioner summoned his aids, the old man was tied up, and the whipping commenced; but the shrieks for mercy were all intermingled with prayers and praises—prayers for his own soul and those of his murderers. When fainting and revived, the terms of future freedom from punishment were offered again, and again he put them away with the continued exclamation, 'Jesus, he die for me! Bress de Lord, Massa, I can't.'

The bet was to the full value of the property endangered. The men were flushed with wine, and the experimenter on 'nigger religion' insisted upon 'trying it out.' Honor demanded he should have a fair chance to win his bet, and the old disciple died under the lash, blessing the Lord that Jesus had died for him!

The preacher gave his recital with many tears, and before he was done, we do not think there was a dry eye, except our own, in the house. Our pulses all stood still with horror, but the speaker did not appear to dream that his story had any bearing against the institution with which we were surrounded.

We cannot remember how he said the particulars came to his knowledge, but think the martyr had been under his pastoral care, and that he got the minutiæ from the slave witnesses in 'love-feast.'

He gave us the story simply to show what a good thing religion was. Of those who heard it, and the many persons there to whom we related it, we found not one who appeared to doubt it. Any indignation felt and expressed, was against the individual actors of the tragedy. [Mrs. Swisshelm.

JEWISH PRINCIPLE.

The Jews sometimes display lofty principles, which show that the divine light exists among them, although frequently concealed by the old incrustations of Rabbinical institutions. In my own family, an interesting and characteristic incident occurred. My worthy grandfather was a man of great sensibility and of a warm heart, but easily excited to wrath. He had a brother whom he dearly loved. One day they fell into a dispute, and each returned to his home in anger. This happened on a Friday. As the evening drew near, my good grandmother, who was another Martha, full of activity, began to make preparation for the Sabbath day. "Come, dear Joseph," she exclaimed, "the night is approaching; come, and light the Sabbath lamp!"

But he, full of sadness and anguish, continued walking up and down in the room. His good wife spoke again in anxiety: "See, the stars are already shining in the firmament of the Lord, and our Sabbath lamp is not yet lighted."

Then my grandfather took his hat and cane, and, evidently much troubled, hastened out of the house. But in a few moments he returned with tears of joy in his eyes.

"Now, dear Rebecca," he exclaimed, "now I am ready."

He repeated his prayer, and with gladness lighted the Sabbath lamp. Then he related the dispute which had occurred in the morning, adding: "I could not pray and light my lamp before becoming reconciled with my brother Isaac."

"But how did you manage to do it so soon?"

"O," he replied, "Isaac had been as much troubled as I was; he could not begin the Sabbath either, without becoming reconciled with me. So we met in the street; he was coming to me, and I was going to him, and we ran into each other's arms and wept."

Might not we end this anecdote with those simple words of Jesus, "Go and do likewise?"

PERPETUITY OF CHRISTIAN LIFE.

President Woolsey makes the following truthful remarks:—

"The tendency of the renewed nature is to be uniform and unwavering, like the truth on which it feeds and the spirit which gives it life. Perpetuity, then, is the law of Christian life; and that state of the affections, at any one time, which secures the performance of the statutes, is the evidence that such a law is reigning in the soul. The apostle recognizes this law when he says, 'If they had been of us, they would have continued with us.'

"A temporary religion, then, is a religion without a root, which derives no nourishment from the Divine Word through the heart, but is sustained, while it continues, by something which is consistent with the reigning power of sin. It may be built upon hopes, and may have the form of a conversion for the groundwork of those hopes; and may look to God with joy and thankfulness as the author of the pleasant feeling which it entertains; and may cherish some kind of sympathy toward the people of God; and, besides influencing the feelings, may exert some slight power over the temper and moral character. But in a little time, when the fire has gone out which made such a blaze, and the life has left the tree which seemed so fair, the worthless nature of such religion is manifest to all men; for all men of a sound mind estimate the value of religious character by the faithful performance of the statutes; and argue, from the short-lived existence of such religion, that it was not of the true kind."

EDWARD IRVING.

"After sitting with him perhaps an hour, I rose to come away, and he said to me, 'Stop one moment, if you please;' and then offered, in tones the most affectionate and melting, the following prayer: 'Thou Saviour, who holdest the stars in thy right hand, take this, my brother, under thy special care; be thou his guide, his strength, his consolation, and his salvation. Let his preaching be accompanied by the power of God; and let those to whom he ministers be found among the saved. Do thou confirm his health; watch over him as he prosecutes his homeward journey; carry him safely to his friends and his flock; and honor him with a long and useful ministry, and take to thyself all the glory.' He then gave me his hand, and we parted. It was one of the most touching and patriarchial scenes with which I had ever anything to do."

Editorial Arrangements and Responsibilities.—In answer to inquiries which are frequently made, it is deemed proper to state, that Thomas B. Brown is employed by the Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society to prepare for the Sabbath Recorder one article each week, which is always indicated by his initials T. B. B.; and to him, of course, are referred such communications as relate to his articles. For all other matter, both original and selected, Geo. B. Utter is responsible.

BIBLE REVISION.

The multiplicity of commentaries may be regarded as an argument for a revised translation of the Scriptures. Let the Scriptures be presented in such language as shall, clearly and unequivocally, convey to the English reader the same ideas which the inspired originals conveyed to the people to whom they were addressed, and more than half the commentaries in existence might be committed to the flames, without damage to the community. But because learned theologians, of every persuasion, are sensible that King James' translation is a failure in this respect, they have undertaken to rectify the evil by their annotations. Is not this the true reason, and almost the only one, why commentaries are multiplied, so that not a year now passes without giving birth to some new effort in this line? Undoubtedly it is. Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, Congregationalists, have all been more or less dissatisfied with the common version, and have all set forth their respective commentaries by way of remedy. Episcopalians, too, have not unfrequently expressed their dissatisfaction in the same way, notwithstanding the version in use was "framed by themselves, and hammered on their anvil." Indeed, we may say of those in English Christendom, who have in this unmistakable manner declared the tanslation to be, in many respects, dark and unintelligible, that their name is legion.

It is a strange fact, however, that the very people under whose auspices these commentaries have sprung into existence, the very people who give them patronage to the fullest extent, and do their utmost to get them into circulation, as 'helps for understanding the Scriptures,' will resist, with an almost popish intolerance, any attempt to supersede their necessity by striking at the root of the trouble. Nay, as if to burlesque all consistency, the very writers of these commentaries, after having made what display of their own critical sagacity in exposing the errors of King James' translation they could, have not unfrequently wound up by the most extravagant encomiums upon its excellence, deprecating all efforts at superseding it by an amended version. Ministers in the pulpit, too, have done the same thing. Scarcely a Sabbath passes, without some attempt at an amended translation of such passages as they suppose to be wrongly rendered; and the people who witness such things, are made to feel that, in some respects at least, King James' version might be altered for the better.

This course of things has been going on for two hundred years. And is it any wonder that it has, at last, given birth to a systematic organization for compassing the very object which the accumulated criticisms of so long a period have demanded, and rendered absolutely necessary? Certainly, a sane mind could not have expected any other result. And though the attempt is made to prejudice the undertaking, by setting forth that the proper time for it is not yet come, we would ask, when it may reasonably be expected to come? If two centuries have not sufficed to mature the season for so important an enterprise, how much longer must we wait? Such objections are simply foolish; for, if we believe that the human race is progressive in knowledge and mental development, the investigations of the last two centuries must have served to prepare the world for just such an enterprise as is now proposed by the American Bible Union.

That the men into whose hands this work has fallen are not competent for it, is an objection which, for argument's sake, may be admitted in all its force. All that need be said in reply is, that if men of sufficient ability cannot be found among the friends of the enterprise, they must be among its opposes. For that the literary world contains men abundantly competent to give us a pure translation, or one at least which will approach much nearer perfection than that now in use, will hardly be disputed, except by some Rip Van Winkle, who is ready to swear that the world is no farther ahead now than it was when he first went to sleep. Therefore, if the objection has any force, it is because of the unworthy attitude assumed by those who make it. The friends of revision may very properly say to such, 'Why, then, do not you who are competent lend us your aid? Why do not you, with whom the wisdom and learning of the Church resides, engage in the undertaking?'

It may indeed be true, that the original projectors of this enterprise are by no means competent as translators; and if they have ever professed any such competency, it has escaped the notice of the writer of this article. The boldest claim they have made is, that they were able to seek out and employ competent translators, and to take the general oversight of the work, till it should be brought to a successful issue. And in respect to this, it is perhaps true, as of other reformatory movements, that "not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called" to be pioneers. Such things usually commence with the common people. Christianity itself, at its first promulgation, enlisted not many of the rulers and Pharisees. Indeed, if the higher portions of society, and especially those occupying stations of trust and profit, should to any considerable extent volunteer, to promote a cause which contemplated important changes, it would be a strange spectacle, such as the world has never yet witnessed. It speaks nothing for the honor of mankind, that it should be so; nevertheless, so it is. Men in high stations have a reputation to take care of, and no important enterprise can enlist their sympathy, till they have determined how it will affect their standing before the public. They are the last to come into measures which look to great changes, and not till the honest-hearted yeomanry have adopted them, and made them popular, do they modify their ground. Then, lest they should lose their reputation altogether, they think ~~it~~ best to drop their horns. Men in humble stations, however, feeling that they have no reputation to lose, and actuated solely by a desire to do good, throw themselves into reformatory enterprises with all their heart. Their whole-souled earnestness is blessed of God, and so it turns out, that the foolish things of the world are made use of to confound the wise, and the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty. And should it be so in the Revision enterprise, it would be in strict accordance with God's general method of bringing about his purposes. The projectors of the enterprise will be well content to forego are putation for scholarship, claiming to act only with integrity of heart, and from a desire to glorify God.

Protestants claim that the Holy Scriptures are amply sufficient to determine all matters of faith and practice. But the force of this claim is impaired, to precisely that extent in which the translation fails to express the meaning of the inspired originals. If the term Baptism, for example, does not express to the understanding of every English reader the exact meaning of the Greek baptisma, then, most unquestionably, King James's translation is not sufficient to guide the believer in every duty. Whether it does express the meaning of the original, we know, is much disputed. To those who have been trained under Baptist teaching, and have always used the Baptist vocabulary, it does, without doubt, express the idea of immersion, and nothing else. And such constitute, it is true, a very large community. But to those who have had another sort of training, the term conveys precisely that idea which their training has taught them to affix to it; and these, again, constitute a large community. As a mere English term, therefore, the actual meaning of it is uncertain, the meaning of words being determined not so much by their etymology, as by general usage. Hence, the whole controversy is, at last, resolved into a dispute about the meaning of the term baptisma; and should that be conclusively settled, general usage would, no doubt, soon determine the meaning of the English term in accordance with Baptist views. In the mean time, the Paptist zealously avails himself of this unhappy state of things, and vauntingly asks for a practical illustration of the Protestant principle respecting the sufficiency of the Scriptures.

The fact is, that the principle is not true with regard to any existing English version of the Bible. And if we say that it is true of the inspired originals, we make a claim which is of no practical value, since the common people are not able to read the originals. Nay, we virtually abandon the principle, and make Paptists of ourselves, the strong point of the Papal argument being, that the common people are unlearned, and therefore incapble of judging for themselves, in view of which a learned priesthood is appointed to regulate their faith for them. In short, the Protestant principle is invulnerable, only in proportion as the common people are furnished with a translation which is a daguerreotype of the originals.

Whether the Bible Union will succeed in bringing out a version in all respects satisfactory, is a question about which we may differ. But we see no reason to doubt, that very great improvement will be made upon the version now in use. The lovers of truth, at all events, have nothing to fear from the enterprise. T. B. B.

CHURCH IN PALESTINE.

A meeting was recently held at Manchester, England, for the purpose of hearing a statement from Rev. Dr. Gobat, Bishop of Jerusalem, relative to the position and prospects of the Church of England Mission to the Holy Land. His lordship stated, that intellectually and spiritually the Jews of Jerusalem were in a degraded state, although it was quite true that all who could read Hebrew generally made the Old Testament one object of their study. He spoke with commendation of the efforts made by the American missionaries, in 1824, to sow the seeds of Protestant truth in Jerusalem.

Efforts had been made by Bishop Alexander, and by himself, to establish friendly relations with the Greek Church in Palestine, so that they might prosecute in amity the common mission of Christianity, as opposed to the errors of the Jews and Mahometans; but the bigotry of the priests of the Greek Church was such as to render all these overtures unavailing. He (the speaker) had invited the Patriarch of the Greek Church to an amicable interview; but finding that he did not come, he went to that dignitary, who laughed at the project, refused to hold any terms with the Protestants, whom he would not recognize even as heretics, or as in any way entitled to more respect than a band of heathens.

The speaker detailed cases of conversion from the Greek Church which had blessed his own labors, and expressed his solemn conviction, that in every instance the proselyte who had been received into the Protestant Church had been sincere in his motives. He wanted funds to establish more schools. In 1847 he had founded a school in Jerusalem, to which he invited the children of Jews, Mahometans, Greeks, Latins, and in which nothing of religion would be taught but the pure word of God. It opened in November of that year with nine or ten children, chiefly proselytes, and it increased by small degrees, until recently it was found necessary to have two schools, one for the boys, numbering forty-five, partly children of Jews and partly proselytes; and another for the girls, who numbered thirty. Witnessing his success, the Sultan's firman gave full liberty to Christian missionaries throughout his dominions to pursue their sacred calling.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Sunday Railway Trains—The Sunday in Great Britain and on the Continent.

Glasgow, October 8, 1852.

At the recent meeting of the Shareholders of the Edinburgh, Perth and Dundee Railway, a motion by Mr. Maitland Heriot for the discontinuance of the Sunday trains was rejected by a majority of 1024 to 261 votes. No other result was to have been expected, after the frequent similar result of the same motion; but it proves the fallacy of the statement often made, that the running of Sunday trains on Scottish railways arises wholly from the influence of English proprietors—for on this Railway the shareholders are chiefly Scottish.

The alarm of Sunday observers as to the prospects of the day of their adoption continuing to receive legislative sanction, is every year becoming greater. The promised royal charter to "the People's Crystal Palace," formally sanctioning its being opened on Sunday afternoon, is at present regarded as the most unfavorable movement in this respect that has been made in modern times. The religious newspapers and other prints are therefore stirring themselves most zealously to prevent its execution. They have unwarranted confidence in the influence of public demonstrations, and at their prompting meetings continue to be held, and memorials to be prepared, deprecating the threatened desecration. It is scarcely to be expected, that those who have given the promise will be ready to revoke it, after the promoters of the undertaking have expended large sums in preparation. But while we grieve to observe how religious men can wrestle for the maintenance of their own institutions, and be regardless of God's, there is ground enough to believe that their anticipations will be realized as to the influence which this place of amusement being opened on Sunday is likely to have in the way of secularizing the day. There is no more reason for the population of the metropolis being permitted to amuse themselves, than for the population of provincial cities and towns doing the same—no more reason, either, why those who have not glass-covered places of exhibition should not be allowed to employ in a similar manner those they have, although covered in more common form. This is perfectly understood; and, in reality, therefore, the question is not merely whether the Crystal Palace shall be opened on Sunday, but whether the Tea Gardens, the Museums, the Theaters, and other places of amusement, throughout the country, are to be thrown open on Sunday, after canonical hours, and whether railways and steamboats, and omnibuses, and all other modes of conveyance, may not be employed in transporting the millions to the allowed places of entertainment? The ultimate result, we believe, will be, that all this will be done, and done with the sanction of the Government. When men desire not to retain God in acknowledgment. He often allows them to reap the fruit of their own ways. When Israel executed not God's judgments, and despised His statutes, He gave them statutes that were not good, and judgments whereby they should not live. (Ezek. xx. 24, 25,) So, also, when the church has shown its disregard for God's Sabbath, even their substitute for it may be taken from them.

Contemporaneously with their withdrawing human liberty, and preventing the utterance of opinion, the Continental Papal nations are interposing their authority for Sunday observance. We have noticed this connection in France, and now the Austrian Government is prohibiting throughout its dominions the employment of laborers on public and private works, as well as shutting shops, upon that day—places for the retail of provisions, during certain hours only, excepted—while she has established a censorship upon literature more severe and arbitrary than has ever hitherto been exercised, even in the east of Europe. No work, even of art, science, or imagination, is to be allowed to circulate without sanction of the Emperor or his Minister of Police. The police are to examine bales, and are instructed not only to seize and detain every volume entered in the formal list of prohibitions, but every other work that may appear to them in any way objectionable—the loss falling on the bookseller. Nothing more arbitrary could be enacted. The books they are permitted to read, even on Sunday, therefore, when they begin to observe it better than they have hitherto done, will be very select. None known to advocate the observance of the true Sabbath, it may be fairly presumed, will receive the Imperial or Police sanction. Yet the Word of God is not to be bound by men, when its author has a purpose of blessing to serve, for hearts that may be yearning to know His will, with desire honestly to obey it. Glory be to his name, He hath determined the bounds of our habitations, whether in lands bond or free, that we should seek the Lord, if haply we might feel after Him, and find Him, though He be not far from every one of us. YEARLY MEETING OF N. J. CHURCHES.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The Seventh-day Baptist Churches of New Jersey, comprising the Piscataway, Shiloh, Marlborough, and Plainfield Churches, convened with the Shiloh Church, for their Yearly Meeting, on the 15th inst., and continued their exercises for three days. A worthy zeal was manifested by the different churches, in endeavoring to increase the interest and render profitable this Anniversary Meeting, which was originally established by the first two mentioned churches, more than a century ago, and by them observed until the present year, when the other churches accepted an invitation to meet with them. There was present a good representation from all the churches. A large attendance was given to all the exercises, and an earnest and encouraging interest was felt by nearly all for securing a higher standard of Christian piety.

The opening discourse was preached by Eld. W. B. Gillette, from 1 Cor. 10: 12—"Wherefore, let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall."

We are never secure from the dangers of temptation. The Scriptures are given to teach us our duties, and especially inform us how we can resist and guard against temptations. All are liable to fall. Many of the worthies of our day and of antiquity have fallen—the victims of temptation. We are in danger of falling by reason of our self-confidence. I do not believe in the generally received doctrine of falling from grace, and even being in danger of it after we get to heaven. Neither would I say, that it is impossible, under any circumstances, to sin and be damned, when we have the example of the fallen angels. There can be but one spiritual birth, as there is but one natural birth; then, if we sin so as to lose the favor of God, I believe that person has committed the unpardonable sin. We as a people are fearfully exposed to trial, since the religious principles which govern our private as well as public conduct, differ so materially in some respects from those of other religionists; also, by scattering ourselves here and there among other people, thus destroying a concert of action, and exposing ourselves at times to overwhelming temptations. We are enabled to guard against the dangers of temptation, by keeping ourselves well instructed in the truths of God's Word, and applying them to the government of our actions, by observing the duty of watchfulness over our own desires, by appropriating our energies to some useful pursuit or noble purpose, and by preserving that spiritual frame of mind produced by fervent prayer.

On Sabbath Evening, there was preaching by Eld. James H. Cochran, from Luke 9: 23—"If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me."

Religion is rendered more valuable, and heaven more blissful, by the many trials and difficulties experienced in attaining them. It is a matter of free choice, whether we serve the Moral Governor of the Universe, or make our bed in hell. It is not only the sinner's duty, but his privilege, now to find peace in Christ. We must deny ourselves of our youthful follies, of sordid selfishness, of the love of worldly gain, and consecrate our all to God—with cheerfulness and humility submit to all his requirements and providences. In following him, it is necessary that we should keep our hearts pure and unspotted from the world, not be ashamed of the love of Christ, spread the gospel at home and abroad, and glory in his service to such a degree, if demanded, as to regard it, as the apostles did, a supreme delight to die for his truth.

The Sabbath Morning discourse was preached by Eld. Cochran. Text Matt. 12: 30—"He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me, scattereth abroad."

In religion there is no neutral ground. The moralist, or the man that satisfies himself with the plea that he does no harm, is not in a safe position, but absolutely an enemy of righteousness. Man is by nature depraved. This has become an unpopular doctrine; yet reason and revalation both teach human depravity. Therefore there is laid upon us the necessity of regeneration to enter heaven, as no unclean thing can enter there. There are too many negative professors—those who do not by any good works give decided evidence that they are for God. Many are narrow and selfish in what they do, confining all their labor to their own souls; others have perverted views of their obligations, contracted ideas of God's love, thinking that they can indulge in this or that propensity of our nature, or obey the commandments of God as they interpret them or as best suits their convenience. Against such the threatenings of Heaven are pronouced.

After the morning service, the ordinance of the Communion was administered. This was truly an interesting and solemn scene. Some of the aged fathers in the Church looked, no doubt, upon this season as the lastone in which they in company would celebrate the Lord's Supper. In this all the ministering brethren in this State partook.

In the evening following, Eld. Gillett preached from Numbers 21: 4—"And the soul of the people was much discouraged, because of the way."

Much of the old Testament Scriptures typical; instanced in the long and weary journey of the Israelites, which is a forcible illustration of the Christian pilgrimage to heaven. Many of the discouragements opposing our advancement in religion, and the remedies for overcoming them, were pointed out. God's forbearance towards us, even in our rebellion, and his love manifested in the directing cloud of the Spirit and the Word, were shown. Notwithstanding the circuitous route, yet it is the right way, if God so directs. God is always with the Christian, and arms him, so as to overcome the enemies he meets. Though it be through a wilderness, yet it is the only way to heaven.

After sermon, Eld. Jones briefly stated the condition and prospects of the people of his charge, and kindly warned them to awake from their general apathy.

Preaching First-day Morning by Eld. Gillette, from 1 Cor. 9:12—"Suffer all things, lest we hinder the Gospel of Christ."

The Gospel is a system of instruction to man—the revelation of Jesus Christ—contains glad tidings—is no law of itself—becomes the only correct science of true Christian conduct. It gives peace to the troubled heart, and permanence to joy and godly possession. Human laws and systems fail, because they carry the seeds of corruption; hence all the institutions or governments of man perish. It exercises no compulsion, but entreats all to become the willing subjects of Heaven. The Gospel may be hindered by improprieties of ministers, by mixing worldly interests with the advancement of divine truth, by bad management in the discipline of the church, by inattention of professors to the means of grace, and by attending to duties improperly, both in manner and spirit.

Owing to illness, Eld. Cochran was prevented from participating in the exercises of this day, and Eld. Gillette also preached in the evening, from Titus 2: 11, 12, 13.

The history of Paul's life and preaching, and the appropriateness of his instruction to Titus, were noticed. The grace of God brings salvation, unmerited favors. Human nature teaches us to claim favor, but the Bible admonishes us with fear and trembling to look to Heaven for aid. Salvation not received by all, yet sufficient for all. The Christian has no will of his own; therefore needful to understand the will of God. Never difficult to do any thing that God requires. Every one has some besetting sin, over which he must keep constant watch. In a dangerous position, when uncertain of heaven.

A strong desire was expressed to continue yearly the Meeting of our Churches, which in times past has been the efficient means of uniting more intimately the interests of our people, and exciting each other to more diligence and watchfulness.

The meeting, with divine permission, will be held next year either with the Plainfield or Piscataway church, as they shall determine. A Secretary was chosen, whose duty it shall be to record and preserve the minutes of each meeting, and prepare for publication a synopsis of the proceedings of each Anniversary of the New Jersey Churches.

MASSACHUSETTS STATE TEMPERANCE CONVENTION.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The friends of Temperance held a Convention at Boston on the 15th inst., to devise ways and means for sustaining and carrying into more effectual operation the Maine Liquor Law in the State of Massachusetts. The Convention assembled in Faneuil Hall, the Cradle of Liberty and Reform, and organized by appointing Hon. Wm. Hyde, President, with sixteen Vice Presidents, and four Secretaries.

Reports were made concerning the operation of the Law in various parts of the Commonwealth. The Law went into effect last July. There has been considerable difficulty, thus far, in enforcing it in some parts of the State, but more especially in Boston, owing partly to the apathy or opposition of the civil authorities, and partly to the difficulty of procuring evidence against those who sell; most of those obtaining liquors preferring rather to purjure their souls before God and man, than to expose the fountains that supply them with death. The opponents of the Law are making strenuous efforts to secure its repeal during the coming session of the Legislature, some spending their thousands of dollars for that object. The Religious Press of the State has come out almost unanimously in favor of the Law, and is exerting a powerful influence in its support. Most of the Clergy are also its firm supporters; occasionally now and then one, however, has a soul of such a stamp as to enable him to preach against it, and the printed sermons of some such can be found in most of the rum-shops of Boston, for gratuitous circulation. Certainly, these are a new kind of tract repositories, with decidedly an original class of colporteurs. Many of the political papers are either silent or openly oppose the Law, now and then going so far as to advocate open resistance. Personal violence has been offered to several of the leading temperance men, and occasionally the friends of law and order have had to guard the courts of justice, while liquor suits were pending, to prevent them from being broken up by mobs; but on the whole, the reports were very favorable, showing a spirit and a determination on the part of the masses to put down intemperance, that was truly gratifying.

Letters were read from four of the six candidates for Governor and Lieutenant Governor, in respect to their position in regard to the Law. Three were decidedly in favor of it—their letters were received with hearty cheers. One dodged the question—his letter was received with hisses.

Resolutions were passed, in which they return thanks to Almighty God for the favorable auspices under which the Convention assembled—congratulate the friends of the Law for the brilliant victory lately gained in Maine—declare the Law but the practical recognition of the great principles of all government—contemplate with satisfaction its beneficial effects, as far as enforced—call upon the civil officers to manifest official fidelity by doing their duty—and declare their purpose not to vote for any State officer, who is not known, by his acts or expressed opinion, to be favorable to the Law.

Addresses were delivered by several of the leading spirits in the Temperance Reform. The Rev. L. Beecher led the way. He said that he had long been fighting in the temperance cause; but he was now about laying off the armor of life. He wished to cheer those who were just putting on the armor, or were yet strong for battle, affirming that the prospects were bright and cheering. The present was one of the happiest moments of his life, and he thanked God for the success attending the reform thus far, and for its future prospects. He was followed by Pierpont, Walker, Smith, Walcott, Spooner, Edward Beecher, and others, from Massachusetts. The Hon. Neal Dow, the originator of the Law, and one of its best champions, was there from Maine, with several of his faithful co-workers. They said that several of the Massachusetts men had been over and helped them through with their late struggle. By their assistance, the friends of temperance had come off triumphant, having elected all but four in the Senate, and thee-fourths of the assembly. The Liquor Law, henceforth, was a fixed fact, a finality, in the State of Maine, and now they had come to help make it the same in Massachusetts.

The Convention, on the whole, was very harmonious and enthusiastic, and spoke well for the future success of temperance principles—all its members seeming to feel and act as if they were engaged in a great and glorious work. Macom.

ANTI-SLAVERY CONVENTION.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

At an Anti-Slavery Christian Convention, held in the Methodist Chapel, (Friendship, Allegany Co., N. Y.,) Oct. 13th and 14th, 1852, Peter Robertson was called to the chair, and B. F. Robbins chosen clerk. Prayer was offered by C. T. Champlin. The call of the meeting (signed by about 120 persons) was then read, as follows:—

"We the undersigned, inhabitants of Friendship and vicinity, believing Slavery, and all legislative acts to uphold it, contrary to Christianity and humanity, and desirous of knowing how to act as Christians and citizens, subscribe our names to this paper as a call for a Christian Anti-Slavery Convention, to be holden in Friendship, on the 13th and 14th insts., and we invite our anti-slavery friends from other towns to come in and hold with us a mutual and friendly council, how best to do away this great evil."

Four propositions were submitted by Mr. C. Cotton:—

I. That it is the design of this meeting to show what slavery is.

II. How it was introduced into these United States, and what that practice is now called by the supreme law of the land.

III. Its effects, not only on the enslaved, but also on the community or government where it is tolerated, together with its abominations and wickedness.

IV. Who are accountable for it, and how they should act to get rid of it, and clear themselves from the curse of its wickedness.

A Committee of three was appointed by the chair, to prepare resolutions, consisting of Dr. B. Babcock, E. Lanpheay and S. P. Witter. The Committee, after consultation, reported the following: The acceptance of the four propositions submittted by Mr. Cotton, and the annexed resolutions, excepting the last three, which were offered by a Mr. Stebbins, E. Lanphear, ~~D. E. Maxson, and Peter~~ Robertson; which were severally adopted, after discussion, in a variety of speeches by several individuals from different parts of the town and county.

1. Resolved, That true religion is to love God with all the heart, and our neighbor as ourselves.

2. Resolved, That it was the mission of our Saviour to relieve bodily and mental suffering, "to break every yoke, and let the oppressed go free," and to teach men to do likewise.

3. Resolved, That christianity and humanity cannot be separated; and if any church or people think to follow Christ, and despise the poor and oppressed, or neglect them, and refuse to remember them as bound with them, they are deceived and deceiving, are unchristian, and as such should be instructed that the requirement of Christ is mercy (humanity) and not sacrifice.

4. Resolved, That American Slavery is a system of the most daring oppression and wrong the sun ever shone upon, and is most fitly described by John Wesley as "the sum of all villainy."

5. Resolved, That the professedly Christian Church have the power to perpetuate or abolish it—that we believe in the language of Rev. Albert Barnes, "No power out of the church could sustain slavery, were it not sustained in the church."

6. Resolved, That in view of these facts, the church calls loudly upon us, as its members, to stir up one another to deeds of mercy for the oppressed daily, by prayers, by alms, by teaching, by preaching, by voting, and by all other proper means, by which its overthrow may be hastened.

7. Resolved, That to carry out the plan, we recommend anti-slavery prayer and conference meetings in every town and village, the formation of sewing societies, and other such means, in which we may be brought to remember the slave.

8. Resolved, That we recommend ministers of the Gospel, and other members, to present the cause of the oppressed, and plead it before their people, as we believe that to be their duty.

9. Resolved, That in all our elections, we should have reference to the good of the slave in the use of our ballot and influence, and the destruction of wicked laws.

10. Resolved, That in view of the great fact that slavery is a sin of itself, and of course the slaveholder a sinner, it is the duty of all religious bodies in this country to refuse all fellowship with slaveholders as Christians, because such fellowship quiets the conscience of the man, and tends to make him believe he may be a good man and yet perpetrate a system of most heaven-daring iniquity.

11. Resolved, That we believe the provisions of the late Fugitive Slave Act are far more oppressive and anti-republican in their tendencies than were the acts of the British Government which gave rise to the American Revolution, and that we are under higher obligation to oppose and repudiate it, than were our forefathers to oppose and repudiate those aggressions of the British Government.

12. Resolved, That there is no power but of God; that the institution of Civil Government is a delegated right; that its prerogative is only to apply and execute the laws of nature and nature's God—the equal, inalienable rights bestowed by the Creator; and that it is the minister of God for good to all its subjects, and whenever it administers undeserved evil, it is guilty of high treason against the only Potentate, the King of kings and Lord of Lords.

The above resolutions were received, discussed, (except the 9th, which was passed informally,) and adopted, without a division.

It should be stated, that the evening of the first day was appropriated to listening to an address by D. E. Maxson, of Alfred Academy.

How could slavery exist, did men live up to either of the first three resolutions?

B. F. Robbins. Clerk.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

I wish to submit to the readers and correspondents of your paper, the following query, to be answered by yourselves, or by any of your correspondents who may see fit to reply. It is not submitted for the purpose of stirring up a spirit of controversy, but of eliciting light upon a question of some interest to our churches at this time.

Query.—Would a Christian church be justified, by plain gospel teaching and discipline, in withholding or withdrawing its fellowship from a brother for the single reason that he had joined the "Sons of Temperance?"

Inquirer.

Westerly, Oct. 1, 1852.

Reply.

We are not able to see any thing in the simple act of uniting with the "Sons of Temperance," which is either a breach of the Moral Law, or a virtual renunciation of Christ; and therefore do not think that a church would be justified, on this account alone, in withdrawing its fellowship from a brother. At the same time, we think that a brother who values the peace of Zion, would abstain from those associations which would be occasions of grief to his brethren. There are ways enough for a Christian to manifest his cordial detestation of intemperance, without connecting himself with the organization above named. We submit the question to our correspondents, however, being too much occupied with other duties to go into any extended discussion of it, at present.

Trading in Meeting-Houses.—A brisk trade in meeting-houses has been going on in New York of late. A few weeks ago, it was announced that the Universalist meeting-house of Rev. E. H. Chapin, corner of Murray and Church-sts., which the Society bought for less than $20,000, had been sold for $46,000, the site being in demand for business purposes. That society has since bought Rev. Dr. Bellows' "Church of the Divine Unity," on Broadway, near Prince-st., for $90,000; the latter society having taken steps to erect a new and beautiful edifice on Fourth-Avenue. The Broadway Baptist Church recently sold its meeting-house, and has purchased lots for building on 23d-st. Several other transactions in this line have been mentioned by the daily papers within a few weeks.

The Japan Expedition.—The long-talked-of expedition to Japan is in a fair way of getting started. The flag-ship of the expedition sailed from New York last Sabbath for Annapolis, where two or three weeks will be required to complete preparations for final departure for the East. The whole fleet of thirteen vessels is expected to assemble at Hong Kong some time in May, prior to setting sail for Jeddo. "A fleet of such magnitude, coming from the great Republic of the New World, with intentions of peace and proffers of friendship, can hardly fail to make a profound and beneficent impression upon the Japenese, while the specimens of art, invention, and industry, which are taken out as presents for the authorities, ought at least to convince a people so intelligent that there is much in Western civilization which they cannot well afford to despise and reject."

Episcopal Board of Missions.—The annual meeting was held in Trinity Church, Boston, Oct. 5th. The sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. Lee, of Rochester, from Luke 24: 47—"Beginning at Jerusalem." The Committee on Domestic Missions reported that their receipts were $30,595, of which $7,583 were from legacies; the appropriations are about $25,000 per annum, and they employ two missionary bishops, Drs. Kemper & Freeman; and 85 presbyters and deacons. The Committee of Foreign Missions report their income at $41,408, and appropriations $38,785. They employ two missionary bishops, Dr. Boone in China, and Dr. Payne in Africa; 12 presbyters and deacons; 18 lay assistants, male and female; and 11 native teachers; total, 43 persons.

Illustrated "Uncle Tom."—Messrs. Jewett & Co., Boston, publishers of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," are preparing to issue for the holidays a gift edition of the work entire, in one 8vo volume, with one hundred superb engravings, from designs by Billings, engraved by Bohn & Smith, of Boston, in connection with other eminent engravers. They intend to make it one of the most splendid books ever published in America. One of the engravings will be an elegant steel-plate portrait of Mrs. Stowe.

Sailing of Dr. Bridgeman.—Rev. E. C. Bridgeman and his wife sailed from New York for China, via San Francisco, on the 11th of October, in the ship Wild Pigeon. They are expected to proceed from San Francisco to Shanghae as soon as practicable, to resume their labors in that city.

Death of Missionaries.—At Salonica, Turkey, Sept. 10, Harriette Gertrude, wife of Rev. Homer B. Morgan, missionary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, aged 30 years. At Bombay, Aug. 20, Mrs. Fairbank, wife of Rev. S. B. Fairbank, of the American Mission.

Death of Daniel Webster.

Daniel Webster, Secretary of State of the United States, died at his family residence, Marshfield, Mass., at 2 o'clock on Sunday morning, Oct. 24, aged seventy years and nine months. He had been ill for nearly a week, but was not considered in danger until the afternoon of Fifth-day, when his disease (which was of the bowels, accompanied by a dropsical affection of the stomach) took an unfavorable turn, leaving little room to hope for improvement. The following account of Mr. Webster's last hours is prepared from the telegraphic dispatches to the daily papers.

During the early part of the afternoon of Saturday, there was some decrease in the swelling of Mr. Webster's abdomen, and fewer symptoms of nausea, but there were no signs of rallying.

Repeatedly in the course of the forenoon and the early part of the afternoon, he conversed freely and with great clearness of detail in relation to his private affairs and the condition of his farms, stating his plans fully, and the manner in which he wished to have them carried out.

About 5½ o'clock Mr. Webster was again seized with violent nausea, and raised considerable dark matter, tinged with blood. Exhaustion now increased rapidly, and his physicians held another consultation, which resulted in a conclusion that his last hour was fast approaching.

He received the announcement, and requested that the female members of his family might be called in, viz.: Mrs. Webster, Mrs. Fletcher Webster, Mrs. J. W. Paige, and Miss Downs, of New York. To each, calling them individually by name, he addressed a few words of farewell and religious consolation.

Next he had called in the male members of his family and the personal friends who had been there within the last few days, viz: Fletcher Webster, (his only surviving son) Samuel A. Appleton, (his son-in-law) J. W. Paige, Geo. T. Curtis, Edward Curtis of New York, Peter Harvey, and Charles Henry Thomas, of Marshfield, and Messrs. George J. Abbott and W. C. Zantzinger, both of the State Department at Washington. Addressing each by name, he referred to his past relations with them respectively, and one by one bade them an affectionate farewell. This was about half past six.

He now had Mr. Peter Harvey called in again, and said to him: "Harvey, I am not so sick but that I know you—I am well enough to know you. I am well enough to love you, and well enough to call down the richest of Heaven's blessings upon you and yours. Harvey, don't leave me till I am dead—don't leave Marshfield till I am a dead man." Then, as if speaking to himself, he said: "On the 24th of October, all that is mortal of Daniel Webster will be no more."

He now prayed in his natural voice—strong, full and clear—ending with "Heavenly Father, forgive my sins, and receive me to thyself, through Christ Jesus."

He then addressed himself to his physicians, making minute inquiries as to his own condition, and the probable termination of his life. Conversing with great exactness, he seemed to be anxious to be able to mark to himself the final period of his dissolution. He was answered, that it might occur in one, two, or three hours, but that the time could not be definitely calculated. "Then," said Mr. Webster, "I suppose I must lie here quietly till it comes." The retching and vomiting now recurred again. Dr. Jeffries offered to Mr. Webster something which he hoped might give him ease. "Something more, Doctor, more—I want restoration."

Between 10 and 11 o'clock he repeated, somewhat indistinctly, the words, "Poet, poetry, Gray, Gray." Mr. Fletcher Webster repeated the first line of the elegy, "The curfew tolls the knell of parting day." That's it, that's it, said Mr. W., and the book was brought and some stanzas read to him, which seemed to give him pleasure.

From 12 o'clock till 2, there was much restlessness, but not much suffering. The physicians were quite confident that there was no actual pain. A faintness occurred, which led him to think that his death was at hand. While in this condition, some expressions fell from him indicating the hope that his mind would remain to him completely until the last. He spoke of the difficulty of the process of dying, when Dr. Jeffries repeated the verse, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me; Thy rod and Thy staff, they comfort me." Mr. Webster said immediately: "The fact, the fact. That is what I want. Thy rod, Thy rod; Thy staff, Thy staff."

The close was perfectly tranquil and easy, and occurred at precisely 22 minutes before 3 o'clock. The persons present were Mr. and Mrs. Fletcher Webster, Mr. and Mrs. Paige, Mr. S. A. Appleton, Miss Downes, Mr. Leroy, Edward Curtis, Peter Harvey, George T. Curtis, Charles Henry Thomson, (or Thomas,) Esq., George J. Abbott and W. C. Zantzinger of the State Department, Drs. Jeffries and J. Mason Warren, and the personal attendants and domestics of Mr. Webster. Mrs. Webster being unable to witness the last moments, awaited the event in her own apartment.

We learn that Mr. Webster, by his own special direction, will be buried in an unostentatious manner. The funeral services will be performed by the clergymen of the parish of South Marshfield, at which place the remains will be interred in the tomb.

The Case of Shooting at Milwaukee.

The Milwaukee Wisconsin of the 14th gives the following particulars in relation to the shooting of Lace in that city:—

This forenoon, between 10 and 11 o'clock, John M. W. Lace, well known in this city, was shot, while standing looking at the prints in the window of Hopkins's book-store on Wisconsin-st., by a woman who came up silently behind him, and fired a pistol close to the back of his head. He fell dead without a groan, his blood gushing out and forming pools upon the pavement. His body was raised by those who happened to be near, and borne to his lodgings. The woman who committed the deed is named Ann Wheeler, an American, and formerly of Cleveland, Ohio, where her parents and friends now reside. She is a mantua-maker and milliner, having rooms in the basement of No. 12 Wisconsin-st. She did not speak to her victim when she shot him, and he could not have known her intention or presence. She drew the pistol from her dress, and held it firmly, as the result shows. When she saw him fall, she offered the pistol to those who surrounded her, and declared her readiness to submit herself to the authorities, declaring that she had accomplished her object. She was immediately conducted to the Jail by Officer Page, to whom she delivered a dirk, which she had held in reserve. It is said that she had met Lace a few minutes before, and demanded whether he intended to marry her, and received a negative answer. Such an act as this argues great depravity, or some grievous wrong which the laws do not redress. The dirk was purchased by the perpetrator of this awful deed, yesterday, at one of our hardware stores. It is, more properly speaking, a dirk-knife. She went to the store in the morning and examined the article, and returned in the afternoon to complete the purchase, thus showing a fixed determination. The pistol is double-barreled, and apparently new, and the second barrel contains a full charge."

European News.

The following summary embraces the principal items of European news which have been received since our last.

Destructive freshets have occurred in the northern parts of Scotland.

Rev. Patrick Torrey, D. D., the oldest Bishop of the Episcopal Church in Scotland, died at Peterhead, Sunday, 3d inst., aged 90. Earl Somers is also dead, at the age of 65.

The exports of gold from Sydney and Melbourne since the discovery of it, are estimated to have reached £4,000,000. Gold has been discovered about the Cape of Good Hope.

Madame Jenny Lind Goldschmidt has purchased a house in Dresden, and will reside, in future, in that city. She does not intend to sing publicly during the ensuing winter, but is reported to have said, that her next public appearance will be in England.

Destructive floods had happened in Piedmont. A diligence, containing passengers, floated down the River of the Levant, and had to be anchored for four hours to a tree.

The return of the French President to Paris was fixed for the 17th inst., when it was proposed to give him a grand reception that shall outvie the recent demonstration at Strasburg.

There is a story going round—but it seems apocryphal—that among the papers of a young man who recently committed suicide, was found a letter in his hand-writing, stating that he belonged to a secret society having for its object to assassinate Louis Napoleon—that the lot had fallen upon him, and his courage being too weak to kill the President, he had compromised the matter by killing himself.

A fearful disaster took place recently, on the occasion of a high Jewish festival, at Kolmed, in Galicia. Some thousand Jews were assembled in the Synagogue, when a cry of fire was raised in the women's gallery. In the rush that followed to the narrow staircase, many were thrown down, and thirty-six ladies, several of whom were of high rank, were crushed to death. The fire was the work of a gang of thieves, who availed themselves of the confusion to snatch the pearl and diamond ornaments worn by many of the ladies.

Letters from Tauris, of August 28, bring the news of an attempt to assassinate the Shah of Persia. While he was hunting, four men approached him under pretense of presenting a petition, which he refused to accept. Two of the men then seized his horse by the bridle, while the other two discharged two double-barreled pistols at the Shah, who received three shots in the thigh and in the mouth. He was able, however, to keep his assailants at bay until his suite came up, by whom two of the assassins were literally cut to pieces, while the other two were taken alive. They stated that they had no accomplices, but they belonged to the order of Babis, and had sworn to avenge their chief, who perished some time since. At last accounts the Shah was expected to recover, and two of the bullets had been extracted.

Cholera is making terrible ravages in Persia.

Madame Sontag in Philadelphia.—The following extract from a notice, by one of the Philadelphia papers, of Madame Sontag's fourth concert in that city, shows that she is gaining an enviable popularity there:—

"Madame Sontag's fourth concert took place last evening, and was as brilliant, and as numerously attended, as any that preceded it. It seems almost superfluous to speak further in praise of these charming entertainments; but where commendation is so richly merited, it is awarded spontaneously, even at the risk of repetition. Madame S. was in excellent voice, and, of course, acquitted herself of her portion of the performances to perfection. At each successive concert she regales us with novelties from the rich stores of melody at her command, which seem, indeed, to be inexhaustible. She does not confine herself so strictly to the modern Italian school as the majority of the singers who visit us. She does not disdain either English, Scotch, or German music, in each of which her versatile powers render her equally at home and effective."

Arrest and Rescue of Fugitive Slaves.—At Sandusky, Ohio, Oct. 20th, great excitement was occasioned by the arrest and subsequent rescue of some fugitive slaves. It appears that, during the morning, a number of fugitives from Kentucky arrived in that city, en route for Canada. Immediately on their arrival they were escorted by their friends to the steamer Arrow, but just as the boat was about to leave, the fugitives were arrested by some slave-catchers, who attempted to take them ashore, in which they were defeated by the combined efforts of a number of persons of both colors, after a sharp struggle. The slave-catchers then left the boat, and the fugitives went on their way to Canada. The Kentuckians were much chagrined, but console themselves with the reflection that the citizens are responsible.

John P. Hale in New York.—The Board of Aldermen of the city of New [illegible] have tendered the use of the Governor's Room to Hon. John P. Hale, who is expected soon to visit the city. There was considerable opposition to the measure, on the part of some would-be-considered friends of "union and safety."

On Tuesday night, Oct. 19, the dwelling of Mr. Taylor, at Alton, N. H., was destroyed by fire. Mrs. T. and her three children perished in the flames. Mr. Taylor was absent.

SUMMARY.

Died, at Northfield, Vermont, October 18th, Elder Nathaniel King, aged 85 years and 6 months—for nearly half a century an acceptable and useful preacher of the gospel, of the Baptist denomination. He was for twenty out of thirty years, a member of the General Assembly of Vermont, and made himself, many years ago, a life member of the American and Vermont Bible Societies, and of the latter, constituted some twenty or more of his children and grand children members for life by the payment of twenty dollars for each into the treasury, for the gratuitous circulation of the Scriptures. He was a man of wealth, and used it as one who must give an account of his stewardship.

An extra from the Journal office, Watertown, N. Y., dated Saturday, Oct. 16, states that a fire broke out about 3 o'clock that morning, which consumed the buildings extending on Washington from the Arcade to Stone-st. The buildings consumed were occupied as office of the Watertown Bank and Loan Co., the express office, several law offices, two boot and shoe stores, and grocery store. The Arcade and Paddock's block were in much danger. The buildings burned were owned by the Hungerford estate, John Clarke, J. C. Dann, and Geo. C. Sherman. Total loss $20,000.

The New London Chronicle says the cars of the New London, Worcester and Palmer Railroad came down to the joint depot on Monday, thus connecting with the New Haven and New London Road. There is now, therefore, uninterrupted railroad communication from New York to Norwich, and as soon as the very short track is laid down in the latter city—a quarter of a mile being all that is wanted to complete the connection of the two Southren roads with the Norwich and Worcester—the line will be continuous from New York to Boston.

Different journals have assigned a different value to Jenny Lind's donation for the establishment of free schools for girls in Sweden. The Paris correspondent of the Boston Atlas says it was $200,000, or 400,000 rix dollars banco in all; that $60,000 of it was sent while Jenny was in this country, and that $140,000 have now been sent from Hamburg in the form of a bill of exchange on London, drawn in favor of M. Themauaer, Arch-Priest, and Dr. Wieselgreen, Pastor of the Cathedral of Stockholm.

Judge Grier, in the U. S. Circuit Court, Philadelphia, Wednesday, Oct. 20, 1852, charged the Jury in favor of the heirs of Stephen Girard, who claim eleven tracts of land in Schuylkill County, valued at $1,100,000, on the ground that when Girard's will was made he did not own the entire title to the lands, therefore the will was inoperative. The Jury rendered a verdict in favor of the heirs. The case will probably go to the Supreme Court.

A monstrous elk was killed a few days since near Port Orford, which weighed as follows: carcass, 674 pounds; tallow, 95 pounds; hide, 61 pounds. His horns were five feet and seven inches in length, and there were six antlers on each horn, the longest of which measured one foot and eleven inches, and the shortest, one foot and two inches. The meat was sold at the Port Orford market for 25 cents per pound.

The Erie Railroad Company have recently set an example, in the management of their affairs, which is worthy of praise and of imitation by all other similar corporations. They forbid entirely the sale of intoxicating drinks in any of the refreshment-houses along the road, or on any of the grounds of the company, and absolutely refuse employment to any person who makes use of such drinks.

The Tribune publishes a list of the principal crimes against life that have come to light in New York within the last four weeks. The following is a summary of the frightful record: Murders, 4; supposed murders, 2; attempts to kill, 6; stabbing, 9; shooting, 3; savage assaults, 20; making a total of 44, not to speak of a host of minor offenses, the record of which would fill columns.

The Directors of the Association for the Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations, having invited his Excellency, Gov. Hunt, to assist at the ceremony of erecting the first column of the building being constructed on Reservoir-square, the Governor has consented to be present "if practicable;" and says, "You may except me unless official duty should compel me to remain at the capitol."

The Albany Northern Railroad extends from the City of Albany to Eagle Bridge, Rensselaer Co., N. Y., a distance of 32 miles, the whole of which is in a forward state of construction. The section between Albany and Cohoes, 11 miles, is nearly finished. The rails are being laid, and it will be completed in about 30 days. The remainder will be completed in April next.

A writer says that the widow of the great Mormon leader, Joe Smith, is married to a tavern-keeper, who keeps his rum-mill in Smith's old residence, in Nauvoo; that one half of the houses built by the Mormons are torn down, and the other half are tenantless; and that out of former 20,000, there are now only about 200 Mormon population left. About 400 French Socialists own a great part of the city, including the ruins of the temple.

We have accounts from Prince Edward's Island of a tremendous gale there on the 15th inst. A great number of vessels were wrecked, and twelve sunk at anchor, with all hands on board. The gale was also very severe at Sydney, N. S., and a number of vessels were driven ashore. Numerous vessels were also driven into Sandy Cove, and several went ashore.

The old United States Bank of 1791 is now paying out its very last dividend of 70 cents on a share. The last previous dividend was in 1834, some eighteen years ago, when about 2 per cent. was paid. The whole amount paid to stockholders since the expiration of its charter, is about $109 per share.

The Boston Traveler says: "Among the clearances yesterday, we notice the ship George Raynes, Capt. Penhallow, for California, with 900 tuns of ice, besides other merchandise. This is said to be the largest cargo of ice ever shipped to the Pacific or the East Indies, and is for the supply of ice-houses in San Francisco and Sacramento.

The many friends of Rev. Albert Barnes will be gratified to learn that his eye-sight is improving. A recent letter, written in his own hand, has been received from Bavaria, whither he had gone to consult an eminent German oculist.

John C. Klinck, the oldest cartman in the city, being at present in his eightieth year, renewed his license on Wednesday at the Mayor's office as public cartman. Mr. Klinck received his first license from De Witt Clinton in 1803, when that distinguished man was Mayor of New York. He was employed to cart the wood from the Old Fort at the Bowling Green, when it was demolished, and the lumber was distributed among the poor. Up to the present time he has enjoyed excellent health, and is still able to attend to his business, although he occasionally complains a little of the infirmities of age.

Henry, a slave, was convicted at Charlestown, Va., on Tuesday, of attempting to kill Mr. Harrison Anderson. The Free Press says: A majority of the Court thought that he ought to suffer the extreme penalty of the law, but as this required a unanimous agreement, he was sentenced to receive five hundred lashes, not more than thirty-nine at any one time. The physicians of the jail was instructed to see that they should not be administered too frequently, and only when in his opinion he could bear them.

It is stated in Boston, that the owners of the vessels sent out from there to gather cargoes of Guano at the Lobos Islands, have sent out orders to their commanders not to attempt to take it, but to seek freight elsewhere, looking to the United States Government for redress for the losses incurred thereby.

Havana advices of Oct. 18, report that the passengers by the bark Millaudon, from New Orleans to Havana, had been arrested and confined for having copies of the New Orleans Picayune in their pockets. MARRIED,

In Hayfield, Pa., August 15th, by Eld. A. A. F. Randolph, Mr. Orris Carr to Miss Harriet Curtis.

By the same, Sept. 21st, Mr. Arnold F. Stelle to Miss Garafielia F. Randolph.

On the 16th inst., at Marlborough, N. J., by Eld. D. Clawson, Mr. Ephraim R. Maul, of Bridgeton, to Miss Selotha A. Davis, of Beebe Run.

DIED,

In Leonardsville, Madison Co., N. Y., on the 18th inst., Mrs. Eunice West, widow of the late Benjamin West, in the 84th year of her age. The subject of this notice was a native of Cumberland Co., N. J., where, in early life, she became a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Shiloh. For over twenty years past her residence has been in Leonardsville, where she became a member of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield, and remained a member thereof until death. Sister West has been a devout and exemplary Christian. At all times, and on all occasions, she seems to have been intent upon doing what she deemed the will of her Divine Master. For many years she has suffered much from an asthmatic affection, which finally brought her to the close of her pilgrimage. Her confidence in Christ as her covenant Redeemer was steadfast, and her patience in suffering, and submission to the Divine will, have given us pleasing assurance that she died the death of the righteous, and that her last end is like his.

In Berlin, Marquette Co., Wis., August 29th, 1851, Nancy M. Hubbell, youngest daughter of Deacon Charles and Nancy Hubbell, aged 27 days. September 2, 1852, Lewis P., only son of the same parents, aged four years and nine months; after four days of extreme suffering, his young spirit took its flight to dwell forever in the presence of Him who said, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

In Hopkinton, R. I., of paralysis, August 20th, Albert C. Green, aged 30 years. Bro. Green was a worthy member of the Pawcatuck Seventh-day Baptist Church. He bore a lingering illness with true Christian patience, and now rests in hope of awaking in Christ's likeness.

"Not enough of earth for sinning;
Always gentle, always winning;
Never needing our reproving;
Ever lively, ever loving;
Starry eyes, and sunset tresses;
Lips that knew no word of doubting,
Often kissing, never pouting;
Beauty even in completeness,
Over-full of childish sweetness;
That's the way our little baby,
Far too pure for earth, it may be,
Seemed to us, who, while about her,
Deemed we could not do without her."

American Grape Culture.

Correspondence of the N. Y. Tribune.

CINCINNATI, Thursday, Sept. 30, 1852.

The vintage of the present season is now nearly completed, and, according to promise, I will furnish you with a brief statement of its results, together with a description of the process of manufacturing wine in this vicinity. Your readers are doubtless aware that nearly thirteen hundred acres of vineyard are at present under cultivation in the immediate vicinity of Cincinnati, and that the cultivation of the grape for making wine is now a very important branch of horticulture in the valley of the Ohio, which river is already distinguished as the "Rhine of America."

During the past fortnight I have spent considerable time among the "vine-clad hills" about Cincinnati, and have had the pleasure of witnessing the interesting process of wine manufacture. It was to me a pleasing sight to see the busy groups of women and children engaged in gathering the luscious, tempting clusters of the grape, which had, during the brief summer, wooed and imprisoned the bright sunshine in its transparent bosom, to be set free again in years to come, when the sparkling champagne is uncorked to illuminate the festive board.

The Catawba is now the principal and almost the only grape cultivated by the vine-growers of Cincinnati. It is found to be the most hardy, and possesses a flavor which gives it the preference over all other varieties. The Catawba is a native of North Carolina.

Frost and the rot have destroyed fully one-third of the crop this year, but, notwithstanding this, it is estimated that the yield will reach at least 400,000 bottles of first-rate wine. Of course, in addition to this, a large amount of inferior wine will be put up.

The grapes are gathered as soon as they are "dead ripe," and all decayed and unripe berries are carefully removed. This is very important, and the wine-grower who is anxious to gain a reputation for his wine, is obliged to give as much attention to cleanliness as a Yankee housewife bestows upon making butter. Some go so far as to stem the grapes before placing them in the press.

After the grapes are gathered and assorted, they are bruised in a mashing tub (a vessel similar to our inverted churn) for the purpose of breaking the skin and pulp, but not the seeds. Then, if the stems are to be separated, the mass is placed upon a wire screen and shaken, when the pulp and skins fall through into a receiving tub. The fruit is now ready for the press.

The wine-press resembles, somewhat, the Yankee cider-press, and is very simple in its construction. An iron screw in a strong upright frame, a box-platform of stout plank wedged into heavy timbers, and within this a box made of boards, five or six feet square, and perforated with holes near the lower edge, is placed to contain the mashed grapes. Boards to fit loosely inside this box, to receive the pressure and follow the mashed grapes, (or "cheese," as cider-makers would call it,) complete the apparatus. The box is so constructed as to be easily taken to pieces, and when the cheese is pressed, the outsides are cut off, placed on top, and pressed again. The power is applied by a strong lever, and the juice, (or "must," as it is called,) runs out through a spout into a large receiving tub in front of the platform. The "pummies," when pressed dry, is thrown away, or distilled to make brandy.

The important process of fermentation is the next to receive attention. The juice is empted into clean, sweet casks, which are filled within five or six inches of the bung, and the bung placed on loosely. The gas escapes in the course of two or three weeks, when the casks are filled up, and the bungs tightened. After four or five months the wine is drawn (or "racked") off into clean casks, after which a second slight fermentation takes place. It is then placed in the wine cellar, and remains one or two, sometimes four years, before bottling for use, during which time it continues to improve in flavor and quality. No brandy or sugar is used in the manufacture of the Catawba wine.

The "sparkling Catawba," or champagne, is now made here in great quantities from the same grape. The juice which runs from the mashed grapes, before pressure, is reserved, fermented, and ripened with great care, and sweetened with the purest rock candy. It ripens ready for market in about eighteen months. Mr. Nicholas Longworth produced accidentally the first champagne from the Catawba grape in 1842, and immediately erected a building and sent to France for a manufacturer of this species of wine. This year a hundred thousand bottles will be added to his stock. The sparkling Catawba possesses a delicious flavor, and is regarded by many as superior to the most celebrated imported champagne.

A variety of wines are made from the same grape by keeping separate the "must" extracted by the different pressings, and a rich claret-colored wine is produced by fermenting in the skins, which is very palatable when mellowed by age. But the common practice is to put all the "must" together in the same cask, and thus the whole juice and flavor of the grape remains, imparting to the wine that fine grapy aroma which has established the reputation of the American Catawba.

The ground selected for a vineyard is usually a hillaside, with a southern aspect, though the vine does nearly as well on an eastern or western exposure. A dry calcareous loam, with a porous subsoil, is the soil best suited to the culture, Many small vineyards are owned by Germans in moderate circumstances, and afford profitable employment for their families. These sell their wine to the more wealthy dealers, who sell it again under their own label, if it proves of good quality.

Mr. Longworth's wine-cellars are the most capacious that have yet been erected, being 105 feet long, an average of 45 feet in width, and 18 in hight. The wine of each vintage is kept separate, in casks holding from 2,000 to 2,500 gallons each. Several new wine cellars will be built here during the next season.

Greatly as the manufacture of native wine has increased during the last few years, the supply scarcely keeps up with the increasing demand. All the still wine, more than five years old, is now out of market; and the "sparkling" is greedily taken off as soon as it is fit for market. The prejudice which at first existed against it on account of its nativity is fast disappearing, and many wine drinkers will use no other.

There are those, doubtless, who will not agree with the lamented Downing that "the temperance cause has every thing to gain and nothing to lose by the general production and consumption of the pure Catawba wine as a beverage"—or with Thomas Jefferson, who said that "no nation is drunken where wine is cheap; and none sober where the dearness of wine substitutes ardent spirits as the common beverage." But, in a commercial point of view, all must agree that the introduction of wine manufacture into the United States will prove of immense benefit to the country. When the French Jesuits planted a vineyard at Kaskaskia, on the Mississippi, shortly after the first settlement of the country, the French Government ordered it to be destroyed, for fear that vine culture might spread in America and hurt the wine-trade of France. Now that a single individual in Cincinnati has a hundred thousand dollars invested in the business, and American wine has attained a popularity beyond all calculation, the French wine merchant may well begin to fear for the welfare of his traffic.

Singular Case of Instinct in a Horse.

We do not remember ever to have heard of a more remarkable exhibition of equine intelligence than was communicated to us a few days since by Mr. Allen, of this place. The circumstances, as they were narrated to us, are as follows: Mr. A. has had for a considerable time a span of sprightly little horses that he has never separated. In the stable, in the field, in the harness, they have always been together. This has caused a strong attachment to grow up between them. A few days ago, he went with them out to Lake Minnetouka, on a fishing excursion. Taking them out of the carriage, he led them down to the lake, and tied them with stout ropes, several rods apart, on a strip of grass that grew upon the shore, and left them to feed. Returning to the shantee, he threw himself upon the floor to await the return of the party who had repaired to the lake to fish. Not much time had elapsed before the sound of an approaching horse's feet attracted his attention, and a moment after one of his span appeared at the door. The animal put his head in, and giving one neigh, returned at a slow gallop, yet under evident excitement, to the spot where, but a few moments before, he and his companion had been seemingly safely fastened. Surprised to find his horse loose, and struck with his singular conduct, Mr. A. immediately followed, and found the other lying in the water, entangled in the rope, and struggling to keep his head from being submerged. While Mr. A. proceeded to disengage the unfortunate horse, his noble benefactor stood by, manifesting the utmost solicitude and sympathy, and when his mate was extricated from his situation, and again upon his feet on terra firma, the generous creature exhibited the most unquestionable signs of satisfaction and joy. That this intelligent animal should have noticed the misfortune of his mate—that he should know where to apply for rescue, and in his efforts should sunder a three-fourths of an inch rope, and finally, that he should exhibit so high an appreciation of the event—are circumstances to astonish us, and commend themselves to the thoughtful consideration of those who would limit the power of reasoning to the "genus homo."

The Manufacture of Wood Gas.

A late number af the Allgemeino Zeitung gives some interesting details in regard to lighting the city of Munich with gas made from wood.

"The contract between the magistrates and the Coal Gas Company provides that a regular flame shall be rendered consuming 4½ cubic feet of gas in an hour, and giving light equal to seven wax candles, of four to the pound. The wood gas, with a flame of the above description, produced a light equivalent to that of eleven wax candles of the same size. Upon this, and in order to show that the coal gas was preferable to the wood gas, a flame of coal gas was shown to the commission which gave a light equivalent to twenty-four of the wax candles. Such a capacity for giving light, under the most favorable circumstances, is the same as of a good oil gas, but never that of coal gas of the usual quality. The coal gas which is generally used in England is equal to nine wax candles, with a flame consuming 4½ cubic feet in an hour. The coal gas used in Munich has been repeatedly examined, both by the commission and by other intelligent individuals, but its power has never been found to exceed that of ten wax candles. It would not be difficult, by using a very hard wood, or other processes, to obtain a wood gas equal to oil gas; but it would not be correct to take this as the general power of wood gas. Another advantage of the wood gas is its entire freedom from sulphur. Every city, even the smallest one—nay, every village—can avail itself of the benefit of an admirable mode of illumination at a small expense for the first fixtures. It is probable that, before many years, in such cities as Bremen and Hamburg, where the best English coal is easily obtained, coal gas will be entirely superseded by wood gas, inasmuch as all the collateral products of the manufacture are valuable, and command a sale in any quantity. The residuary coal is nearly equal in value to the wood; the tar is far superior to that of coal, and cannot be replaced by it for painting; and the vinegar always commands a high price. In point of national economy, the manufacture of wood gas has a special importance, as it partly takes the place of burning charcoal in pits, in which process the gas, the tar, and the vinegar are lost."

A Race of Red Men in Western Africa.

The Nouvelles Annales des Voyages for June contains a translation by Cherbonneau, Professor of Arabic at Constantine, of the journey of a traveler named Tuggurt via Timbuctoo to the Mountains of the Moon. These mountains, however, according to this account, do not lie in Middle, or rather Eastern Africa, as laid down in our geographies, but among the Western highlands, which fill the space between the middle course of the Niger and Atlantic Ocean. The route taken was from Timbuctoo to Dschenne, up the Niger, then for sometime upon the Niger, and finally by land to Bambara, Sakay, Maika and Sakat. Then follows the ensuing passage: "Beyond the circle of Sakat begins, so to speak, a new world; the people have a red color, of whom a part are herdsmen, possessing innumerable herds of camels and flocks of sheep; the rest are husbandmen. One travels some two months upon the territory, and then comes to a great salt lake, called Sebkat Schanaktha. This lake loses itself in the sands of a boundless desert, in which one finds no trace of vegetation. Across this desert, the passage of which occupies five weeks, dwell nations of a red color, living in tents made of buffalo skins, and subsisting on dates and camel's milk. Then comes a second waste, which can be crossed in fifteen days; after which occur the first oases, which belong to the Mountains of the Moon, and are inhabited by red men." Are these accounts actually based on facts? The journey, as described, is long enough to bring one to the Atlantic.

The Stereoscope.

This singular instrument, the application of which was discovered several years ago by Prof. Wheatstone, has been brought again into public notice by the daguerreotype artists of this city, some of whom are now making pictures to be used with it. The Stereoscope (a word derived from the Greek, signifying "solid view") is composed of two glasses, (one to each eye) fitted in tubes something like the eye-glasses of a lorgnette. At about five inches distance are placed two pictures, one before each glass. They are of miniature size, exactly alike, except that they are taken at slightly different angles. Looking through the lenses as you would look through an opera glass, and fixing an eye upon each picture, you find in a few seconds that the pictures move together, form a single one, and come out as it were from the plate, standing in bold relief, so as to present all the appearances of life, every limb and feature, every projection or depression of dress, every hair, seeming to stand exactly as they did upon the original. This optical delusion is quite startling, and it is for a long time difficult to realize that you are not looking upon a person instead of a picture. There is, however, one serious defect, and that is a peculiar ghastliness of the picture or representation. There is a waxwork appearance of the flesh, which is very unpleasant, and conveys to the beholder a constant idea of death. Could this be remedied, the stereoscope would be a valuable aid to the eye and the mind in giving correct ideas of portraits or pictures of any kind. Daguerreotypes of statuary viewed through this instrument are not subject to the ghastly appearance referred to, and as faithfully represent the creations of the sculptor as if the real statues were before the eye. Persian House-keeping.

The usual mode of living in one house seemed pretty nearly (says Household Words) the same in all that fell under the range of Mr. Burton's observation. They get up at sunrise, when they have a cup of coffee. The few hours in the day, in which the Persians condescend to labor in any way, are from sunrise until 8 o'clock in the morning. After that the heat becomes so intense (frequently 108 or 109 degrees in the shade) that all keep within doors, lying about on mats in passages or rooms. At 10 they have their first substantial meal, which consists of mutton and rice, stewed together in a rude saucepan, over a charcoal fire, built out of doors. Sometimes, in addition to this dish, they have a kind of soup, or "water-meat," (which is the literal translation of the Persian name,) made of water, mutton, onions, parsley, folws, rice, dried fruits, apricots, almonds, and walnuts, stewed together. But this, as we may guess from the multiplicity of the ingredients, was a dainty dish. At four o'clock, the panting Persians, nearly worn out by the heat of the day, take a cup of strongly perfumed tea, with a little bitter orange juice squeezed into it; and after this tonic they recover strength enough to smoke and lounge. Dinner was the grand meal of the day, to which they invited friends. It was not unlike breakfast, but was preceded by a dessert, at which wine was occasionally introduced, but which always consisted of melons and dried fruits. The dinner was brought in on a pewter tray; but Mr. Burton remarked that the pewter dishes were very dingy. A piece of common print was spread on the ground, and cakes of bread put on it. They had no spoons for the soup, "water-meat," but soaked their bread in it, or curled it round into a hollow shape, and fished up what they could out of the abyss. At the Mirza's they had spoons for the sour goat's milk, which seemed to be one of their delicacies. The ice is brought down from the mountains, and sold pretty cheaply in the bazaars. Sugar and salt are eaten together with this iced sour goat's milk. Smoking narghilahs beguiles the evening hours very pleasantly. They pluck a quantity of rose-blossoms, and put them into the water, through which the smoke passes; but the roses last in season only a month. Mirza Oosan Koola had a few chairs in the house, for the use of the gentlemen of the embassy.

A Mad Wolf.

Letters from Smyrna gives an account of a terrible disaster which occurred at Adalia some days before. A furious wolf suddenly appeared in the midst of a market-place, and bit several persons most severely, but, taking fright at the cries which arose on all sides, he jumped over a wall, and got into a large garden, where several hundred persons, who had come to town on account of the silk crop, were sleeping in the open air. Here he wounded 128 persons, but, being again frightened away by the cries of the people, he got into a sheepfold, where he killed 35 sheep and wounded 75. Unfortunately, the Governor had caused the whole population to be disarmed a few days before, so that the unfortunate people were without the means of defense; but on the following day arms were distributed and the wolf killed. According to the report of the physician of the place, the wounds inflicted by the animal are hideous; but the most horrible circumstance in this disaster is, that several of the wounded have already died of hydrophobia, so that the whole population is in the utmost consternation. MENTAL EXCITEMENT.—Bad news weakens the action of the heart, oppresses the lungs, destroys the appetite, stops digestion, and partially suspends all the functions of the system. An emotion of shame flushes the face; fear blanches it; joy illuminates it; and in an instant thrill electrifies a million of nerves. Surprise spurs the pulse into gallop. Delirium infuses great energy. Volition commands, and hundreds of muscles spring to execute. Powerful emotion often kills the body at a stroke; Chilo, Diagoras, and Sophocles, died of joy at the Grecian games. The news of a defeat killed Philip V. The door keeper of Congress expired upon hearing the surrender of Cornwallis. Eminent public speakers have often died in the midst of an impassioned burst of eloquence, or when the deep emotion that produced it suddenly subsided. Largrave, the young Parisian, died when he heard that the musical prize for which he had competed was adjusted to another.

THE WRECK OF THE ATLANTIC.—Speaking of the wreck of the Atlantic, the Oswego Journal says that Mr. Green is now constructing, in Buffalo, a new sub-marine armor, which will enable him, if necessary, to remain under water two hours at the depth of the wreck, 162½ feet, which will avoid the repetition of frequent ascents. The same paper adds the following interesting facts:—

"Mons. Maillefert has made some curious experiments to ascertain the pressure of the water at the depth of 160 feet. An empty junk bottle, corked and sealed air-tight, sunk beneath the surface at the above depth for seven minutes, takes in, by some phenomena unexplained, a large quantity of water.

"A piece of iron attached to a scale by a piece of wire, weighing 18 lbs., sunk at the same depth, loses 3 lbs. and 1 oz. One may judge from this the pressure sustained by a human being at the same depth. Mr. G. is sanguine that he can attach fastenings to the wreck by which it can be raised. The diving of 162½ feet below the surface is the greatest performance on record by 36 feet."

CALIFORNIA AS IT IS.—Under this heading Jesse Hutchinson writes to the N. Y. Tribune as follows:—

"The more I see of glorious California the more am I delighted with the land; yet the more do I see the need of incessant labor in her behalf, and of cautioning friends at home not to rush foolishly and unbidden into this wilderness of novelty, excitement and trial. It may be most truly said of California, that 'tis the best and the worst country to emigrate to on the face of the earth. Sometimes my heart aches in keenest sorrow and pity at the tales of suffering I hear and the personal sufferers I often meet. While at Hangtown last week, (where I spent three days,) scarcely an hour passed but some dozen and scores of men, women, and children, in ox-wagons and overland teams, came into town, almost every one of whom had more or less of sorrow and suffering to reveal. The accounts all aggree that there has been immense suffering on the Plains this year, and death has made mournful havoc among the emigrants all along the weary way. In one train some twenty children were bereft of their fathers and mothers by cholera. I met a young man from St. Louis, who told me he saw ten persons buried in one grave; and within the space of 20 miles he had counted between 50 and 60 new graves."

TO STOP THE "RAPPINGS."—They seem to have discovered a means to put a stop to 'rappings' in Boston, judging from the following, which we cut from the Traveler:—

A day or two since, quite an excitement was caused in one of our Grammar Schools by the spirits, who at the present time are rapping in this part of the world. One of the pupils, a miss about 12 years old, suddenly left her studies and began to write on various subjects, when she should have been engaged with her book. Mysterious noises were also heard, which were traced to her, and she was at last called to account for her strange conduct. She assigned as a reason that she was a medium of the spirits, and that she was impelled to write, and could not prevent the rappings. The master immediately informed her that he should find it necessary to try another system of rappings, if the spirits were allowed to perform their raps in school, and as for impulsion he was also impelled not to write, but to expel her from school, if she persisted in writing when she should study. The remedy was complete, and the spirits have not troubled the school since.

THE OLD TRAP.—Rev. Henry Ward Beecher makes the following shrewd reply to those disinterested people who ask temperance men why they don't enforce the old laws against rum selling, instead of fraiming new ones like that of Maine:—

"It is said, Why don't you execute the present laws? This puts me in mind of an old rat, who, sleek and fat, comes out of his hole and sees a new trap. He walks around it, peeps into it, nibbles at it, and finds that it is not like the old one—it is all wire, and there is no getting out of it. So he goes to the keeper of the house and says: 'Why are you not satisfied with the old trap with wood bottom, through which I have crawled forty times?' So with these old liquor rats, they know how to evade them, they can crawl through almost any thing, but they don't like the Maine law. These men can tell what the law means. The outcry that they now make, leads me to think that they smell fire. I never was so much in favor of the law as when I found out that the rumsellers opposed it.

JAPANESE GARDENING.—The gardeners of Japan display the most astonishing art. The plum tree, which is a great favorite, is so trained and cultivated that the blossoms are as big as those of dahlias. Their great triumph, however, is to bring forth plants and trees into the compass of the little gardens attached to the houses in the cities. With this view they have gradually succeeded in dwarfing the fig, plum, and cherry trees and the vine to a stature so diminutive as scracely to be credited by a European, and yet those dwarf trees are covered with blossoms and leaves. Maylon, whose work on Japan was published at Amsterdam in 1830, states that the Dutch agent of Commerce in Naganei was offered a snuff box one inch in thickness and three high, in which grew a fig tree, a bamboo and a plum tree in bloom. Some of the gardens resemble pictures in which nature is skillfully modelled in miniature—but it is living, natural.

THE NEW YORK PRESS.—There are in New York 20 daily papers, with a circulation of above 200,000, and the yearly value of which must exceed half a million of dollars. In Boston, in 1845, there were 15 daily papers, with a circulation of 53,172, and yearly value of $256,776. There were 350 papers in the United States in 1850, having a circulation of 750,000, so that New York furnishes one-third of all the daily papers circulated within the Union. In a year, the circulation of the daily papers in New York numbers, exclusive of extras, and all editions after the first, about 60,000,000 copies; while for the empire of Great Britain the number of stamps issued for newspapers of all kinds, in 1849, was but 72,447,707. The total circulation of papers of all sorts, published in London, in 1850, was 21,269,840, only about one-third the circulation of the daily papers of New York. [Hunt's Merchant's Magazine.

THE POLICE SYSTEM OF LONDON.—The London Police consists of 2 Commissioners, 1 Chief Superintendent, 18 Superintendents, 124 Inspectors, 585 Sergeants, and 4,797 Constables—making in all 5,525 persons. Of these about 3,700 are on duty all night, and 1,800 in the day time. The patrolling of the beats is so regularly done that, unless something unusual has occurred, the Sergeant always knows just where to find his men. The Police District covers 218 parishes, being 90 miles in circumference, and having an area of 700 square miles, or more than thirty times the surface of the County of New York, and embracing five times the population. Within a circle of six miles from St. Paul's—a space considerably larger than Manhattan Island—the beats are traversed in periods varying from seven to twenty-five minutes; and there are large districts which are never free from inspection. The entire Police District is formed into 18 divisions, with 121 stations. An Inspector and a reserve force are present at every station. The system of transmitting orders (by telegraph and otherwise) is so arranged that the entire force of 5,500 men may be brought into one place in less than two hours. Concentration of force is now so easy and certain that, since the establishment of the Metropolitan Police, the military power has never been required to preserve order. The entire cost of this extensive establishment in 1850 was $1,900,000; the cost of the New York Police in 1851 was $534,000, for less than 1,000 men—or 50 per cent. more than that of London.

ROTHSCHILD AND JERUSALEM.—A correspondent of the National Era relates the following anecdote: "The rumor is that the Sultan has ceded Syria to M. Rothschild for 500,000,000 francs, say one hundred millions of dollars, and that this prince of millionaires proposes to invite the Jews to return to the land of their fathers, rebuild the temple, &c. I do not believe it. About fifteen or twenty years ago, an estimable clergyman in Ohio, who had after long study and meditation persuaded himself that the description of the latter-day glory by the prophet Ezekiel was to be literally fulfilled by the Jews in Syria, went to London with a view to persuade Rothschild to purchase that country, which, he had been informed, could, in the state of the Sultan's exchequer at that time, be done at less than ten millions of dollars. It was several days after his arrival before he obtained an interview with him. 'And when, after so much pains-taking, he at length stood face to face with the rich Jew, and announced his errand, the baron said to him, 'Damn Jerusalem!' The poor man, grieved and shocked, quitted London, returned to his native land, pined away, and died. I received from his own lips an account of the interview."

"UNCLE TOM'S CABIN."—The Edinburgh News says that anything in such universal demand has never before been known in the history of literature. Many booksellers aver that they are selling nothing else, the trade for the time having seemingly centered in this one book, which, unlike almost all others, presents equal attractions to both old and young. Of the work probably not less than twenty different editions, ranging in price from 6d. to 7s. 6d., are floating over the country, and others are advertised as in preparation. The total sale of these different issues must be something enormous and unparalleled, even in times when we are accustomed to hear of some periodicals circulating to the extent of 120,000 copies. One edition before us is stated to be at its 112th thousand. Of the total extent of the circulation in this country we can form no idea—it may amount to half a million or a whole million of copies; but a single fact will suffice to show, that it must be something altogether unknown, even to our most popular novelists. One bookseller in Glasgow assures us that his sales of the book in different forms will in a few days amount to 20,000 copies; and we learn from two of the largest agents in Edinburgh, that their joint sales have already reached more than 12,000. Here is a cheering fact for the philanthropist.

CURE FOR SCALDS AND BURNS.—Reese's Medical Gazette gives a cure for scalds and burns, the knowledge of which, for humanity's sake, should be as widely known to the people as it is to the medical profession. It says: "In any case of burn or scald, however extensive, all the acute sufferings of the patient may be at once and permanently relieved, and that in a moment of time, by sprinkling over the injured surface a thick layer of wheat flour, by the hand, or, what is better, by a dredging-box. Every vestige of pain produced by such injuries is instantly removed, and the sufferer not only escapes the shock to the nervous system accompanying such torture, but will generally fall into a quiet sleep the moment the atmospheric temperature is thus excluded from the wounds. Multitudes are annually perishing by scalds in steamboats, and from burns by camphene, spirit-gas, and otherwise, nearly all of whom might be saved from a fatal result if this simple practice were adopted immediately after such accidents. We hope that every individual will remember this remedy, and adopt it when occasion requires."

Macaulay gives the following as the medical treatment of Charles the Second, during his last sickness. All the medical men of note were summoned, and one of the prescriptions was signed by fourteen doctors. "He was bled largely, a hot iron was applied to the head, and a volatile salt extracted from human skulls was forced into his mouth." He survived this treatment four days.

The Duke of Wellington once left his umbrella, by accident, on the stall of a lady of rank at a Fair. On returning to look for it, he was told that the umbrella had just been sold for twenty-five guineas, by the lady, who could not resist the temptation of disposing of so valuable a relic for charitable purposes.

The telegraphic wires were struck near Galena, last week, by atmospheric lightning, and melted for about three hundred yards, and more or less injured half a mile. A spectator who saw the scene, describes the electrical exhibition as a chain of fire stretched both ways as far as he could see across the landscape.

There is a little boy in England, only twelve years old, whose income, or allowance, is $200,000 a year. He is the Queen's eldest son, the Prince of Wales.

An Irishman being asked why he left his country for America, replied: "It wasn't for want, for I had plenty of that at home."

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

ULTRAISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

Within the last fifty years, there has been a great increase of reforms and reformers, of every class and description. And while from the great smelting furnaces which they have established, there has come forth much of truth, beauty, and goodness, there has been thrown off a great amount of cinders, and gas, and steam, in the form of rash innovations, noisy fanaticisms, and all manner of ultraisms.

Those who have adopted these ultraisms, have been noted for their negative tendencies and methods of action. Some of them would have us believe that there are no laws, no governments, no domestic or social institutions, binding upon us. They tell us that there are no ministers of Christ, in the usual acceptation of the term, and that there is no Sabbath worth regarding. They deny our firmest beliefs, demolish our most cherished institutions, and destroy everything that we have been accustomed to consider as beautiful and good; but do not in return present us with anything new on which to rest our hopes, no new institutions around which our sympathies can cluster, no new forms of the beautiful and good to enchant us. Theirs is a system of negations, and doubts, and threatenings. They are ever warning us of the dangers of Sylla and Charybdis; but do not inform us of safe and quiet seas, and pleasant lands beyond.

Their breath is the breath of the Sirocco, upon everything that is lovely and good. In their furious charge, they leave nothing but smouldering ruins, blackened and burned by the fires of strife—from which, indeed, they may, now and then, attempt to re-construct; but the unshapely masses soon fall of their own weight. They are continually finding fault with the whole world, its actors, and their methods of acting—carping at every thing around them; neither are they at peace among themselves—for seldom can they agree upon their own distinguishing characteristics; and if they attempt to construct a platform of fundamental principles, they are sure, before proceeding far, to seize each man his favorite plank, and to rush off in tanget lines, like fiery comets let loose from the restraint of gravitation.

But how is it with the Christian Religion? How was it with Christ and his Apostles? How has it been with all true Christian reformers since their time, in respect to the principles laid down, the spirit manifested, and the course pursued?

The great expository sermon of Christ on the Mount, commences with blessings. The poor in spirit, the mourner, the meek, those hungering and thirsting after righteousness, the merciful, the pure in heart, the peace-maker, and the persecuted—all have blessings pronounced upon them—rewards, consolations, positive good, promised them. Does the Christian religion require man to give up self as the supreme object of his regard and care? It presents the infinite God, and all created intelligences, as more worthy of his love. Does it ask him to leave friends and home, and follow Christ? In return, it promises him an inheritance eternal in the heavens. Does it ask him to forsake his sins and the pleasures of the world? In return, it offers him a sanctified spirit, and the everlasting favor of God. It asks him to surrender nothing but that for which it proposes to make ample, yes, infinite returns.

Christ went about doing good, healing, strengthening, persuading, building up, establishing righteousness, and laying the foundations of a kingdom not of this world. It is true, that he did, now and then, with a scourge of cords, drive out buyers and sellers, sheep and oxen; but it was only that he might have a place to stand and cry more effectually, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." James and John were, at one time, so far imbued with the spirit of modern ultraism, that they desired to command fire to come down from heaven and consume those who had offended; but Christ told them, that they knew not what manner of spirit they were of, for he came not to destroy, but to save. When Paul was at Athens, and beheld many altars smoking to false gods, he not only rebuked the people for their idolatry, but also proclaimed to them the Unknown God, whom they ignorantly worshiped. He not only endeavored to persuade [illegible] to renounce the faith they cherished, but also to establish them in a new and a better one.

Thus has it ever been with all wise and efficient master builders in the kingdom of Christ. They have ever had a positive good to present, principles to inculcate, practices to introduce. These have had merits which challenged the candid consideration of man. The Christian reformer has never asked man to give up his old principles and practices, save on the conviction that he had something better offered him. The heralds of the cross have ever gone forth with the implements of building, rather than of tearing down. True, they have been aggressive; true, they have torn down—they have removed the rubbish; but only as they were prepared to lay the foundations of the New Jerusalem. They have made encroachments upon the kingdom of darkness, leveling to the ground many of its strongest towers; but only as they were prepared to usher in the kingdom of light, and to build the citadels of Zion. The work of demolition is only incidental to their true work.

Ultraism is negative and destructive; Christianity is affirmative and constructive. While the former is condemning and cursing, the latter is forgiving and blessing. While the one is running wild with the imagination, the other is storing the intellect with truth, and filling the heart with love. Ultraism is ever striving to tear down the house from over the man's head, leaving him with his wife and defenseless children subject to the peltings of the merciless storm. Religion is ever striving to shelter him—to provide him with a habitation that shall withstand the tempests of wrath. Religion entices man towards the right by kind deeds and persuasive words; Ultraism stands upon its assumed boundary between right an wrong, with its knotty, gory bludgeon upraised, for the purpose of beating to the ground whoever shall have the temerity to pass its assigned limits. The one is the good Samaritan, binding up the wounds of the spirit, and pouring on oil and wine; the other tears open the healing wounds, and lacerates afresh. One weeps over the sins and miseries of the world, its countenance radiant with love and compassion; the eyes of the other flash fire, and its heart overflows with wormwood and gall. Christianity is like the kind parent enticing his children away from the paths of sin and death, by attracting them towards the beautiful and good; Ultraism is like the task-master—or, to make an allusion to a modern classic, like Legree, the tyrant among the lowly, contending that his bony, knotty, gnarled fists, were made for the express purpose of beating down and bruising his defenseless victims—with no oil, no balm, nothing but pepper, and salt, and alcohol, to pour upon their wounds.

Christianity, with its glorious characteristics, has long been entreating the acceptance of man. Ultraism, with its gloomy characteristics, in now thrusting itself upon our attention.

Man is wandering amid doubt and darkness. The waves of eternity are ever washing the sands of time from under his feet. He wants something real, something positive, something to which he can cling with the assurance of support and safety. He needs the Sabbath, with is sacred stillness, its church-going bells, its prayers and songs and sermons, to direct his soul heavenward. He needs governments and laws, to restrain him. He needs home scenes and sympathies to give sweetness of spirit. He needs something to call out and cultivate his higher faculties and affections. He needs lights and guides to direct him kindly towards the heavenly hills.

Such being the wants of man, judge ye, whether negative, destructive, misanthropic ULTRAISM, or affirmative, constructive, philanthropic CHRISTIANITY, is the better adapted to meet his necessities. MACOM.

LOOKING BACK.

When Lot and his wife were running from cursed Sodom to the mountains, to save their lives, it is said, that his wife looked back from behind him, and she became a pillar of salt. And yet you see that neither her practice, nor the judgment of God that fell upon her for the same, would cause Lot to look behind him. I have sometimes wondered at Lot in this particular. His wife looked behind her, and died immediately; but let what would become of her, Lot would not so much as look behind him to see her. We do not read that he did so much as once look where she was, or what was become of her. His heart was indeed upon his journey, and well it might be. There was a mountain before him, and the fire and brimstone behind him! His life lay at stake, and he had lost it, if he had but looked behind him. Do thou so run; and in thy race remember Lot's wife, and remember her doom; and remember for what that doom did overtake her; and remember that God made her for an example for all lazy runners, to the end of the world; and take heed thou fall not after the same example! [Bunyan.

NO GOOD OF COMPLAINING.

The venerable editor of the Christian Advocate and Journal, in reply to the communication of a young brother, complaining of the low state of religion, dull meetings, &c., tells him, "as the result of more than half a century's experience, that no good will come of complaining." We can add the testimony of our own experience, though not quite so long, to the same fact. We have seen meetings spoiled and the people driven away by it, and the complainer's own temper injured, but never did we see any good come from it. If any one feels dissatisfied with the low state of religion, let him first deal with his own heart, and seek a revival of religion there; and when that takes place, he will soon communicate his own new spirit to those around him, and the deadness will change to life, and sloth to activity; but the evil spirit of sloth and stupidity can never be exorcised by scolding. [Obs.

LOVE.

Oh! if there is one law above the rest,
Written in Wisdom—if there is a word
That I would trace as with a pen of fire
Upon the unsullied temper of a child—
If there is any thing that keeps the mind
Open to angel visits, and repels
The ministry of ill—'tis Human Love!
God has made nothing worthy of contempt.
The smallest pebble in the well of Truth
Has its peculiar meanings, and will stand
When man's best monuments wear fast away.
The law of Heaven is Love—and though its name
Has been usurped by passion, and profaned
To its unholy uses through all time,
Still, the eternal principle is pure;
And in those deep affections that we feel
Omnipotent within us, can we see.
The lavish measure in which love is given.
And in the yearning tenderness of a child
For every bird that sings above its head,
And every creature feeding on the hills,
And every tree and flower, and running brook,
We see how every thing was made to love,
And how they err, who, in a world like this,
Find any thing to hate but human pride.

REVISION OF THE SCRIPTURES.

Address of Eld. Wm. B. Maxson, at the recent Meeting of the American Bible Union.

I am a member of a small family in Zion, and we are a Bible reading and a Bible loving fraternity. We love the Bible for various reasons. It has elevated us, as a people, above the heathen nations of the earth, and to it are we indebted for all the hopes we entertain concerning a glorious and endless future.

The Bible is God's chosen means of communicating to a sinning world the knowledge of himself, his holy law, man's condition as a sinner, and his only way of salvation. It is therefore an instinct of true philanthropy to disseminate God's revealed truth to the whole world. It is a principle that germinates in the heart of every true convert to Christ and his gospel. He finds in his heart a desire to give the Bible to all lands; and he is conscious that he cannot innocently refrain from this work, until the world is enlightened and elevated by the influence of the Scriptures.

But, sir, what is it that makes the Bible, and this only, thus efficient in doing this great work? It is this: It is a revelation of God—an autograph of Deity. It is divine truth.

Now, whatever is said, or can be said, in eulogy of the Bible as the means of turning men from idolatry to the worship of the true God, can apply only to what God has revealed; this only can produce this desirable effect. All human admixtures with the Word of God are inadmissible; they cannot be harmless. They adulterate the truth, and so far render the Bible inefficient for the work assigned it; and we are most solemnly forbidden to add to or take from his words, no matter for what reason or pretence.

The Word of God in the inspired originals, and so far as its true sense is transferred to other languages, is able to make the man of God perfect, and to fit him for all good works. But so far as a translation fails thus to express God's revealed will, it is disabled to effect this, and is weakened in making men wise unto salvation.

It is admitted on all hands, that we have not, in our common English version, such a pure expression of the mind of Christ. No denomination of Christians claims this purity in behalf of King James' version. The Papists denounce it as a whole; commentators of every denomination of Protestants contend that we have not in this version the true import of all that is contained in the inspired originals. Why, sir, a translation of the Scriptures, admitted to contain from twenty to forty thousands of errors, even though many of them may seem to be unimportant, is a reproach to any community of Christians who have the means of purifying it. Objections to having these errors removed cannot come with a pure grace from any people who hold that truth alone can convert and save souls. But what could have been reasonably expected better in a version made as this was? The revisers were too much trammeled to give the Word of God free course. They were selected by a Prince, of whose piety we have no guaranty. They were principally of the Episcopalian national church, between which and the Roman church, there was but little more than an imaginary line of distinction. Their reformation from Popery appears to have been more political than evangelical, and both the king and his revisers seemed more interested in leaving the constitutions of the church undisturbed by their revision, than in having it free from error. The church of Christ is not bound to be guided and controlled by the corrupt head of the Church of England. Reason, religion, and her fealty to Christ, forbid it. She should be no longer under the humiliating necessity of reading in public worship, in families, and places of retirement, in her seminaries of learning, in her infant and Sabbath schools, the sacred Scriptures with many thousands of errors, and knowing them to be there. Surely the Church of Christ has done obeisance long enough to a corrupt and defunct king. She is bound by her vows, by her love to God, and by her duty to the world, to purge the Scriptures from every known error.

If it is the duty of the church to give the Scriptures to the nations of the earth, it is her duty to give them in their purity, so far as she is qualified to do so, without regard to consequences, whether men will bear or forbear; she is not responsible for the results. If such a revision of the Scriptures expose our errors, we shall be the gainers; should it make it more difficult to inculcate our peculiar views of doctrine and discipline, it will only prove that the work should have been done long ago.

The circumstance which first impressed my mind that we should have a corrected version of the English Scriptures, was the remark of a friend, who said that John, the Baptist did not baptize by immersion, and that this was not Christ's baptism; for John, said he, baptized with water, and Christ would baptize with the Holy Spirit, and with fire, thus applying the water to the candidate, and not the candidate to the water. He was not aware that the original said in water, &c. And, by the way, I would remark, that the Scriptures would be improved by corrections in other points also. To give but one instance. In 2d Pet. 1: 8, it reads: "For if these things be in you and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ." Now I cannot discern the difference in the sense of the two terms barren and unfruitful. As they are, they charge the apostle with tautology; but if the former term were correctly rendered, the passage would then read, "They make you that ye shall neither be indolent nor unfruitful," &c.

It seems to be time that this evil was stayed, when large communities of professing Christians propagate, unhesitatingly, a known erroneous version of the Scriptures, and sow broadcast over the land thousands of deviations from God's revealed will, and seek to incorporate these errors into other languages spoken throughout the world. It is certainly time for those who seek the purity and peace of the church, to put on their armor and go forth to this good work. Such a revision of the Scriptures is evidently needed and generally desired among dissenters, and many learned men of different denominations have, upon their personal responsibility, presented what they deemed improved versions of the Scriptures to the public. These may all have their merits. One has aimed at a correction in one point, and another in another, according to their respective modes of thinking, while other points of equal importance have been less regarded. But a revision in all points, without regard to denominational peculiarities, is what the world needs, and what it is entitled to, and what every class of Christians should desire.

But by whom, and when, shall this work be done? In regard to the first inquiry, by whom should the Scriptures be purified? allow me, sir, to say, they should fall into pure hands—such as are not only well instructed in the sacred originals, but such as love the truth, and the whole truth, who will, without partiality or prejudice, give a true rendering from the originals, whatever consequences may follow.

The other inquiry suggested is not without its interest. The proper time for the correction of wrongs of any kind is whenever they are discovered to exist. A reformation is required as soon as a man sees he is wrong. God commands men to repent now. According to this rule, the correction of the Scriptures should not be unnecessarily delayed. The providence of God seems to point out the present time as an auspicious season for this work, especially so far as the English Scriptures are concerned. Men of unmistakable piety have greatly increased beyond those of every former period. Denominations of Christians, independent of royal or national favor or support, and not subject to the control of kings or prelates, have grown strong in numbers, science, and wealth. They have the men and the means. The English language in the time of King James was unsettled in its verbal and orthographic departments. It was then in its childhood. Many words and phrases then in use are now obsolete. In these respects the English language is a much more suitable receptacle of the unchangeable truths of religion than it then was. It is also now extensively used, and promises at some future period to be the medium of communication between all civilized nations. The season while our language is being extended, should be improved in providing a pure version of the English Scriptures, that it may go hand in hand with the extension of the language. In a revision of the Scriptures at the present time, errors may be more easily detected and guarded against, than they could have been when our present version was made. James' revisers risked nothing in regard to their character for erudition from the common people, for they were not learned as they now are. All the revisors had to fear in this respect was from the king. At the present time no scholar would hazard his reputation for learning by materially departing from the truth; for even in the cottages of the poor, multitudes of our lads and young men, who are looking forward to every honorable and laborious avocation, have studied to advantage both the Hebrew and the Greek.

But, sir, there are strong and deserved attachments felt by God's people for the present version of the Scriptures. It is difficult to convince many pious people that God did not dictate every word of the Bible which they and their fathers have been accustomed to read. There is a reverence felt for the rious forms of expression found in it. This feeling is not to be soon or easily removed by any revision, however perfect. They think that the new Bible will not seem to them like the old one.

But there are objections urged on more serious grounds. We are told that the Bible, as it is, is sufficient for all the purposes of salvation, and therefore it is unnecessary to be at the expense of time and money in revising it. Admit all this. Sinners may be saved with a very imperfect knowledge of the inspired Word of God. A few plain truths believed and obeyed, may effect this. But all the force of this objection applies equally to the wide range of revealed truth. God has not suppressed such parts as are supposed to be unnecessary to salvation from us. He has designed it all for all the world. But the salvation of sinners is not all that should be taken into account in this connection. The Scriptures are designed to make the man of God perfect. It needs a perfect version to do this. God is to be honored. It needs a pure version for this; for we dishonor God when we disguise or conceal any portion of his truth.

Again, we are told that if we have a revision, it will be a sectarian Bible. But such as are satisfied with our common version, cannot seriously object to a revision on this account; for this is decidedly so. A Baptist version, even, would be no more so than an Episcopalian one.

It is further urged, that a revision of the Scriptures would unsettle the opinions of many Christians and introduce difficulties into the church. This is probably the strongest objection of all. Christians dislike having their repose disturbed, and churches dislike agitation. But no great good was ever done without producing agitation. Agitation is the life-preserving principle everywhere. The air must be agitated or pestilence and death would everywhere prevail. The water must be agitated, or men could not live on it, nor fish in it. Moses, Aaron, Samuel, Elijah, and John the Baptist, were agitators, and Jesus Christ was the greatest of all. Why, sir, a Christian cannot pray in faith, but he produces agitation. If we preach Christ, we produce agitation. But no Christian minister, church, or denomination, need fear the consequences produced by a correct revision of the Word of God. It is putting the match of truth to the magazine of error that agitates Christian communities and blows up churches.

The sum of the whole matter seems to be this: The Scriptures as a Divine revelation are essential to the conversion of sinners, the union and discipline of the church of Christ; our English version is acknowledgedly defective. The means for producing a corrected revision of them can be obtained. The present time seems auspicious for the accomplishment of the work. God has stirred up the hearts of his people to put their hands to the plough, to eradicate these errors; and by the blessing of God the work will be done. The Union may be traduced and its officers persecuted, but even this will be overruled and will further the work. May God give the Board and the Revisers the wisdom which is from above.

THE INFIDEL AND HIS DYING CHILD.

The following passage has a touching interest. It is extracted from Mrs. McIntosh's "Charms and Counter Charms." Euston Hastings, the father, is an infidel.

The child's disease was scarlet fever. Ten days and nights of ever deepening gloom had past, and in the silent night, having insisted that Evelyn, who had herself shown symptoms of illness through the day, should retire to bed, Euston Hastings sat alone watching with a lightening heart the disturbed sleep of the little Eve. It was near midnight when that troubled sleep was broken. The child turned from side to side uneasily, and looked somewhat wildly around her.

"What is the matter with my darling?" asked Euston Hastings, in tones of melting tenderness.

"Where's mamma?—Eve wants mamma to say, 'Our Father!'"

Euston Hastings had often contemplated the beautiful picture of his child kneeling with clasped hands beside her mother, to lisp her evening prayer, or, since her illness forbade her rising from her bed, of Evelyn kneeling beside it, taking those clasped hands in hers and listening to Eve's softly murmured words. Well he knew, therefore, what was meant by Eve's simple phrase, 'To say Our Father.'

"Mamma is asleep," he said, "when she awakes, I will call her."

"No, no, papa; Eve asleep then."

"I will call her at once, then, darling," and he would have moved, but the little hand was laid on him to arrest him.

"No—don't wake poor mamma; papa say Our Father for Eve."

"Will Eve say it to papa? Speak, then, my darling," he said, finding that though the hands were clasped and the sweet eyes devoutly closed, Eve remained silent.

"No—Eve too sick, papa—Eve can't talk so much—papa kneel down and say, Our Father, like mamma did last night—won't you, papa?"

Euston Hastings could not resist that pleading voice; and, kneeling, he laid his hand over the clasped ones of his child, and for the first time since he had murmured it with childish earnestness in this mother's ear, his lips gave utterance to that hallowed form of prayer which was given to man by a Divine Teacher. At such an hour, under such circumstances, it could not be uttered carelessly; and Euston Hastings understood its solemn import—its recognition of God's sovereignty—its surrender of all things to Him. He understood it, we say—but he trembled at it. His infidelity was annihilated; but he believed as the unreconciled believe, and his heart almost stood still with fear awhile. 'Thy will be done on earth, even as it is in heaven,' fell slowly from his lips.

Soothed by his compliance, Eve became still, and seemed to sleep, but only for a few minutes. Suddenly, in a louder voice than had been heard within that room for days, she exclaimed, "Papa—papa—see there, up there, papa!"

Her own eyes were fixed upward, on the ceiling, as it seemed to Euston Hastings, for to him nothing else was visible, while a smile of joy played upon her lips, and her arms were stretched upward as to some celestial visitant.

"Eve coming!" she cried again, "take Eve!"

"Will Eve leave papa?" cried Euston Hastings, while unconsciously he passed his arm over her, as if dreading that she would really be borne from him.

With eyes still fixed upward, and expending her last strength in an effort to rise from the bed, Eve murmured in broken tones, "Papa, come too—mamma—grandpa—little brother—dear pap—."

The last word could have been distinguished only by the intensely listening ear of love. It ended in a sigh; and Euston Hastings felt, even while he still clasped her cherub form, and gazed upon her sweetly-smiling face, that his Eve had indeed left him forever. That she had ceased to exist, with the remembrance of that last scene full in his mind, he could not believe. Henceforth heaven with its angels, the ministering spirits of the Most High, was a reality; it was the habitation of his Eve; and his own heart bent longingly to see it. His proud, stern, unbending nature, had been taught to tremble at the decree of "Him who ruleth over the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth." The Being and Nature upon which he had hitherto speculated as grand abstractions, became at once unspeakably interesting facts. Would he contend with him in wrath? Would he snatch from him one by one the blessings of his life, crushing the impious heart which had reviled his attributes, and denied his existence? or was he indeed "so long suffering," so "plenteous in mercy" that He would prove even to him that his might was the might of a Saviour!

Such were his thoughts, as with still concentrated agony he turned from the grave of his cherished child to watch beside the suffering Evelyn. She had taken the terrible disease from her little Eve, and lay for many days insensible to her own danger or her husband's agony. But God was merciful, and the husband and father received her as from the grave. The heart which judgment had aroused, mercy melted. A consciousness of his own unworthiness of God's mercy—a fear that he could not be heard—checked the cry which anguish would have extorted from Euston Hastings; and the first real utterance from his heart to heaven was in the language of thanksgiving.

HALF-DESTROYED BIBLES.

A father in South Carolina was about sending his son to college. Fearing lest the principles of Christian faith, which he had endeavored to instil into his mind, would be rudely assailed, but trusting in the efficacy of that word which is quick and powerful, he purchased, unknown to his son, an elegant copy of the Bible, and deposited it at the bottom of his trunk. The young man entered upon his college career. The restraints of a pious education were soon broken off, and he proceeded from speculation to doubts, and from doubts to a denial of the reality of religion. After having become, in his own estimation, wiser than his father, he discovered one day, while rummaging his trunk, with great surprise and indignation, the sacred deposit. He took it out, and while deliberating on the manner in which he should treat it, he determined that he would use it, as he should need it, to wipe his razor on while shaving. Accordingly, whenever he went to shave, he tore out a leaf or two of the Holy Book, and thus used it till nearly half the volume was destroyed. But while he was committing this outrage, a text now and then met his eye, and was carried like a barbed arrow to his heart. At length he heard a sermon which discovered to him his own character, and his exposure to the wrath of God, and riveted upon his mind the impression which he had received from the last torn leaf of the blessed, yet insulted volume. Had worlds been at his disposal, he would freely have given them all, could they have availed in enabling him to undo what he had done. At length he found forgiveness at the foot of the cross. The torn leaves of that sacred volume brought healing to his soul; for they led him to repose on the mercy of God, which is sufficient for the chief of sinners.

DR. CHALMERS IN HIS FAMILY.

In his domestic intercourse with his daughters, there was much playful familiarity. Finding one of them sitting alone in a room, "Well, my dear little Howlet,

'Hail, mildey pleasing solitude,
Companion of the wise and good;'

but I'm no for us growing perfectly uncognizant of one another, sitting in corners like sae mony cats." After some of his public performances, when he came home exhausted, his daughters would gather round him as he lay at ease in his arm chair. One would play Scotch music, another shampoo his feet, (a very frequent, and to him always a very agreeable operation,) a third would talk nonsense, and set him in fits of laughter. At such times, in a mock heroic way, he would repeat Scott's lines—

"Oh woman, in our hours of ease," &c.

A spirit of chivalry ran through all his intercourse with his daughters: they not only administered to his comfort in the hours of relaxation, but he made them companions, as it were, of his public life, and sought their intellectual sympathy with even his highest exercise of thought.

JOHN BUNYAN'S GRAVE.

A recent traveler gives the following description of a visit to the grave of the author of the Pilgrim's Progress:—

I have just returned from a visit to "Bunhill fields," and "City Road Chapel." These are interesting places to those who cherish the memories of departed worthies. In visiting the former, the Christian stranger seeks especially the graves of Bunyan and Watts. One might search long for that of Bunyan, and then pass without knowing it. It is a decayed, tabular monument, whose stones, darkened by time, are just now contrasted in appearance with long fresh grass, that covers a large part of its base. The carvings upon it are rude, and many of the chiseled corners seem to have been robbed by those who desire to carry away some memento of their visit to the grave of the "pilgrim" who, at the end of his "progress" in this world, was buried here. This time-slackened and time-eaten pile is intended to perpetuate the memory of three beside Bunyan, but who two of them be, are cannot tell. The remnants of one inscription inform us that "Here lyeth the remains;" of whom? On the opposite side to this, in distinct characters, evidently recently carved, we find the simple inscription, "Mr. John Bunyan, author of the 'Pilgrim's Progress,' obt. 31 August, 1688, aged sixty."

CHRISTIAN CONFIDENCE.—You remember Peter, when he was imprisoned, chained between two soldiers. The church was praying in tears, wondering what would become of them if their strong champion was taken from them. The enemies of God on earth, and the devils in hell, were rejoicing that they had Peter in their power. The angels in heaven, ever intent on the mysteries of Providence in redemption, were sending down to see what the Lord would do with Peter. When heaven, and earth, and hell, were thinking of Peter, what were Peter's thoughts? What was Peter doing? Peter was asleep. [Summerfield.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, November 4, 1852.

LIMITED SPREAD OF SABBATARIANISM.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder :—

I read your paper with much interest, and am surprised that brother Brown's excellent, faithful articles on "Denominational Sins" have not been better appreciated.

I often mourn on account of the little success that seems to attend the efforts to promote the knowledge and observance of the true Sabbath. It seems to me one of the great mysteries of providence, that such valuable men as Begg of Glasgow, Black of London, &c., should labor so much without success. For I have never heard that they have been the means of converting any to their views.

I am very much interested in the tidings from Jerusalem, and have often thought I should like brother Brown's opinion on the question, "If Jerusalem should be again built up, the Jews brought to embrace the Messiah, and the gospel have a universal spread, will the Bible Sabbath be again restored?" Is there any passage of Scripture that predicts this?

Would it not be a profitable way of spending the evening after the Sixth-day, to spend it in special prayer for the universal spread of the Sabbath?—those who can meet to gether in a social prayer meeting, to make that the special subject of prayer; those who cannot meet together on this evening, to devote the time to the same purpose in their own families, or closets, &c.?

I should very much like to see some remarks in the Recorder on these questions.

Bliss

I was considerably affected, lately, in reading a piece in the Recorder on emigration, with the account of that brother who was so anxious to promote the Sabbath, and preach the Gospel, and seemed willing to make any sacrifice for that object, yet never saw his desires gratified, but, on the contrary, all his children scattered, and not one of them continuing to keep the Sabbath. If the thing was from God, would it not have prospered?

Remarks.

The foregoing is from a worthy female correspondent, whose exercises of mind on the particular points referred to are, probably, similar to those which many others have had.

In regard to the question, Whether the Bible Sabbath will be restored, when Jerusalem shall be rebuilt, and the Gospel spread over the whole earth? we would merely refer our correspondent to an article in the Recorder, week before last, entitled, "The Universal Observance of the Sabbath in Millennial Times," by Mr. Begg. The subject is there opened, and will probably be continued in successive numbers, and afford all the satisfaction which our correspondent desires.

The suggestion of spending the eve of the Sabbath as a season of special prayer for the spread of this divine institution, is worthy of consideration. We have nothing in addition to offer upon this particular point; but of the necessity of resorting more to prayer, if not less to controversy, we have long been sensible. Our scripture creed is, that the cause of truth is advanced, not by might, nor by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord. That the truth should be stated to opposers, is certainly necessary; for it were folly to expect people to be converted to any truth without knowing what that truth is. But, in nine cases out of ten, perfect simplicity of statement is all that is called for. That being once made, carry the case to God, and plead with him to follow the statement with his blessing. He has the hearts of men in his hands, and can turn them in whatever direction he pleases. Sabbath-keeping is like every other duty of the Divine Law; the native enmity of the human heart rebels against it. If we expect that the mere force of argument will cause a cessation of this rebellion, we are doomed to a woful disappointment. Nothing but the Spirit of God can render a man willing to submit to the many inconveniences which are likely to befall him in his efforts to sabbatize according to the commandment. Prayer, then, is the grand resort to which we must betake ourselves, if we expect any extensive reformation in this matter.

We often err on this point. We come into contact with those who differ from us, and supposing them to be ignorant, we make a simple statement of the duty required by the Fourth Commandment. They meet the statement with an objection; and we, in turn, attempt to obviate the objection by a strict analysis of the language employed in the Commandment. The inconvenience of rendering obdience, together with the unwillingness of man to find himself in the wrong, suggests the necessity of raising further objections; and again, we undertake to obviate these. The matter now assumes the form of controversy, and we allow ourselves to be carried farther and farther, till, at last, we retire with excited feelings, to complain of the perverseness and want of candor exhibited by those whom we had undertaken to instruct. Has it not been so in numberless instances?

Now we suggest, that there is such a thing as giving too much importance to objections. Our hasty earnestness to dispose of them practically concedes that they are of weight. The objector is often led to attach an importance to them, by the very zeal which we evince in the way of meeting them; whereas, had he been left to his own reflections, and, in the mean time, been commended to God in prayer, he would have felt how weak were his objections, in comparison with the simple truth of the Bible, calmly and affectionately stated to his understanding. We forget that the word of God is a sword—that it is like a fire, and like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces. We forget that its efficacy is such, that it pierces to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit. It is certainly all this, when accompanied with the life-giving influences of the Holy Spirit. Yet, as if we were distrustful of its power, we are always trying some argument of our own.

We are not disposed to undervalue controversy. In a certain sense, our Lord himself was a controversialist. So were his Apostles. But controversy was not their reliance. They well knew, that while "the light was shining in darkness, the darkness comprehended it not." They knew that the god of this world had blinded the eyes and hardened the hearts of all men, so that not even miracles done before them could bring them into the faith of the gospel. They knew that Paul might plant, and Apollos water, but after all, the increase was of God. Their reliance was, therefore, chiefly upon prayer. "Brethren, pray for us," says the Apostle to the Gentiles, "that the word of the Lord may have free course, and be glorified." 2 Thess. 3 : 1. And not only did he ask for the prayers of his brethren, but he labored in prayer himself, even with "great conflict." Col. 2 : 1. Indeed, all laborers in moral reform have found it necessary to resort to prayer, without which they did but labor in the fire.

It is the error of most modern reformers, that they rely more upon controversy than upon prayer. This is the age of disputation, and in the excitement attendant upon it, people almost forget that the triumph of truth depends upon the interposition and blessing of the God of truth. They rely, too much, upon the natural affinity of the human mind for truth, forgetting that the "father of lies" has forestalled them in that respect. We, who have undertaken the cause of Sabbath reform, would do well to consider this. There is no such affinity of the mind for truth as will lead to a practical obedience to it, when interest, pleasure, convenience, reputation, and every earthly comfort, are calling in some other direction.

The circumstance by which our correspondent "was much affected, lately," prompting the query whether, "If the thing was from God, would it not have prospered?" deserves a passing remark. Sabbath-keeping is of God, though the schemes of men to promote their enjoyment in it may not be. Bro. Bliss probably committed an error, in the first place, by removing from Rhode Island. He there enjoyed church privileges for himself and his growing family. It is a serious matter, for one so situated, to break up, and emigrate to a region where no such privileges can be enjoyed; a step, which nothing will justify but urgent necessity, or a strong sense of duty growing out of the marked leadings of Divine Providence. But if Bro. B. erred then, he added to the error, when he again emigrated to the Sennamahoning country. He was in advanced life, and most of his children had arrived at maturity: and in supposing that he could, at such an advanced age, go into a new country, and acquire a leading influence, so as to establish a Sabbath-keeping church, and induce all new settlers to rally around the standard, he did not evince good judgment. He might have known, that he was only going into a region, where all his influence upon other settlers would be lost. He might have known, that the molding influence over the society of a new country would be exercised, not by men in advanced life, like himself, but by those that were young, hardy and vigorous. He might have known, that in bringing his sons and daughters to such a country, he was only bringing them under the influence of the strongest temptations to abandon the principles in which they had been trained. He ought to have forseen all this, and we are rather surprised that he did not. The best of men, however, sometimes commit great mistakes. Bro. B.'s scheme for promoting his enjoyment, notwithstanding it seemed to embrace Sabbath-keeping as one of its leading features, was not of God, and hence the entire failure of it. We say "not of God." We mean, of course, so far as it was a scheme for the promotion of the Sabbath cause. Infinite Wisdom may have had ulterior designs, of vast importance in the general plan by which he governs the world, in view of which, if we knew what they were, it might be allowable to say that the undertaking was of God.

The text which our correspondent has furnished, calls for some additional reflections. It is no uncommon thing for persons to conclude, that an undertaking is contrary to the will of God, because it seems to meet with some discouragement, or temporary check, from his providence. Unquestionably, there are occasions when the providence of God is ordered for the express purpose of thwarting a wicked enterprise. But in nearly, if not all, such cases, the enterprise was known, beforehand, to be a wicked one. To fight against Providence in such cases, is to incur certain defeat. It is to "kick against the pricks," which is 'hard" business for a poor sinner. But in cases where the undertaking is in accordance with the soundest convictions of duty, what right have we to suppose, that temporary discouragements in providence are intended to unsettle such convictions? Nevertheless, we often meet with persons that appear to think so. They commenced their career of duty, when the sun shone, and every thing seemed to betoken a continuance of fair weather. But a storm rises, and beats upon them, and they are foolish enough to think it an indication of their duty to turn back! Or, they have not had the success they expected, and so conclude that God has not spoken good concerning the enterprise! Rash conclusion, evincive of an unstable mind.

Divine Providence is a scheme of which we have but a very imperfect comprehension. Those who determine their duty by the way in which its dispensations affect them personally, will prove as variable as the wind; not because there are contradictions in God's providence, any more than in his word; but because the relation of particular dispensations of it to its great end, as a whole, is not obvious to short-sighted mortals. We know from the Scriptures, that providence, as a whole, is one connected and consistent scheme; and that, in the grand result, it secures the good of God's people and the triumph of his truth. But a particular dispensation of it often confounds us. Considered by itself, it seems to be subversive of the great end in view. The frowning aspect, which it seems to wear towards the course we are taking, is indeed a discouragement, if we choose to view it in such a light; nevertheless, it may be intended only as a trial of our faith, or as putting us to the proof, whether we will walk in the commandments of God, or no. In reality, it harmonizes with the great end, and is a necessary means towards it; and it ought not to be considered as a discouragement, but rather as a call to "walk by faith, not by sight."

It is enough for us, that our duty is plainly marked out in God's word. If God says to us, "Keep holy the Sabbath day," and that "the seventh day is the Sabbath;" and if, after availing ourselves of the best means of information within our reach, we are convinced that Saturday is that very "seventh day" which he commands us to sanctify; then no matter what may be the dispensations of providence towards us personally, all we have to do is to obey. If our example contributes nothing towards convincing others, and rendering them obedient, still our duty is not altered. God never told us to keep the Sabbath on condition that others did. "Let every man prove his own work, and then shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, and not in another." Gal. 6 : 4.

But 'are not the discouragements we meet with, the fewness of our numbers, the difficulties that constantly embarrass our efforts to keep the Sabbath, and our limited success in making converts, indications that we have misunderstood the teachings of Scripture?' We confess, that we never hear such questions asked, without almost losing our patience. A more foolish interrogatory can hardly be proposed; and yet, with multitudes, it is considered an all-sufficient answer to the clearest statements of truth. If Sabbath-keeping were a new thing in the earth; if it were a shoot from the hot-beds of modern fanaticism; if it had not been known in the Christian Church, from the earliest ages, and traced through every period down to the present; if it had not stood the ordeal of severe controversy in England, three hundred years ago; if it had not been before the American public for two centuries past; if it had not been examined, and re-examined, over and over, by its opposers, and all only to make its conformity to the Scriptures more apparent; there would be more sense in such questions. But it is an old and beaten path that we are treading; and though that, of itself, does not determine it to be according to truth, it is sufficient to relieve us from the imputation of acting unwisely because we do not choose to be swayed by the majority.

But let the principle involved in this all-potent interrogatory be tested a little. Only about three hundred years ago, Martin Luther began preaching a doctrine quite new and strange to the great majority of those who were called the Church of Christ on earth—the doctrine of Justification by Faith. But suppose that, instead of preaching it boldly, he had argued that the fewness of the numbers who had hitherto received the doctrine, and the limited success they had met with in promulgating it, and the fact that he now stood almost alone, were to be viewed as indications that he had probably mistaken the teachings of God's Word; what would have become of the Reformation? And was there ever a reform of any kind attempted, but what was liable to the same objection? And would not such objections, if yielded to, put a stop to all efforts to do away error? Could the world, or the Church, advance one step, if such reasoning were allowed to govern?

Away with such folly! "Every one shall give account of himself to God." And when he gives his account, God will ask him—not, What did others understand me to command? but—What did you yourself understand me to command? It is the clearest dictate of reason, that as we shall not be called to answer for other people's conduct, so we are not called to regulate our duty by their conscience, or their convictions. We may have mistaken our duty, but the convictions of other people are no evidence that we have. T. B. B.

SYMPATHY FOR DR. NEWMAN.—The Freeman's Journal, the Roman Catholic paper published in this city, acknowledges the receipt of $295 50 towards the fund raised to defray the expenses of the suit between Drs. Newman and Achilli. This will not go far, but will doubtless be welcomed as a token of sympathy on this side of the Atlantic. Perhaps, however, it is not the whole amount which will be raised in this country. The case is represented as very urgent, and Dr. Newman is said to be threatened with "ruin" if liberal aid is not extended to him. In view of this, a London correspondent of the Catholic Mirror, of Baltimore, makes the request, to send "the small contribution of two cents each." The Mirror enforces the appeal, and calls upon its readers for the donation, from each of them, of a "post-office stamp!" The Puritan Recorder thinks that the "ruin" must be pretty near at hand, when the cry is raised for pennies and post-office stamps.

MINISTERIAL LABOR IN WISCONSIN.

We have received from Eld. Varnum Hull, of Milton, Wisconsin, two business letters, in each of which he speaks of the encouragements to ministerial labor in that State. In his first letter he writes :—

"For the encouragement of the friends, I would say, that within some nine months past sixteen families, residing about twelve miles from us, have embraced the Sabbath, and I think a church will be organized there eventually. Among the converts is one man who was educated for the Lutheran ministry. I had the pleasure of baptizing him and his wife a few days ago, and I have strong hopes that he will do the cause good service. A number of families in other places in this State have recently commenced keeping the Sabbath, and I am of the opinion that labor can be bestowed in this region of country to better advantage than in any other place. The ground ought to be immediately occupied. We very much need a man here to visit these small places. With proper attention, I think that Wisconsin may yet be the strong-hold of Sabbath-keepers."

Eld. Hull's second letter speaks of being engaged, with much encouragement, in a protracted meeting at Albion, and says :—

"We need more faithful ministerial labor here, and must have it. The Sabbath is receiving attention, and quite a number have embraced it. We have recently had some discussion on that subject before a Baptist Ministerial Conference. I am engaged to preach four or five discourses on it soon in the village of Whitewater."

In this connection it may be proper to say, that the claims of Wisconsin, as a field for ministerial labor, were considered by the Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society at their last meeting, and it was voted to continue to aid in sustaining the ministry at Walworth; and also to favor a proposition of the Wisconsin Association, to emply a minister for a year in visiting and preaching among the scattered Sabbath-keepers in Northern Wisconsin, by paying half the expense of such a mission.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

GLASGOW, October 15, 1852.

In the Free Church Synod of Glasgow and Ayr, it was this week resolved to memorialize the Government not to grant a charter to the Crystal Palace Company, unless with a proviso that it should not be opened on Sunday. In the discussion, the progress of Sunday desecration in Glasgow was referred to. Some years ago, as remarked by the Rev. Mr. Gibson, omnibuses were started on Sunday to run between the city and suburbs, to carry people to and from the churches. As might have been foreseen, this was an opening that would afterwards be enlarged. Accordingly, we have now omnibuses running regularly on Sunday, not only to the immediate suburbs, but also to Renfrew and Paisley, and other adjacent towns. The one now running to Paisley is by far the largest that we have in town, having been built to compete with the Railway; yet, on its arrival last Sunday night, it is stated to have been quite full, within and without. The expectation is, that if these conveyances are allowed, and continue to be so patronized, the Railway Companies will all run trains on Sunday. With much consistency, Mr. Gibson was greatly indignant at the proprietors of steamboats, coaches, and railways, who advertise cheap trips on the half-year fast days—another of the self-willed additions to the observance of the Lord's Supper, by which the church has thrust the ordinance from its place of frequent commemoration. As formerly remarked, we do not expect that the Memorials, and Petitions, and Remonstrances—numerous as we are sure they will be, from Societies, Congregations, Presbyteries, and Synods—will avail to prevent the charter being granted on the terms already announced. Not only can the Company plead the promise, but they can point to a large amount of expenditure on the faith that the promise would be kept. But indeed they do not exhibit any fear of withdrawment from the stipulation; nor do they try to propitiate those who are opposed to their plan. Even now, they carry on their Sunday work, as they mean hereafter to commence their Sunday play. Numerous gangs of men are stated to be laboriously at work on Sundays, forming the ground. The Directors having been remonstrated with, merely replied, that the work is in the hands of contractors, over whom they have no control in that respect.

The Ecclesiastical Commissioners of Government have advertised for sale, "the Right of Presentation of Minister to the Church of the Holy Trinity in the Town of Liverpool," after the decease of the present minister, "now aged 56 years." The stipend is £230, "together with the surplice fees," &c. All this is so usual that it should have passed without remark, but for the occasion of noting that the Record, one of the most religious of our newspapers, the London organ of the Evangelical party of the Church of England, specially directs, in a leading article, the attention of its friends to the sale, that is, those of them "to whom God has given the talent of money, but who are fond of retirement," "to whom such a call comes with peculiar force." Such are directed to take advice as to the market price of such things, and purchase accordingly, which they are informed they can do, "while they may still preserve themselves in that retirement." The Guardian, a high-church paper, calls attention to the Record's proposal of merchandising the "cure of souls." Punch is quoted ridiculing such transactions. This, however, we fear the professional Jester would as readily do at things most sacred—if it could be done with profit and safety. We never look at the paper, its very name ever reminding us of the Apostle's warning against "foolish jesting, which is not convenient;" but the low state of true religious feeling in our land is indicated by the extensive circulation of such foolery.

The English portion of the deputation in behalf of the Madiai left England in the beginning of the week. They were to be joined by those of the Continental Churches at Marsailles, and proceed together to Tuscany. Very large meetings have been held, both in Glasgow and Edinburgh, within these few days, at which due sympathy was expressed for the sufferers, and resolutions to endeavor to find them help. The King of Prussia's Charge d'Affaires in Tuscany energetically remonstrated against the intolerance displayed. In deed, rarely have worth and numbers more decidedly interposed; but we have no confidence that even such combination will obtain the desired result. The prayer of faith has higher and holier influence; and although we are persuaded many are seeking to the Lord for the faithful pair, we yet fear that there is a dangerous dependence on human help.

Our Queen passed through Edinburgh this week, on her way from the Highlands to England, and before now has probably returned to mingle in the bustle and anxieties of Government.

The Prince Albert, which was sent out by Lady Franklin in search of her husband, about two years ago, has returned without tidings or traces of the lost. Having, however, visited the rendezvous of the more recent expedition, we have favorable accounts of the openness of Wellington Channel, and of the departure of the vessels by the course which Penny discovered last year.

MATERIALS FOR HISTORY.

Few persons appreciate the importance of full and correct statistics of Churches and Associations, as materials for history. We attempted, some months ago, to prepare a statistical table of Seventh-day Baptist Churches, showing the ministers, licentiates, deacons, clerks, post-offices, date of organization, number of members, and increase or decrease for three years; and were surprised to find how incomplete and unreliable were the minutes of past years. In some cases, the same church was called by different names in the minutes of different years; frequently, ministers and deacons were reported the same year by two churches located hundreds of miles apart, they having removed their standing, of which no notice had been taken by the church which had given them letters; occasionally, a church is found to have reported fifty or even a hundred less members one year than were reported a year previous, the difference resulting from a "correction of the list of members" by erasing those from whom no communication had been received within a certain time, but of which no mention is made in their letters. In such ways are statistics, which it cost much trouble to collect, rendered comparatively useless as materials for history. It would be very easy, with a little care and system on the part of church and associational clerks, to have these matters so arranged that the future historian would need little else than a complete set of our minutes, to enable him to prepare a correct account of the churches, the associations, and the conference. It is hoped that the subject will receive more attention in future than it has in years past.

In a recent number of the Christian Watchman and Reflector, we find a timely article upon this subject, suggested by an examination of the "Manual" issued by the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland—an organization which deserves great credit for the invaluable statistics it furnishes of the churches connected with it. We copy a paragraph from the article alluded to :—

"The printing of the minutes of our Associations became a fixed rule at an early day, and in these minutes were recorded facts and figures which have become absolutely indispensable to history. Unfortunately, however, we have made, in the progress of years, but little improvement in the manner of executing these minutes. They are much now as at first, as to statistical matters, and have changed only as new subjects have engrossed attention. They are compressed into the briefest possible space, and though quite intelligible to those who were present at the meetings, convey no full and adequate impressions to after times. It was once made our duty, as the Chairman of a Committee, to write the history of an Association. The materials given were the recollections of two venerable men associated with us, who had been in the habit of attending the meetings for forty years, and the published minutes. We found the former indispensable to any just understanding of the latter. The minutes were as good as minutes generally are, and were greatly valuable, but they were by no means what they might have been. We beg to suggest that minutes should always be prepared quite as much with reference to the times coming as to the time now present. They ought to embody every thing which is necessary for their own free explication. So prepared, they form historical data of the highest value. * * * *

"We have been neglectful of our history, and have suffered from the loss. True to our history, every year would more distinctly and fully have embodied our principles, and our mission would have been the more nearly accomplished. We have a past—but it is buried, and who shall find it? Where are the materials out of which to frame our history? How can we carry forward the work our fathers commenced, without knowing what they achieved, and the principles by which they were actuated?"

THE N.Y. BAPTIST REGISTER, published at Utica, New York, and for some time past the organ of the Baptist State Convention, has been sold for $2,500 to A. M. Beebee, Esq., who it is expected will conduct it. It is hereafter to have no official connection with the organization of which it was formerly the organ.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

A large space in the daily papers is occupied with accounts of Mr. Webster's death and funeral, and the deep sorrow which pervades all classes in every part of the country. Of his last hours we have already given every important particular. His funeral took place at Marshfield on Sixth-day last, and was attended by at least 10,000 persons, among whom were General Franklin Pierce, Governor Marcy of N. Y., Hon. Abbott Lawrence, Hon. Edward Everett, Hon. Charles Ashman, Governor Boutwell, Ex-Chancellor Jones of N. Y., Judge Sprague, and many other distinguished men. The services were conducted by Rev. Mr. Alden, the parish orthodox clergyman. They were very simple, consisting of a short address and prayer.

At nine o'clock the body had been removed from the library to the lawn in front of the mansion, and placed on a bier beneath one of the large poplar trees. From this hour up to half-past one the thousands present came around and took a last view. The countenance was serene and life-like. Two garlands of oak leaves and acorns, and two bouquets of flowers, were placed on the coffin. Many shed tears and grieved for the loss as of a departed father or dear friend.

The solemities closed at the mansion at half-past one, when the funeral cortege proceeded to the tomb, about half-a-mile distant. There were no ladies in the procession, and no carriages, but so great was the length that scarcely two-thirds had left the house when the body reached the tomb. Here the procession passed round the coffin, the lid of which was open, and at precisely half-past two o'clock the tomb closed on the mortal remains of Daniel Webster.

Mr. Webster's Will.

Mr. Webster made his will only a few days before his death, signing it on Thursday. It was drawn up under his direction by Geo. T. Curtis, Esq. It gives the Marshfield property to the widow during her lifetime, and then transfers it to Fletcher Webster—the only living child of the deceased statesman—whose son Daniel—an unusually intelligent and manly lad of about twelve years—succeeds to the inheritance. Mr. Webster's grandchildren by his daughter Mrs. Appleton, are already very wealthy, so that no injustice is done them in this bequest. He did not forget his numerous friends and relatives, but left to very many of them little marks of his favor and memorials of the dead. Jas. W. Paige, R. H. Blatchford, and Fletcher Webster, are the Executors, and Mrs. Webster, Executrix.

Mr. Webster's Services.

Daniel Webster was born in Franklin, N. H., Jan. 18, 1782. He was graduated at Dartmouth College, at the commencement of 1801, and soon afterwards became teacher of an academy at Fryburg, Me. He studied law first at Boscawen, N. H., and afterwards in Boston, and was admitted to the bar in 1805. In 1807 he established himself in Portsmouth, N. H., where he soon earned distinction as a lawyer. He took his seat in Congress, as a Representative from New Hampshire, in 1813, and served two terms. In 1816 he removed to Boston. In 1821 he took a leading part in the Massachusetts Constitutional Convention, and in 1823 again took his seat in Congress as the Representative from Boston. Re-elected in 1824 and in 1826, he was in the latter year transferred to the Senate. In 1830 he made his great speech in reply to Hayne. Remaining in the Senate until 1841, he became Secretary of State under Gen. Harrison, and continued at that post under Mr. Tyler, until after the ratification of the Treaty of Washington, negotiated with Lord Ashburton. Not long after his negotiation he visited Europe, where he was received with distinguished honors. In 1845 he was re-elected to the Senate, where he continued until, on the decease of Gen. Taylor, and the accession of Mr. Fillmore, he became again Secretary of State. The angel of death found him at that post.

A Letter of Mr. Webster.

The following extract from a letter written by Mr. Webster to an intimate friend in this city, dated Franklin, May 3, 1846, has found its way into the papers, and will be read with peculiar interest just at this time.

"I have made satisfactory arrangements respecting my house here, the best of which is that I can leave it where it is, and yet be comfortable, notwithstanding the railroad.

"This house faces due North. Its windows look towards the river Merrimac. But then the river soon turns to the South, so that the Eastern windows look toward the river also, But the river has so deepened its channel in this stretch of it, within the last fifty years, that we cannot see its waters, without approaching it, or going back to the higher lands behind us. The history of this change is of considerable importance in the philosophy of streams. I have observed it practically, and know something of the theory of the phenomenon; but I doubt whether the world will ever be benefited, either by my learning or my observation in this respect.

"Looking out at the east windows, at this moment, (2 P. M.,) with a beautiful sun just breaking out, my eye sweeps a rich and level field of 100 acres. At one end of it, a third of a mile off, I see plain marble grave stones, designating the places where repose my father, my brother Joseph, and my sisters Mehitable, Abigail and Sarah; good Scripture names, inherited from their Puritan ancestors.

"My father!—Ebenezer Webster!—born at Kingston, in the lower part of the State, in 1739—the handsomest man I ever saw, except my brother Ezekiel, who appeared to me, and so does he now seem to me, the very finest human form that ever I laid eyes on. I saw him in his coffin—a white forehead—a tinged cheek—a complexion as clear as heavenly light! But where am I straying?

"The grave has closed upon him, as it has on all my brothers and sisters. We shall soon be all together. But this is melancholy—and I leave it. Dear, dear kindred blood, how I love you all!

"The fair field is before me—I could see a lamb on any part of it. I have ploughed it, and raked it, and hoed it, but I never mowed it. Somehow, I could never learn to hang a scythe! I had not wit enough. My brother

Joe used to say that my father sent me to college in order to make me equal to the rest of the children!

"Of a hot day in July—it must have been one of the last years of Washington's administration—I was making hay, with my father, just where I now see a remaining elm tree, about the middle of the afternoon. The Hon. Abiel Foster, M. C., who lived in Canterbury, six miles off, called at the house, and came into the field to see my father. He was a worthy man, college learned, and had been a minister, but was not a person of any considerable natural powers. My father was his friend and supporter. He talked a while in the field, and went on his way. When he was gone, my father called me to him, and we sat down beneath the elm, on a hay cock. He said, 'My son, that is a worthy man; he is a member of Congress; he goes to Philadelphia, and gets six dollars a day, while I toil here. It is because he had an education, which I never had. If I had had his early education, I should have been in Philadelphia in his place. I came near it, as it was; but I missed it, and now I must work here.' 'My dear father,' said I, 'you shall not work; brother and I will work for you, and wear our hands out, and you shall rest'—and I remember to have cried, and I cry now at the recollection. 'My child,' said he, 'it is of no importance to me; I now live but for my children; I could not give your elder brother the advantages of knowledge, but I can do something for you. Exert yourself—improve your opportunities—learn—learn—and when I am gone, you will not need to go through the hardships which I have undergone, and which have made me an old man before my time.'

"The next May he took me to Exeter, to the Philips Exeter Academy—placed me under the tuition of its excellent preceptor, Dr. Benjamin Abbott, still living.

"My father died in April, 1806. I neither left him, nor forsook him. My opening an office at Boscawen was that I might be near him. I closed his eyes in this very house. He died at sixty-seven years of age—after a life of exertion, toil, and exposure—a private soldier, an officer, a legislator, a judge—everything that a man could be, to whom learning never had disclosed her "ample page.'

"My first speech at the bar was made when he was on the bench—he never heard me a second time.

"He had in him what I recollect to have been the character of some of the old Puritans. He was deeply religious, but not sour—on the contrary, good humored, facetious—showing, even in his age, with a contagious laugh, teeth, all as white as alabaster—gentle, soft, playful—and yet having a heart in him that he seemed to have borrowed from a lion. He could frown; a frown it was; but cheerfulness, good humor, and smiles, composed his most usual aspect. Ever truly, your friend.

"DAN'L WEBSTER."

DANIEL WEBSTER'S HABILIMENTS FOR THE GRAVE.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Times, writing from Marshfield, under date of Oct. 28th, says:—

The burial case is of a very neat pattern, covered with black velvet, and ornamented—not profusely, however—with silver-plated mountings and handles. The inside is lined with white satin, laid in small plaits. A plain though massive silver plate upon the lid contains the simple inscription, "DANIEL WEBSTER."

The corpse is arrayed in such habiliments as his compeers of the Senate have often seen him in, when on a bright summer morning he sought the Senate Hall, to pour the words of wisdom and the light of truth upon some topic of surpassing public interest. A blue coat, with plain gilt buttons, vest and pants of spotless white, are substituted for the shroud. A white neckcloth encircles the throat, over which is turned the shirt collar. The feet are encased in silken hose and shoes of patent leather. The hair of the deceased is parted and disposed as in life; and his white-gloved hands are crossed upon his breast. The lips are slightly parted, just as when about to speak.

Upon a post mortem examination of the body, at Marshfield, it was found that Mr. Webster died of a disease of the liver, and that the immediate cause of death was hemorrhage from the stomach and bowels, owing to a morbid condition of the blood consequent upon the above disease. There was also dropsy of the abdomen.

DR. PARKER AND MR. BEECHER.—Our readers have doubtless seen allusions to the newspaper controversy between Joel Parker, D. D., of New York, and Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, of Brooklyn—a controversy which is not yet concluded, and the results of which are not likely to reflect much credit on either party. It seems, that in the early editions of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," Mrs. Stowe gave the name of Dr. Parker as holding certain pro-slavery sentiments which she reviewed. Dr. Parker denied holding the sentiments attributed to him, and offerred to satisfy Mrs. S. of her mistake. As there was some delay in attending to the matter, the Doctor commenced, or threatened to commence, a suit for damages, which he laid at $20,000. Finally Mrs. Stowe bec[illegible] satisfied she was wrong, erased the name [illegible] Dr. Parker from her book, and prepared a card of apology and explanation, which she proposed to publish. This was entrusted to her brother, Henry Ward Beecher, to show Dr. Parker, and publish if he was satisfied with it. But it did not exactly suit the D[illegible], and therefore Mr. Beecher wrote two or three notes for Mrs. Stowe and Dr. P., which he and the Doctor considered a better adjustment of the matter. The interview closed without a definite understanding whether these notes should be published. They were sent to Mrs. Stowe, and then returned to New York, and printed with the signatures of Mrs. Stowe and Dr. Parker. Thereupon the latter charged that the signatures were forgeries, and Mr. Beecher printed a long justification of his course. The New York Observer and the Independent have given much space to the controversy, which we deem more amusing than edifying.

European News.

Liverpool dates to Oct. 20th have been received since our last. We give a summary of the news.

The advices are quite favorable commercially. Cotton and Bread-stuffs were still improving, and in good demand. Money was easy.

The Court had returned to London, and a Cabinet Council was held on the 15th Oct., for the purpose of appointing a day for the meeting of Parliament.

A rumor has crept into circulation, that the Government are about to make a movement in favor of extending the franchise, the plan proposed being to impose an income tax on all wages above £1 per week, and to confer votes on the payers of the tax.

The yacht America figures largely in the news of this week. On Tuesday, the 12th, she competed with the Swedish yacht Swerige, and defeated her by fully 20 minutes, the course being round the Nab Light, Isle of Wight; but owing to fog and light winds, the race was not exciting.

The London papers publish the official dispatches brought to the Admiralty by the Prince Albert, but they contain no news of Sir John Franklin.

The whole Russian army has been ordered to go into mourning for the Duke of Wellington.

From France we learn that the President was to make his triumphal entry into the Capital on the 16th. His reception was expected to be a magnificent affair, and preparations at a great outlay of money were being made.

The subscription for the wounded and for the families of those killed in repelling the Lopez Expedition to Cuba, amounts to 281,000 piasters. The widow of General Enna had received 10,000 piasters, and the widow of Francisco Fadal, 6,500.

Disturbances had taken place at Haenga between the citizens and the Police aided by the Austrian troops. Several were killed on both sides.

Twenty-four political prisoners were shot at Sinigolia, Papal States, from the 1st to the 3d October.

Affairs in Burmah remain in statu quo.

We mentioned last week the attempt made against the Shah of Persia. We now learn that Hajee Suleiman Khan, accused as the instigator of the crime, was seized, his body carefully drilled with a knife in parts which would not at the moment cause death; pieces of lighted candles were then introduced into the holes, and, thus illuminated, carried in procession through the bazaar, and finally conveyed to the town gates, and there cleft in twain like a fat ram. The Kurret-il-Ain, better known as Bab's Lieutenant, or the Fair Prophetess of Kazoeen, who since the late religious outbreak had been kept a close prisoner at the capital, has been executed, with some dozen others. His Majesty received three slug wounds in the shoulders, but all of a very slight nature.

California News.

The steamer Georgia, with California news to Oct. 1st, and over two million dollars in gold dust, arrived at New York on the 30th October.

The mining intelligence is very favorable, the yield continuing large.

Several fugitive slaves had been arrested since the recent decision of the Supreme Court, and delivered over to their masters.

Captain Land, of the clipper ship Challenge, died of dysentery, at Whampoa, on the 20th of July.

A great sale of city property (real estate) in San Francisco had taken place, and the prices realized were 50 per cent. over the expectations.

The whaler Huntress, of New Bedford, was totally lost on the coast of Kamschatka. The crew suffered terribly ashore, but were ultimately saved.

The village of White Rock, near Placerville, was destroyed by fire on the 15th Sept.

The immigration is fast coming in, and the reports of sickness and privation on the plains are heart-rending in the extreme. The relief train sent out by the State to their assistance have been guilty of the meanness of selling them food and water.

The health in some portions of the mines is bad. At Burton's Bar, Parks' Bar, and Ousley's Bar, several cases of sporadic cholera have occurred, which have proved fatal.

The Union says there is now on exhibition at the banking house of Mills, Townsend & Co., a lump of gold recently taken out at Downieville, which is one of the largest and handsomest ever found in California. This specimen is nearly pure, and weighs two hundred and four ounces and three dollars! The same firm have also another lump, perfectly pure, which weighs $500, dug near the same spot as the above.

The ship Huntress, Capt. Soule, from San Francisco, bound to Hong Kong, was wrecked on the Maro (coral) Reef, about 700 miles distant from the Sandwich Islands, on the night of the 20th May. The Maro Reef was laid down erroneously on the captain's chart, (a French one,) making a difference in position of 18 miles, in addition to which the set of the current northward put the Huntress about 38 miles out of her reckoning.

The latest dates from Oregon are to the 18th Sept. A new paper has been started at Puget Sound, called The Columbian. Coal has been discovered in large quantities at Puget Sound.

An Oregon paper says: The tide of overland immigration continues to roll into our valleys with increasing rapidity and numbers. This year's immigration is unprecedented in the history of Oregon, both in regard to quantity and quality. In so large an immigration (not less than 10,000, and many say much larger) it is not at all surprising that much suffering is experienced among a portion of them, from the shortness of feed for stock, and scarcity of provisions; and we learn with much regret that some have died and many others suffered from cholera, and other disorders consequent upon the sudden change of diet and the fatigues of so long a journey. Those making the overland journey, however, could not expect it without some hardships, compared with what they have been used to experiencing when at home.

THE NEW YORK CRYSTAL PALACE.—We are indebted to the gentlemanly Secretary of the "Association for the Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations," for the loan of that beautiful cut of the New York Crystal Palace which adorns our fourth page to day. The first column of the Palace was erected on the 30th of October, in the presence of some two thousand citizens, whom the interest of the occasion had drawn together. His Excellency Governor Hunt was in attendance, with a large number of the dignitaries of New York City. Theodore Sedgwick, Esq., President of the Association, delivered an address, in the course of which he read the following letter from Daniel Webster.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, Oct. 12, 1852.

SIR: I have received your favor of Oct. 7, and I have examined with care the papers accompanying it, as well as the sketch of the building which you have been good enough to send; the latter appears to me very beautiful. Your name, and that of the gentlemen associated with you, are sufficient guarantees that the enterprise will be conducted with energy, fidelity and capacity; and there can be no doubt that an exhibition of the kind you contemplate, if properly carried out, will be of very general interest and utility. You do not overrate my desire to promote your views. Of course I cannot, as a member of the Government of the United States, give you any other aid than you have already received from the Customs Department, by making your building a bonded warehouse; but I will write to the representatives of the United States at the principal Courts of Europe, stating to them strongly my sense of the importance of your enterprise, and the numerous reasons in my mind why they should give your agent, Mr. Buscheck, all the aid and support that they properly can.

I am, Sir, with great respect, your ob't serv't.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

RAILROAD ACCIDENT LAST SABBATH.—A sad accident occurred last Sabbath (Saturday) from the breaking of a rail on the Springfield and Hartford Railroad, at the Canal Bridge, Windsor Locks. The train left New Haven with four passenger cars, and had just passed the village of Windsor Locks, approaching the bridge over the canal, where the track is laid on the bank of the canals. When the fourth or last car was thrown up, it disconnected with the third car, and rolled over into the canal, landing right side up, some fifteen feet from the bank. The third car was thrown from the track by the sudden jerk. Its forward truck turned round under the car, and the last truck of the second car was also torn off and brought back under the third. The train thus progressed, and passed the bridge, leaving not a sleeper on the bridge nor a rail not thrown out of location. It thus went some fifty feet, and when it stopped the third car was tipped toward the canal, so that another revolution of the engine must have thrown it in with its whole load of passengers.

In the fourth car, which was thrown into the canal, there were some 15 or 20 passengers. Two of them, brothers, named James and Daniel Billington, of South Kingston, R. I., had just returned from California, and were hurrying home, to surprise their wives; they were both killed. Mr. Joseph Whitney, of Boston, had an arm broken, and was otherwise injured. Gen. James Palmer, of New Haven, Chief Engineer of the "Air Line Railroad," was injured, and from what we can ascertain, most seriously of those who survive. Rev. Mr. Clark, of Uxbridge, was severely bruised in the hip and face, and thoroughly drenched. Mr. and Mrs. R. S. Munn, of Monson, were among those somewhat severely injured. The great wonder is, that no more lives were lost.

THE CHINESE IN CALIFORNIA.—A letter from Rev. J. L. Shuck, announcing his intention of returning to this country by way of San Francisco, and of spending a month at that place to learn the prospects for missionary labor in California, says:—

"Depend upon it, God is going to bring something good out of this vast emigration of Chinese to the United States. The churches will not send Missionaries to the heathen, and the Lord Jehovah is sending the heathen to the Missionaries. May we not hope that some of these heathen may become truly converted, and return as teachers and preachers to their own people. You must not be surprised if I bring you a request to take up your abode in California. China and California will soon be linked together by ocean steamers."

RAILROAD ACCIDENT.—The following account is given of a crash which occurred recently on the Postage Railroad:—

Adams & Co.'s Express car, heavily freighted, ascended Plane 8, and on arriving at the crest of the plane, which is 1,200 yards long, a car unhitched and descended with fearful rapidity. The alarm was communicated to the foot of the plane in time for the passengers in two of the cars below to escape the collision, but the third car was filled with ladies, who were unable to get out before the descending car reached the foot. The engineer of the locomotive was ordered to reverse the engine, which he did promptly, thus starting at a flying rate the car containing the ladies. The engineer now became alarmed himself, and jumped off, leaving the locomotive and passenger car dashing along the level toward Plane 9. Fortunately, the car became detached, permitting the locomotive to plunge down No. 9, by which it was demolished. When the Express car struck the baggage car, the force was so great as to demolish both, and the goods were scattered in every direction. But one person was materially injured. He had his ankle broken.

FACTS ABOUT OREGON.—Under date of Oregon City, August 11, 1852, Hezekiah Johnson writes to the American Baptist as follows:—

"The soil of Oregon is generally good; yet I do not believe that it is as rich as some of the prairie soil of Illinois. The climate is mild, and the general health of the country is good. Our winters are generally warm and rainy; yet we sometimes have several days—and once since I came to this country we had three or four weeks—of tolerably cold weather during winter. Potatoes that lay near the top of the ground were frozen; those that lay a little deeper, were about half frozen; those that lay deepest, were not frozen at all. It does not rain near all the time during the winter. The rains are often light. We generally have occasional showers during the spring—also, in the fore part of June. Perhaps as often as every other year, we have a shower about the fourth of July, and rarely in August. It is now rainy, and raining. The face of the country being rough, the water is good, and water power is abundant."

SUMMARY.

The Montreal Fire Relief Committee have just issued their second report. The total number of houses destroyed by the great fire of July 8 was 1,112, of which the aggregate assessed rental was $81,896; the number of families rendered houseless, 1,825, containing an aggregate of 9,042 persons. The number of Catholics who have received relief is 5,272, and the amount received is $16,524; the number of Protestants relieved 947, and the amount they received was $4,662. There were at the date of the report, 17th, 565 persons receiving rations of soup, oatmeal and bread. The total amount expended by the Committee was $58,120.

A private letter from Troy, Indiana, gives the particulars of a shocking murder which was perpetrated recently on the trading-boat Eliza, No. 2, near Thompson's Ferry. Upon an examination of the boat, the floor and bedclothes were found to be spotted with blood. The river was subsequently dragged, when three dead bodies were recovered, with their heads split open and iron weights tied to them. In the boat several trunks were found, rifled of their contents. The perpetators of the foul deed are unknown.

Drafts to the amount of $1,966,716 28, drawn by the Treasurer of the United States, and transmitted from Washington to New Orleans, have not been received. There were four altogether, in favor of P. H. Raiferd, Indian Agent, and drawn on the warrant of Department of the Interior, No. 3,574. The amount and numbers of the drafts were as follows: No. 3,757, $500,000; No. 3,758, $233,358 14; No. 3,759, $200,000; No. 3,760, $1,033,358 14.

The whale ship George Howland, which was seized some time since by convicts at Gallipagos Island, arrived at New Bedford, Oct. 27. Capt. Crowell, W. B. Peacock, and two officers, the only persons that originally belonged to the ship's company, have returned in the G. H. Three of the crew died of starvation and exposure. The remainder of the crew were taken from Charles Island by the ships Congaree and Susan, both of New Bedford.

We learn from the Daily Wisconsin, of Milwaukie, that since the completion of the Mississippi and Milwuakie railroad to Whitewater (51 miles) the receipts have averaged about $700 per day. Twenty-one miles more will reach to Janesville, which will be finished by the latter part of December next at farthest. This will make 72 miles of Road at a cost of about $1,200,000.

There is now only eleven miles of track to lay to complete the entire line of Lake Shore road from Cleveland to Buffalo, and if no delay occurs in receipt of iron, this gap will be filled by the 10th of November. The interval is now filled by stages, and trains are run regularly over the Road.

Accounts from Shanghae, to Aug. 16, report that the ship Hoogly, from San Francisco for that port in running up the river Aug. 11, during a south-east gale, struck on the North Bank, and became almost immediately a wreck. The Hoogley was a fine vessel, valued at $60,000, and is insured.

The fact is a curious one, and may be interesting to some of our readers, that large quantities of peach stones are imported, principally from France, notwithstanding the vast quantities grown in this country. The reason is, we eat the peaches, and throw away the stones. Another reason is, getting plants from foreign seed, free of disease. But as these are all budded from home-grown trees, we do not see how the importation of seed can prevent the yellows, when the tree is grown from the bud.

The Boa Constrictor.

The ground color of the body of the great boa, which is the largest and strongest of the serpent race, is yellowish gray, on which is distributed, along the back, a series of large, chain-like, reddish brown, and sometimes perfectly red variations, with other small and more irregular marks and spots.

The great boa is frequently from twenty-five to thirty feet in length, and of a proportionate thickness. The rapacity of these creatures is often their own destruction; for whenever they seize and swallow their prey, they seem like surfeited gluttons, unwieldly, stupid, helpless, and sleepy. They at the same time seek for some retreat, where they may lurk for several days together, and digest their meal in safety. The smallest effort will then destroy them; they scarcely can make any resistance; and, equally unqualified for flight or opposition, even the naked Indians do not fear to assail them. But it is otherwise when this sleeping interval of digestion is over; they then issue, with famished appetites, from their retreats, and with accumulated terrors, while every animal of the forest flies from their presence. One of them has been known to kill and devour a buffalo. Having darted upon the affrighted beast, (says the narrator.) the serpent instantly began to wrap him round with its voluminous twistings; and at every twist the bones of the buffalo were heard to crack as loud as the report of a gun. It was in vain the animal struggled and bellowed; its enormous enemy entwined it so closely, that at length all its bones were crushed to pieces, like those of a malefactor on the wheel, and the whole body was reduced to one uniform mass; the serpent then untwined its folds, in order to swallow its prey at leisure. To prepare for this, and also to make it slip down the throat more smoothly, it was seen to lick the whole body over, and thus to cover it with a mucillaginous substance. It then began to swallow it, at the end that offered the least resistance; in the act of swallowing, the throat suffered so great a dilation that it took in at once a substance that was thrice its own thickness.

This animal inhabits India, Africa, and South America. With respect to their conformation, all serpents have a very wide mouth, in proportion to the size of the head; and what is very extraordinary, they can gape and swallow the head of another animal which is three times as big as their own. To explain this, it must be observed, that the jaws of this animal do not open as ours, in the manner of a pair of hinges, where bones are applied to bones, and play upon one another; on the contrary, the serpent's jaws are held together at the roots by an elastic muscular skin; by which means they open as widely as the animal chooses to stretch them, and admit of a prey much thicker than the snake's own body. The throat, like stretching leather, dilates to admit the morsel; the stomach receives it in part; and the rest remains in the gullet, till putrefaction and the juices of the serpent's body unite to dissolve it. Look to your Orchards.

As soon as the first symptom of failure in old orchards appears, they should, in addition to good cultivation, be freely manured in connection with the application of lime or leached ashes. The change which may be thus wrought, can hardly be understood by one who has not witnessed the result. The following experiment, similar in nature, but differing in the mode of performance, described by H. W. Rockwell, of Utica, New York, cannot fail to be interesting.

The experiment was performed upon three trees standing on my ground, none of which were less than thirty years old. One of these trees, an old fashioned Newton Pippin, and a great favorite, had borne moderately; the other two made out between them to 'get up' about a dozen apples a year, just to let me know, I presume, that they 'could do it,' but were perfectly indifferent how it was done.

I last summer undertook the renovation of these trees. For this purpose, I opened between them trenches, say ten feet in length, two feet in depth, and about eight feet equally distant from tree to tree. The roots, which were once united in their operation, were, of course, all cut off, the trenches filled with well-rotted manure, and closed. I finished by giving each of the trees about a peck of charcoal, mixed with the same quantity of ashes; and now for the result. I have this year gathered from the 'two outcasts' just mentioned, instead of my annual dividend of a dozen apples, from 6 to 8 bushels a piece, as handsome fruit as you ever saw, with about the same proportion from the third, which has always been a moderate bearer.

Transplanting Trees.

All trees, except peach, apricot, nectarine, and all other similar sorts, should be transplanted in the autumn or late fall. By choosing this season of the year the trees may be stripped of leaves, and thus the great surfaces for evaporation will be removed. The body of the tree, by this treatment, may retain its moisture, not losing it by the active powers of growing leaves. This gives the roots an opportunity to establish themselves, and to retain the moisture received by simple absorption before the formation of spongioles, which draw water by the natural laws governing the action of plants. Such trees planted out in the spring would be parting with large amounts of moisture from surfaces of leaves, before the roots were sufficiently established in their new location to supply the necessary amount to compensate for evaporation. The slightest drying of a tree, at the time of transplanting, is likely to interfere with its organism, and to give rise to after unhealthy habits. When large supplies of water are at hand, it is well to settle the earth around the roots by its use, as this causes the particles of earth to come in direct contact with the roots, and to get up a condition of the soil more closely resembling that from which the tree has been removed. It is impossible by pounding or stamping to settle earth as judiciously as by the use of water.

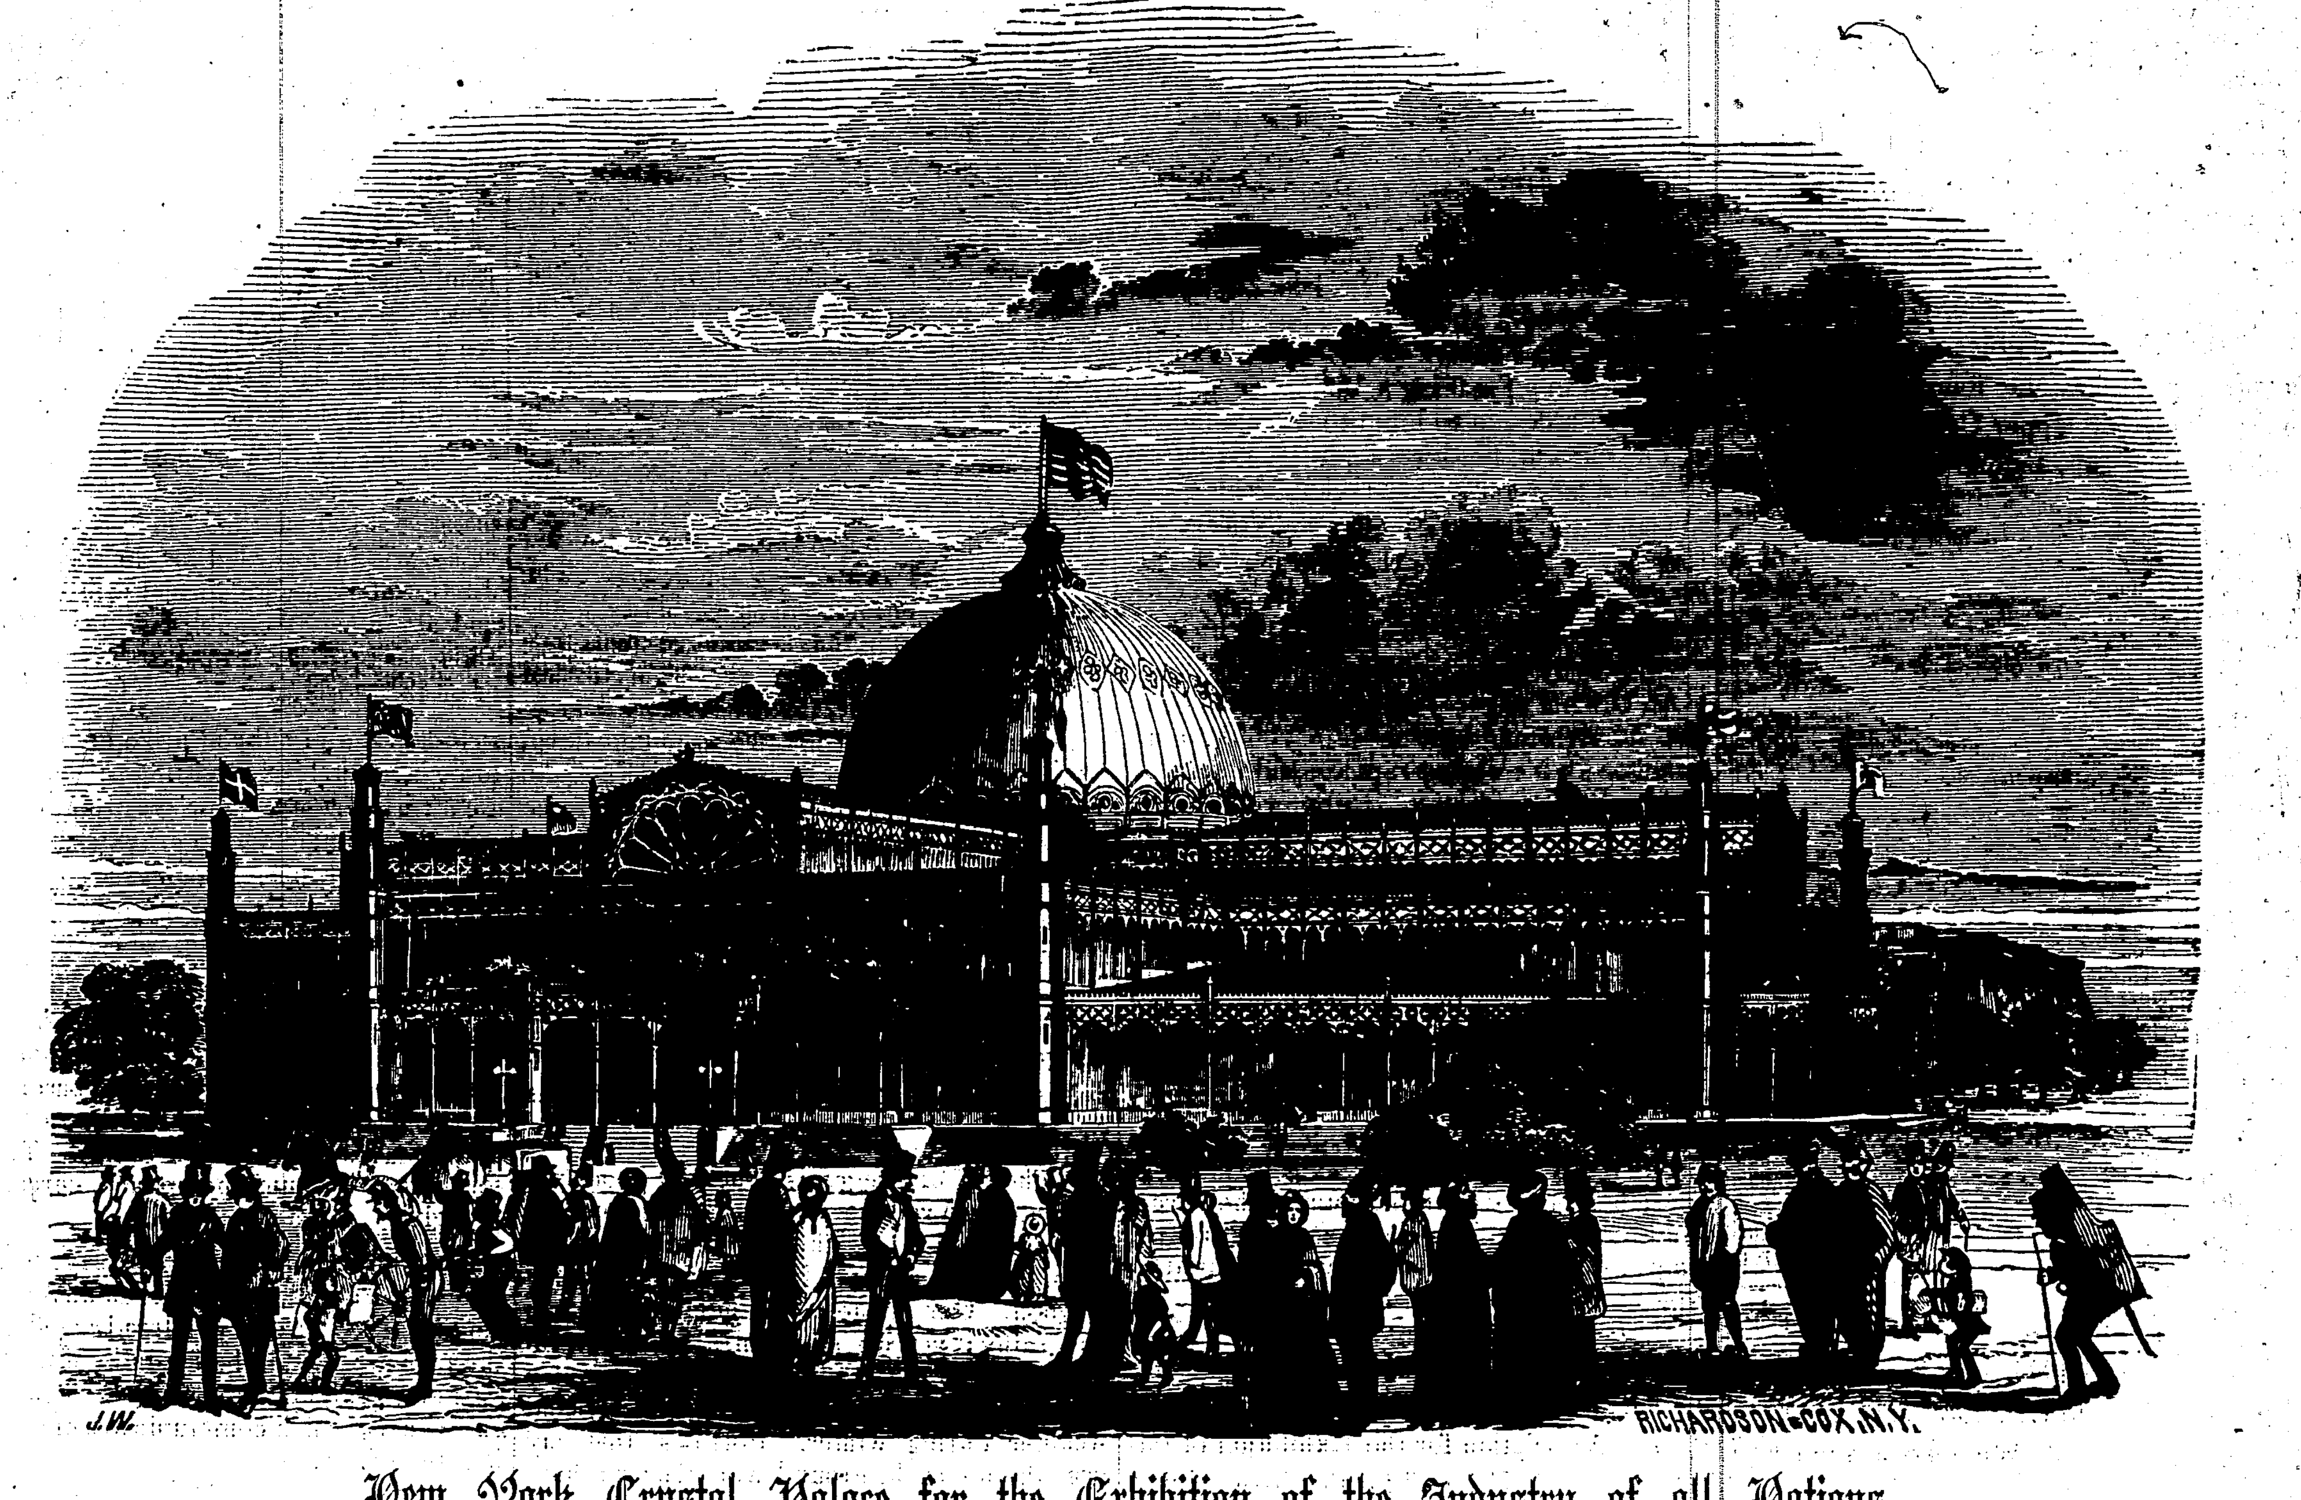
Mr. Joshua Bates, of the firm of Baring Brothers & Co., of London, has written a letter to Mayor Seaver, of Boston, offering to supply the new public Library of that City with books to the amount of $50,000. One condition only attends the gift. It is "that the building shall be such as shall be an ornament to the city—that there shall be room for one hundred and fifty persons to sit at reading tables—that it shall be perfectly free to all, with no other restrictions than may be necessary for the preservance of the books."



New York Crystal Palace for the Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations.

Above is a wood engraving of the elevation of the building now erecting on Reservoir Square, in the city of New York, for the purposes of an Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations, or, as it is more familiarly termed, a Crystal Palace, or World's Fair; and it is proper to preface a description of the edifice by a statement of the general organization of the enterprise.

The prodigious success of the London Exhibition turned the minds of the industrial world to the propriety and expediency of repetitions of that effort in different parts of Europe. Thus, there has already been one in Austria; the same has been done in Ireland; and preparations are making for one on a very extensive scale in Paris in the year 1854.

It was very natural that those citizens of the United States who were in London in the summer of 1851, and who saw and felt the gratifying triumphs that our people achieved during that year, and who also saw the peculiarly popular character of expositions of this kind, and their beneficial tendencies in regard to the working classes, should early have entertained the idea of repeating the Exhibition on this side of the water. Accordingly, shortly after the close of the London Fair, steps were taken for the purpose.

The form of our political system, and the Constitutional restrictions imposed on our State and Federal action, rendered it impossible that the affair should be, as it was in England, taken up and carried on by Government; and it therefore became necessary to rely on individual enterprise and activity.

New York, the commercial metropolis of the Union, was naturally selected for the spot; and on the 2d day of January, 1852, the municipal authorities of that city, perceiving the immense benefits that must flow from such an enterprise, if properly conducted, not only to the commerce and prosperity of the city, but to the cause of popular instruction and of healthful entertainment, granted a lease of Reservoir Square for the object.

The Legislature was then applied to, and that body, on the 11th of March, granted a Charter of Incorporation to the Association for the Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations.

The principal provisions were as follows:

The Association was incorporated with a capital of two hundred thousand dollars, leave being given to raise the same to three hundred thousand dollars.

They were authorized to occupy any real estate that might be granted them, and thereon to erect a building for the purpose of the Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations. They were further empowered to award Prizes, and to do every thing necessary to carry out the general object.

On the 17th of March, Mr. Theodore Sedgwick was elected President, and Mr. William Whetten, Secretary.

The main features of the building are as follows: It is, with the exception of the floor, entirely constructed of iron and glass. The general idea of the edifice is a Greek cross, surmounted by a dome at the intersection. Each diameter of the cross will be 365 feet 5 inches long. There will be three similar entrances: one on the Sixth Avenue, one on Fortieth, and one on Forty-second street. Each entrance will be 47 feet wide, and that on the Sixth Avenue will be approached by a flight of eight steps; over each front is a large, semi-circular fan-light, 41 feet wide and 21 feet high, answering to the arch of the nave. Each arm of the cross is on the ground plan 149 feet broad. This is divided into a central nave and two aisles, one on each side; the nave 41 feet wide, each aisle 54 feet wide. The central portion or nave is carried up to the height of 67 feet, and the semi-circular arch by which it is spanned is 41 feet broad. There are thus in effect two arched naves crossing each other at right angles, 41 feet broad, 67 feet high to the crown of the arch, and 365 feet long; and on each side of these naves is an aisle 54 feet broad, and 45 feet high. The exterior of the ridgeway of the nave is 71 feet. Each aisle is covered by a gallery of its own width, and 24 feet from the floor. The central dome is 100 feet in diameter, 68 feet inside from the floor to the spring of the arch, and 118 feet to the crown; and on the outside, with the lantern, 149 feet. The exterior angles of the building are ingeniously filled up with a triangular lean-to 24 feet high, which gives the ground plan an octagonal shape, each side or face being 149 feet wide. At each angle is an octagonal tower 8 feet in diameter and 75 feet high.

Four large and eight winding stair-cases connect the principal floor with the gallery, which opens on the three balconies that are situated over the entrance-halls, and afford ample space for flower decorations, statues, vases, etc. The four principal staircases consist of two flights of steps with two landing places to each; the eight winding staircases are placed in the octagonal towers, which lead also to small balconies on the tops of the towers and to the roof of the building.

The building contains on the ground floor 111,000 square feet of space, and in its galleries, which are 54 feet wide, 62,000 square feet more, making a total area of 173,000 square feet for the purposes of exhibition. There are thus on the ground floor two acres and a half, or exactly 2 52-100; in the galleries one acre and 44-100; total, within an inconsiderable fraction, four acres.

There are on the ground floor 190 octagonal cast-iron columns, 21 feet above the floor, and 8 inches in diameter, cast hollow, of different thicknesses, from half an inch to one inch. These columns receive the cast iron girders. These are 26½ feet long and 3 feet high, and serve to sustain the galleries and the wrought-iron construction of the roof, as well as to brace the whole structure in every direction. The girders, as well as the second story columns, are fastened to the columns in the first story, by connecting pieces of the same octagonal shape as the columns, 3 feet 4 inches high, having proper flanges and lugs to fasten all pieces together by bolts. The number of lower floor girders is 252, besides 12 wrought-iron girders of the same height, and 41 feet span over a part of the nave. The second story contains 148 columns, of the same shape as those below, and 17 feet 7 inches high. These receive another tier of girders, numbering 160, for the support of the roofs of the aisles, each nave being covered by 16 cast-iron semi-circular arches, each composed of 4 pieces.

The dome is supported by 24 columns, which go up above the second story to a height of 62 feet above the floor, and support a combination of wrought-iron arches and girders, on which rests a cast iron bed plate, so constructed as to receive the 32 ribs of the dome. The light is communicated to the dome through the lantern, as well as from the sides, on which 32 escutcheons, in colored glass, representing the Arms of the Union and its several States, or the emblems of the different nations, form a part of the decoration.

The quantity of iron to be used for the building will amount to about 1,250 tons. The roof will cover an area of 144,000 square feet. The glass for the building will amount to 39,000 square feet, in 9,027 panes, 16 by 34 or 38 inches.

On entering this building, the observer's eye will be greeted by the vista of an arched nave, 41 feet wide, 67 feet high, and 365 feet long; while, on approaching the center, he will find himself under a dome 100 feet across, and 118 feet high.

It is certain, therefore, that the edifice will be larger, and more effective in its interior view, than any thing in the country.

The aspect of the building will be entirely different from that of the London Crystal Palace. Its form affords the requisite scope for a pleasing variety of architectural embellishment, by which all monotony can be avoided, and allows a very economical use of the ground. The rising dome, independent of its effect in the interior arrangement of the edifice, will give height and majesty.

The following are the objects which the architects have striven to combine in their plan:—

1. The greatest possible interior area.
2. Perfect safety and elegance of construction.
3. A well calculated and pleasing admission of light.
4. A variety of coup d'œil in the interior.

Such is the building which will soon salute the eyes of the city of New York. In asserting that it will be the largest and most beautiful construction in the country, nothing has been said more then it deserves. But this is its least merit. The objects to which the building is destined form its real recommendation.

There is offered here to the European and domestic producer an unequalled opportunity of displaying the works of his skill, without any charge from the time that they enter the building till withdrawn. The Association have already made public the fact, that their object is Exhibition alone, and that they have no interest whatever, direct or indirect, in the final disposition to be made of articles displayed. They thus avoid coming in conflict with any branch of regular industry. There will be gathered here the choicest products of the luxury of the Old World, and the most cunning devices of the ingenuity of the New. The interests of Manufacture, Commerce, and the Arts, will all find encouragement and protection within these walls, and another guarantee will be given to the permanence of peace. Here will be collected multitudes of all nations; but the great and crowning feature of the enterprise is, that it will offer amusement and recreation to the working classes, such as they can find no where else; that it will be a PALACE FOR THE PEOPLE.

The exhibition is already announced to open on the 2d of May, 1853.

Remarkable Feat of an Engine-Man.

A Paris correspondent of the Washington Republic relates the following occurrence as having taken place on the French Northern Railroad:—

"The passengers upon the Northern Railroad narrowly escaped destruction some days ago. A large cart, laden down by the weight of an enormous block of stone, had become fastened in among the rails, and the efforts of the three horses to disengage it were perfectly unavailing. The whistle of the express train was heard in the distance. The wagoner, determined to save his horses at least, cut the reins and the harness, and made off. The engineer saw the obstacle, reversed the steam, and gave the signal for the brakes. But the engine, which was a Crampton, refused to obey, and the machinist saw the utter impossibility of stopping it in time, so he put on the steam again, and drove the train with full force upon the terrible obstacle. The wagon was shivered to atoms, and the stone sent flying in splinters for rods in all directions. The train was not thrown off the track, and the passengers were unaware of any shock. They did not hear of the danger they had run till they stopped at the next station. The engine was battered, but its vitality was not decreased. The engineer, whose coolness and decision saved the passengers, is a Pole, and will be the object of some tribute of gratitude from the company."

AN OLD HOUSE IN VIRGINIA.—The Norfolk (Va.) Herald gives the following anecdote relative to an old house recently pulled down in that city:—

"In this house a shocking tragedy occurred in 1806. Two gamblers, brothers, of the name of Daving, rented the third story for the purpose of keeping a pharo table. One night, an Italian, whose name we believe was Colmini, (Coalminer, as he was commonly called,) visited this establishment, and meeting with extraordinary luck, finally broke the bank. The Davings, and another of their fraternity, charged him with cheating; he protested his innocence, but it was to no purpose. They attempted to seize him, but he broke from them and fled down the narrow dark stairway, all three in close pursuit. On the second landing, he stepped aside unperceived, and as each passed him on the right, in the dark, he gave him a fatal stab with a stiletto in the left side, and a push down the next flight. The two Davings were mortally wounded, and died within 24 hours; their companion lingered several weeks, and died also. The Italian escaped."

A FRIDAY ITEM.—An old ship-carpenter, of long experience in our navy, tells us that the steam-frigate Powhatan is a notable instance of the fallacy of the old saying, that ships which sail on a Friday never get to port. The blocks for the Powhatan were laid on Friday, her keel was laid on Friday, she was raised on Friday, was launched on Friday, her masts were taken in on Friday, her heavy machinery put up on Friday, her trial trip (undertaken on Thursday, but failed) was accomplished on Friday, she left Norfolk on her first cruise on Friday, and has sailed from many other ports on Friday. Here are Fridays enough to sink a whole Navy, if Jack's superstitions had proved realities; but, on the contrary, the Powhatan (so far as we know) has been a very lucky ship.

POCKET PICKING.—They have queer pick-pockets in Virginia, judging from the following paragraph in the Stanton Spectator: "A few days since, while Mr. Francis Bell was engaged in dividing and weighing cattle, a lot of colts approached his coat, which was hanging on the fence, and abstracted a pocket-book, containing a large sum of money. When Mr. Bell discovered the robbery, the colts were busily engaged masticating the precious provender, which was scattered all over the ground. Upon counting the notes left, one hundred and fifty dollars were missing, while a large amount was so mutilated as to render its value doubtful. This is the most costly species of food which has been used since the days of Cleopatra, who with immortal folly dissolved a pearl of extreme value, and drank it at a draught."

A DOG STORY.—The Cincinnati Citizen tells the following dog story: "Yesterday we noticed one of the most singular displays of canine sagacity we ever saw. Mr. Baldwin offered a wager of $5 that he would start his Newfoundland dog from the wharf-boat, send him over the river to Blake's Hotel, and that the dog would return with a handkerchief which Mr. B. had left in his bed-room. The bet was taken, and the dog plunged into the water, swam across, and made quick time up the leeve on the other side. In a short time he again made his appearance, running toward the river; he jumped in and swam back to the foot of Walnut-st., with the pocket-handkerchief in his mouth. He was absent from the wharf-boat only 25 minutes. The loser readily handed over the $5 bill, and declared that he had never expected to see such a feat."

AN INCIDENT FOR ANOTHER "UNCLE TOM'S CABIN."—As the slave hunters were arresting the fugitives from slavery, on the Mad River dock, one of them seized hold of a young woman with an infant child, eight or nine months old in her arms. She jerked loose from him, ran some steps, threw the child upon the ground, and returned toward the slave-catcher. She was seized and marched toward the Mayor's office. The child was picked up by one of our citizens. One of the Kentuckians claimed to be the owner. Mr. B. refused to give up the child without evidence. The infant was taken to the mother, who, supposing herself doomed again to slavery, disowned it—denied in the most positive terms that it was her child. To own her offspring was to doom the child to slavery; to disown and desert it, she hoped, was to allow the dearest treasure of her heart to grow up, breathing the air of freedom. For this she stood nobly ready to dismember the ties of such affection as a mother only knows, and leave to chance, or other hands, the rearing of the infant, dearer than life itself. Truly a mother's love, though an ignorant and uncultivated slave mother,

> "Lives before life, with death dies not, but seems
> The very substance of immortal dreams."

"I was traveling," says M. Blaze, "in a diligence. At the place where we changed horses I saw a good-looking poodle dog, which came to the coach door and sat upon his two hind legs with the air of one begging for something. 'Give him a sou,' said the postillion to me, 'and you will see what he will do with it.' I threw to him the coin; he picked it up, ran to the baker's and brought back a piece of bread, which he ate. The dog had belonged to a poor blind man, lately dead; he had no master, and begged alms on his own account."

The Massachusetts Plowman gives the measurement of four apple trees set five years ago, when three years from the bud. The soil was of quite moderate fertility. Their present circumference, one foot from the ground, is fifteen inches each. This rapid growth is owing to careful transplanting, mulching with straw manure and peat, washing the stems with potash lye, and keeping the ground in good tillage.

His late Majesty, when Prince of Wales, was looking out of a window with Tom Sheridan, when the "Dart," with four gray horses passed by. "Is not that a handsome coach, Tom?" observed the Prince. "Yes, your highness," replied Tom, who was suffering under a headache from the champagne of the previous night, and rather in a sombre and meditative humor, "it is; but," continued he, pointing to a hearse going by at the same time, "that's the coach after all."

Fuel of on excellent quality can be grown quicker, easier, and cheaper from peach stones than from any other mode within our knowledge. From this source the settlers upon the western prairies might furnish themselves within three or four years with a constant supply; while the fruit, if it had no other value, would fatten their pork cheaper than it can be done by corn, even in that cheap corn-growing region.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

MOTHERLOVE.

BY WILLIAM M. FAHNESTOCK, M. D.

Who can fathom, who can portray, a mother's love? It has no similitude on earth. It assimilates to a Divine attribute; and the poet, Quarles, was happy in selecting a mother's fondness and a mother's solicitude, to illustrate the grace and the long-forbearance of our heavenly Father toward his frail, unstable children—a thought not only truly beautiful, but philosophical, and better calculated than a thousand pages of polemic theology, to solve the mooted question of "perseverance," or "lapsing," which has agitated the Church for ages; so beautiful, so philosophical, and so conclusive to my mind, that I am tempted to insert it, in the hope that it may prove as satisfactory to other minds as it has done to my own on this vexed subject:—

"Even as a nurse, whose child's imperfect pace
Can hardly lead his foot from place to place,
Leaves her fond kissing, sets him down to go,
Nor does uphold him for a step or two;
But when she finds that he begins to fall,
She holds him up, and kisses him withal;
So God from man sometimes withdraws his hand
Awhile, to teach his infant faith to stand,
But when He sees his feeble strength begin
To fail, He gently takes him up again."

Who can describe Motherlove? What the unfortunate Miss Landon said of woman's love, generally, in "The Troubadour," may be said with equal or greater propriety, specifically, of Motherlove:—

"There is a feeling in the heart
Of woman, which can have no part
In man; a self-devotedness,
As victims round their idols press,
And asking nothing, but to show
How for their zeal and faith can go"

Who, I ask again, can penetrate the deep recesses of Motherlove? Who can fathom the gushing fountains of Motherheart, which are unceasingly welling forth refreshing streams of life-spirit—revivifying founts of undying vitality? Who can? Who? Echo answers—Who? Who? The paucity of the English language in expressing this principle, in the possessive case, or in the adjective instead of the substantive form, weakens the force of the sentiment, as well as the expression, and therefore, instead of employing the usual epithets, mother's love, or maternal affection, I am driven to employ a literal rendering of two very significant German terms, far more expressive to nature and to truth—"Mutterliebe," Motherlove; and "Mutterherz," Motherheart. Ages would be too short to tell what is embraced in that one talismanic word, Motherlove; and it would prove an endless task for the writer to attempt to illustrate it fully, or to portray it in any manner commensurate with its importance, or its influence on the human race, in a single article, or in a score of them. There is not only a natural feeling in Motherlove, but a holy devotion, which approximates to a religious reality; and as like produces like, in most cases, we generally find, where it has been properly exercised, a corresponding response in the offspring. Happy the mother who exercises it, and happy the child who recognizes it.

What in life is more beautiful than this reciprocation of parental love and filial piety? The terms piety and pious, now used constantly, and almost exclusively, to designate religious devotion, originally meant filial regard—the affection of a child to a father. They may be, still, used in reference to devotion to our heavenly Father, but they are improperly used, at least in the original acceptation of the terms, when applied to a devout person, as a person devoted to any religious good. The words devout and devoted would be much more appropriate in this sense than pious and piety, although usage may consecrate words, as it does erroneous customs and erroneous practices. Dr. Epps, of London, many years since, pointed out, in his Horæ Phrenologicæ, the difference between piety and religion; and it is a sad pity that it is not better understood by the present generation.

But I am in danger, as I frequently find myself, of running into an essay, when I take up my pen simply to relate an anecdote, which is my present purpose—a touching anecdote of a plain, obscure mother, whose intense interest in her absent sons has, recently, excited and affected my sympathy to an unusual degree, and has confirmed an impression on my mind, which I have often expressed in my intercourse with all classes of society, namely, that no person understands, correctly, what is the depth of a parent's love for a child, nor what the obligations due to parental affection are, until they themselves become parents.

For some time past—three or four months—as I have regularly entered the Post-Office at eight o'clock in the evening, as is my custom, I have observed a plain, unobtrusive Irish woman, seated in one corner, patiently awaiting the arrival of the mail, night after night; and she is there, I am informed, for an hour or two in advance of the arrival of the train. A short time since, I tarried a little longer, than to receive my letters and packages, and after the other persons present were attended to, she modesty approached the Post Master, and inquired "whether there was a letter for her from her boys?" And as the same answer, "No," which she had nightly received for more than three months, was returned to her interrogation, tears coursed rapidly down her cheeks, as she passed out the door, and I followed her, to ascertain the cause of her anxiety and distress.

I shall not trust myself with the details of the poor woman's manner, nor the full history of her grief, lest I should be suspected of penning a fiction, but shall sum up all in the statement of a few facts. Like many of the poor emigrants and exiles from the Emerald Isle, after reaching our shores, have to be separated and live apart, so with this poor woman. She had two sons—her all in the world—and good sons they were to her; but to better themselves they left her in June last, for a time, to take a more desirable job on Staten Island. They arrived at their place of destination in due time, of which they advised their mother, and went to work industriously. The place of their work was near the scene of the disaster which happened to the Bridge or Draw, leading to the Steamboat, on the fourth of July, which precipitated into the water, crushed and drowned, a number of persons never fully ascertained; and her sons are supposed to have been at the spot, as they were keeping the holiday. Since that time she has not heard a single word from them, or of them, and strong apprehensions, nay, there is every reason to believe, that they both perished on that occasion. Her confidence of hearing from them, if living, and her anxiety to learn their fate, is the secret of her repeated and prolonged visits, night after night, whatever the weather may be, to the Post-Office; and then as often, disappointed, retires again in despair, and wends her way to the outer suburbs of the borough, to wait, in her dreary abode, the revolution of another tedious twenty-four hours, to meet another like disappointment.

What but Motherlove would manifest such devotion, and such perseverance, under such discouraging circumstances? What will not Motherlove endure for her offspring? What is like unto it? It is a coin that cannot be counterfeited. Woman may love—her love may be either affection, or interest, and it may pass for pure love, and go undetected—but no woman can put on the attribute of Motherlove, without having Motherlove, in its highest degree, within her.

This is forcibly illustrated in Solomon's judgment between the two women, each of whom claimed the same child as her own; and when the testimony was so strong, and both parties continued so unyielding, that he proposed to divide the child, with a sword, and give "half to one, and half to the other," the crisis proved the mother. "Then spake the woman whose the living child was, for her bowels yearned upon her son, and said, O my lord, give her the living child, and in no wise slay it. But the other said, Let it be neither mine nor thine, but divide it. Then the King answered and said, Give her the living child, and in no wise slay it; she is the mother thereof." 1 Kings 3:26, 27. Herein was the impostor betrayed, and the mother established. Motherlove is the most unselfish love in existence. It will make more sacrifices and endure more wrongs than any other love among the human species.

We have this peculiar emanation of divinity exhibited to our view every day, and almost every hour of the day, in some beautiful form—some new and almost celestial form—not only in the refined and polished circles of high life, but often, yea, oftener, in the rudest states of society. Since the foregoing sketch was penned, the writer has had to make a hasty trip to the city of Philadelphia, and on entering the Cars, with some female friends, our attention was attracted, simultaneously, to a remarkably homely, masculine woman, facing us, two or three seats distant. Her face was a harsh and revolting face, which looked more like an Amazon or a Cannibal, than as belonging to civilized life, and particularly to the gentler sex; but we were scarcely seated than the Motherlove was manifested so strikingly, and so beautifully, that all our unpleasant impressions of her vanished in a moment, and an admiration succeeded, immediately, as simultaneously. She had a son of thirteen or fourteen years of age with her, who left his seat, and took a place at the side door, to look out on the scenery of the Delaware. His position was secure, standing some distance from the door, now partly open, while he took the precaution to brace himself with one hand on the door, secured in its place by his foot, and the other hand firmly fixed against the casement. A father would have considered it a laudable curiosity, and secure enough; or, if he did not think so, would have directed him to leave the place, or have commanded him to be seated. Not so with a mother. The harsh, masculine features of the mother were soon observed to relax into a pleasant expression of anxious concern and tender solicitude, and, stepping up to him, gently said: "My, son, I am afraid that you may be in danger here." "No, mother," he replied, and continued in his position. A father, unquestionably, would have been satisfied, or have taken him to a seat, but, Mother-like, there she stood, a little back of him, with her eye riveted on him, and almost every instant her hand was seen extended towards his arm, without touching it, lest it should mortify him; but for miles there she stood, watching intently, and extending one, and sometimes both hands, to support him, if necessary, while the Cars were running at their highest speed. There was the mother; and during many years of much travel and considerable analysis of human expression, never have I witnessed so great a metamorphosis of a countenance, as the one I first observed on entering the Car, when it was stern and unconcerned, and the one of interest and benignity hers maintained during the whole of her tender vigil over her boy. What is Motherlove? Who can fathom it?

The most distinguished persons, of almost all ages and all countries, who have arrived to any eminence in Science or Politics, and more especially in Morals and Religion, ascribe much of the character and renown they have acquired, to the influence of their mothers; yet none in so beautiful and so touching a manner as the learned Bouilly, and the excellent Lamartine of France. Bouilly, distinguished for his erudition as well as his delicate taste, inscribes his fourth volume devoted to the gentler sex—"Tales for Mothers"—to the "Memory of his Departed Mother," in such chaste and tender accents, as to tell, at once, the exalted worth of that mother, and the living reward of that devotion to her excellent son—a tribute not only worthy of his high intellect, but of the unblemished purity of his heart.

"The flowers I placed upon thy tomb seven years since, at the village, (Rochecorbon, near Tours, on the bank of the Loire,) where thy mortal remains are deposited, are each month renewed by pious hands. This soothing remembrance is my proudest patrimony; it proves, far more than words could do, what thou wast, and what I owe to thee!

"I now dedicate to thy revered memory the fourth work which has been inspired by the tender and respectful attachment I bear to that sex of which thou wert, at once, the glory and the model. Who better than a son of thine, deserves to become the friend of woman? May the labors I have devoted to them, render my tomb worthy of a garland; and above all, may I descend to it supported by that celestial strength, that tranquillity of mind, with which thou, in thy last hour, wert favored, repeating to my daughter those consolatory words addressed by thee to me, at our separation: Behold how peacefully those die, who have endeavored to do good."

Lamartine, the graceful, gentle Lamartine, while he has been no less distinguished for his superior talents, has been equally renowned for his devotion to the memory of his mother. By no writer, of any language, or any age, has so graphic and so lovely a portraiture of a Mother been penned as that which Lamartine has given of his own mother, in his "Les Confidences." There is scarcely a page in the whole volume which does no bear some testimony, some touching testimony, to the excellence of that devoted parent. While dozens of excerpts, of dozens of pages, could not convey any adequate idea of the devotion of that exalted person to her new equally exalted son, I cannot refrain from inserting one or two short extracts, to excite the emulation of mothers and of children. Speaking of her genius, and her plan of educating him, for she took the entire education of him until he entered a college, he says:

"Her superiority was not in her head, but in her soul. It is in the hearts of women, that God has placed their genius, because all the works of that genius are works of love. Tenderness, piety, courage, heroism, constancy, devotedness, forgetfulness of self, sensitive serenity, but overpowering by faith and force of will all that suffered within her; such were the features of that elevated genius which all those who approached her felt was in her life, and not in her written works. * * * * It was in my mother's soul especially that I sought for nurture; I read through her eyes, I felt through her feelings, I loved through her love. She translated (interpreted) every thing for me—nature, sentiment, sensations, thoughts. Without her aid I would not have known how to spell in the book of creation, which was open before my eyes; but she directed my finger, and placed it on every thing. Her soul was so rich in brilliancy, color, and warmth, that it illuminated and heated every thing it approached. In a word, the imperceptible instruction which I was receiving was not a lesson; it was the very action of life, thought and feeling, performed under her eyes, with her, through her, and as she herself performed it. We were living a double life. It was thus that my heart formed itself within me, on a model, at which it was not even necessary that I should look, so completely was it commingled with my heart."

Such is the result of having exercised Motherlove, properly, towards her offspring. This influence has continued thus far through life, with this great and good man, at the head of affairs of a great nation, in most troubled times—in the vortex of a revolution—or at his silent orisons in the shades of Palestine. Woman's great mission on earth—her great, though not only mission—is to manifest Motherlove, in its highest and most exalted form. Her mission extends beyond her years, for she lives over, again, in her offspring—her mission therefore, when properly exercised, outlives her own days, down from generation to generation afterward. It is, lamentable, truly lamentable, that woman fails so often in her holy mission, and as lamentable, likewise, that she so often reaps ingratitude and misery for both her well-meant and her mistaken efforts. Alas! alas! how often does such holy, religious devotion, go unrequited? Burns ought to have written, Woman "is made to mourn," though, doubtless, he embraced her in the generic term Man; yet the sentiment applies more specifically to Mothers; or, perhaps, Shakspeare would have done better, instead of putting the sentence, "Sufferance is the badge of our tribe," (the Israelites,) into Shylocks mouth, had he given to the lone, anxious, watching mother, Sufferance is the guerdon of our sex. Motherlove cannot be told in any language; it can only be told, can only be appreciated, by observing its daily ministry, in every situation of life, even to the most abject and abandoned, by the patient endurance of all ills, to cherish and succor the wayward, and, ofttimes, the most worthless child. Motherlove is a principle—I had almost said an entity, a sui generis entity, or it could never survive the daily crush of fondest hopes, and triumph over the wreck and decay of all the other feelings and sentiments of the human heart. When will man learn to appreciate Motherlove?

BORDENTOWN, Nov. 1st, 1852.

THE CHINA MISSION.

From letters received by the Missionary Board, the Corresponding Secretary has extracted, and prepared for publication, a few items, which will be interesting to the friends of the cause. Bro. Wardner says:—

"The sparseness of our letters, during the past year, was owing to our time being so much taken up in building, (as we have done considerable of it with our own hands,) that we have had but little leisure to write, and but little to write about. A ship is now up for San Francisco, and we avail ourselves of the opportunity to inform you of our good fortune."

"Since occupying our present residence, Mrs. W. has made two vigorous attempts to get a class for instruction. But owing to their suspicions, indifference, or indolence, or all these combined, she has, as yet, met with no reliable encouragment. Being destitute of means, she has been obliged to pursue a course a little at variance with their customs, which proves not to work well. Besides, Bro. Carpenter's former teacher 'Lee' has established a school in our immediate neighborhood, and we have good reason to think he uses his influence against us. This man, while in Bro. C.'s employ, professed to be a disciple of Jesus, and tried hard to get admittance into the church: but we had reason to suspect his motives, and held him in suspense. Our fears have been fully substantiated, since his salary as teacher has failed him. Had we been able to start a free school at the beginning of the Chinese year, we were encouraged to think we should have received several scholars that are now engaged to him. The prospect now is, that we shall have to wait till the beginning of the next year, before we shall be able to do much in the way of instructing the youth of his neighborhood."

"The facilities we have hitherto enjoyed for laboring to advantage, compared with others, have been very limited, though I feel that it ill becomes me to complain, while I am so unfaithful in improving the privileges I do enjoy. Still, I wish to be left without excuse. I have confidence, also, that our appeals will not be unheeded; for, I believe, our people have their hearts enlisted in the cause, and that 'they have a mind to work;' and that it is only necessary for them to know the exigencies of the case, to induce them to supply every deficiency. I have just been preparing a translation of John's Gospel, in the dialect, which I would like to print for circulation.

"The season for gathering taxes, among the Chinese, has about passed. In this, as in every other operation of the official department, oppression and injustice are apparent. A measure is prepared every year, by order of the mandarins, varying in size according to their own liking, which indicates the quantity of rice required for a specified amount of property. The tax-gatherers are obliged to collect the full amount, at the risk of a castigation at the office of the city magistrate. This, however, he can avoid by employing another to receive it in his stead; and I am told, that during the tax-gathering season, multitudes of opium smokers and vagabonds constantly throng that place of execution, waiting for such opportunities, who, for the small sum of forty cash, (a little less than three cents,) will submit to receive a hundred blows of the bamboo. The backs of some, it is said, have become perfectly callous, from the stripes they have received.

"Are there not professors of religion, who would yield the truths of the Bible rather than suffer as much for its sake? How should those blush, who, for fear of a little inconvenience, or the loss of a few dollars, perhaps cents, or of being regarded a little singular, will betray their Lord, and, Esau-like, sell their inheritance above? What apology can they offer, when these heathens shall rise up and condemn them? The estimate one places upon an object, is always commensurate with the sacrifices he is willing to make for it. These, for less than three cents, expose their backs to a hundred lashes without flinching; yea, and like the impotent man at the pool of Bethesda, wait for the privilege for weeks and months together. Yet thousands who make great pretensions of attachment to their Saviour, and some ministers of the gospel also, will, for the sake of a day's wages, or a little addition to their salary, barter away that truth which He spilt his precious blood to honor. Will such be the gems that shall adorn the Saviour's crown? How many among the professed followers of Jesus, who, should they receive half that number of stripes for conscience' sake without surrendering their faith, would feel that nothing short of the glories of the heavenly Jerusalem were a suitable reward for their martyr spirit and patient suffering, besides having their names sounded abroad from one end of the earth to the other! But these think of nothing beyond their forty cash, or the breakfast, or draughts from the opium pipe, which they will purchase. Let the flinching Christian hang his head in view of his faint-heartedness, his weakness of moral purpose, his murmurings because of suffering, that he is so far out-done by a heathen. Is not the crown of the righteous of greater value than forty cash? If he never blushes before, doubtless he will at the disclosures of the last day.

"The priests of China, I learn, can neither be condemned nor protected by the laws of the land, as their office is considered too sacred for the interference of law. Hence they can take all the liberties which the patience of the people will allow them.

"A few weeks ago, by invitation, I accompanied a brother missionary to an out-station belonging to his mission, about six miles distant from Shanghae, where they have a school-house chapel, erected at a cost of about $300, in which they have had a school for two years or more; and some one of their number visits it every week, for the purpose of catechising, and preaching the word. The way thither leads through several villages, where we stopped and preached, and in some places had a hundred, or more, to hear us. Such out-stations afford much promise. Besides, they afford occasional variety, which is conducive to health and vivacity of spirit.

"During the greater part of last year, I practiced visiting a small village about a mile and a half distant, and preached in a tea shop, for the privilege of which I paid the owner a small stipend. But the accommodations were small, and during the busy parts of the season I got but few hearers, and sometimes none. This, with some other circumstances, induced me to defer for a while, and the effect seems to be favorable. About two weeks ago, as I was going to the chapel, I was hailed by the proprietor, who appeared quite urgent that I should repeat my visits, saying he had enlarged his building, and his patronage had increased; and assured me that all should go off properly. I gladly complied with his request, and thus far feel encourged. He, doubtless, thinks only of the cash, but others may be benefited, who from time may there hear the word. There is another larger village, about three miles distant, where I intend ere long to make a trial; and, if I meet with encouragement, may rent a house, and fit it up for a chapel. I have instructed my teacher to make inquiry in regard to getting a house, or room, in the hamlet of which I have written, and also to look for one on some public street in the city. My means will not allow me to do much; perhaps, shall not be able to get more than one, and that will depend upon the price required. Our house is in such a condition, that something must be done without delay. Our physician says, it will be dangerous to attempt to pass through another hot season, in its present condition. A little expense will improve it considerably.

"My teacher promises well as a preacher of the word. Some of his discourses would do credit to any ordinary minister of the gospel. His friends, he says, regard him as an alien for his sentiments, but, as a general thing, he seems firm. Occasionally, however, he shows that he is still a child, and subject to temptation. A circumstance occurred, a short time ago, which, for a time, threatened a disunion. But by prompt efforts, with the blessing of God, he was made to see his error, and confessed with tears, that he had been led on by a temptation of the evil one, who was seeking his ruin, and that he believed the Lord would suddenly have cut him off, had he persisted in the course he had resolved upon, viz., to break his connection with me as teacher, and with the church. He concluded by asking me to pray for him, that his sins might be forgiven, and followed me by a very affecting address to his offended God. A trifling circumstance, that he could not understand, had led him to conclude that we were false men. But on ascertaining his difficulty, it was cleared up to his satisfaction. His greatest error was in determining to break fellowship without taking the proper steps; as he afterwards said, he was intending to leave without mentioning his difficulty, and would have done so, had I not drawn it out of him. Let your prayers be fervent in behalf of these lambs, that they fall not into the paws of the devouring foe; and in our behalf, that we may not give occasion of stumbling to them. Surely, we stand in a place of fearful responsibility. Who, but Jehovah, can grant the needed assistance?

"We have just got two thousand calendars struck off, accompanied by the Fourth Commandment, and a brief comment. Our teachers havealso prepared a short essay on opium, which we intend to publish when we can."

The feregoing extracts are from a letter dated the 4th of April. Under date of June 4th, he says:—

"Mrs. Wardner's efforts to get up a class of women and children, proves more successful than we anticipated. Since the date of my last, I believe she has not failed of having several each Sabbath, who have committed portions of Scripture, and frequently during the week. The prejudice and fear, which formerly seemed to exist, appear to be wearing away.

"I continue to go to 'Sah-whay-jau' every Sabbath, and meet with very good encouragement. I have also hired the use of a room in the hamlet nearest us, in which to preach every seventh-day evening. The room is occupied by a family, who are subjected to some inconvenience by it. I have preached there twice, and had a full house. But it is uncertain how the congregations will continue. If this effort proves successful, I shall seek to try the experiment in other places, soon."

SAY NOT HUMAN LOVE IS WASTED.

Say not human love is wasted,
In a selfish world like ours;
Would you check the dew that falleth
On earth's drooping flowers?
Know you not, love unrequited
Still may live, to bless
Many a weary pilgrim, toiling
Through life's wilderness.

Generous love is never wasted!
Like the gentle rain,
It refresheth earth's waste places,
Bids them bloom again;
Ah! despise thou not love's mission,
Much of suffering to endure,
What is there on earth so holy
As affection pure?

THE BIBLE ADAPTED TO ALL.

A speaker before the American Bible Society, at its recent anniversary, is reported on the above topic thus:—

God's Book is the book for all. It is like the sunlight and the water, for all. It is good for prince and peasant. To Jonathan Edwards it was an 'illimitable ocean,' and to the poor, untutored peasant it is just 'the small rain upon the tender herb.' Go with me to a room in Edinburgh, to see the mightiest man of his country. He reads, and reads, and reads; his soul is in his face till he meets the words, 'God forbid that I should boast, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ.' He reads till his whole nature is permeated and saturated with the Divine teaching, and so earnestly does he dwell upon it from day to day, for years, that he seemed to have the whole Bible in solution. The Bible was the very book calculated to satisfy the craving of his mighty intellect.

Again, let us follow one of those Felex Neff like colporteurs among the Alps, and we shall find a poor woman, whose soul is permeated with the only part of the Bible which she had—she says 'it is full of good reading.'

Again, go with me to a plantation in Virginia, there is one slave of more cheerful and happy countenance than his fellows, and he says, 'Master, when I am in trouble I just lie flat down upon the promises of the Bible, and then I pray straight up.'

It is the book for all. You remember the closing scene in the life of Walter Scott, the Wizard of the North. He said, 'Lockhart, read to me.' 'What shall I read?' Turning his dying eyes on him, he said, 'Lockhart, there is but one book.'

There is no intellectual want which this book cannot satisfy. Charles James Fox became the greatest master of English eloquence by nightly and daily readings of the book of Job. It was this light which stole into the dungeon of John Bunyan, ~~and enabled~~ him to give us the most precious book this side of the Bible—his own Pilgrim's Progress to the Pilgrim's Rest. And as a conservative power, it is that which holds us from drifting away from the truth upon the rocks of ruin.

Nothing would do so much good as to go to those rooms where earnest reformers are seeking to work out their problems of social progress, and tell them, 'Here is the Bible in which these problems are solved.' We must not let them shake down the pillars of society. We must carry our Bible where a statesman, whose name I dare not mention in his presence, carried his—to the hall of the American Senate. We must give the Bible to all—the mendicant, the emigrant, the poor and the rich. We must diffuse this book like the sunlight, all over our benighted globe.

ENGLISH UNIVERSITY EDUCATION.

Some time since, a commission was appointed to inquire into the state of education in the English Universities. The results of these investigations, so far as they have transpired, are said to be extremely damaging to the reputation of those ancient corporations. In Oxford, the professorships seem to be nearly or quite useless. The Savilian Professor of Astronomy states that the average number of his class is three. The Savilian Professor of Geometry has had a class varying between seven and none. The attendance on the lectures of the Professor of Chemistry has, for the last twelve years, averaged twelve. The Regius Professor of Civil Law informs us that no public lectures on the study of the Civil Law have been delivered in the University of Oxford for more than a century. The Regius Professor of Medicine begs leave to state that no lecture-room, library, apparatus, or collections of any kind, are provided for him. The Reader of Anatomy admits that the University, though empowered to grant degrees in medicine, and to give licenses to practice, has not attempted to provide a system of medical education. Similar complaints or admissions are made by other professors. The only education, in fact, is given by the college tutors; and these, it is said, do not equal, on the average, in ability and scholarship, the head-masters of the English public schools. In what, then, consist the attractions and boasted advantages of this famous University? Sir Charles Lyell, in his pithy evidence, supplies the answer: "The number of fellowships and livings in the gift of Oxford, and the requirement of degrees for ordination, is such a source of influence, (not to call it bribery,) that, if Sanscrit and Chinese were substituted for Greek and Latin, no material diminution would be experienced in the number of students."

PRAYING TO SAINTS.—Adam Clarke thus comments on the account of the rich man calling upon Abraham: "He cried and said, Father Abraham, have mercy on me," &c. There was a time when he might have prayed to the God of Abraham, and have found mercy; now he dares not approach that God whom in his life-time he had neglected, and he addresses a creature who has neither power nor authority to bless. This is the only instance in the Bible of praying to saints, and, to the confusion of the false, popish doctrine, which states it to be necessary and available, let it for ever be remembered, that it was practiced only by a damned soul, and then without success.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, November 11, 1852.

A Proclamation.

The varied blessings enjoyed by the people of this State during the past year, call forth the grateful tribute of praise and devotion due to our heavenly Benefactor. An abundant harvest, crowning the labors of the husbandman, and filling the land with plenty; peace with all nations; the maintenance of social order and free institutions, imparting fresh vigor to the cause of civil liberty; the diffusion of religion and learning; the general prevalence of health; the merciful deliverance of the towns and cities which were visited for a season by the destroying pestilence, and the innumerable benefits which have been conferred upon our commonwealth, proclaim the infinite goodness and protecting care of the Creator and Supreme Ruler of the Universe. In compliance with established usage, I respectfully recommended to the people of this State the observance of Thursday, the 25th day of November next, as a day of prayer and thanksgiving.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto signed my name, and affixed the privy seal of the State, at the City of Albany, this 16th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1852. By the Governor: Washington Hunt.
James F. Ruggles, Private Secretary.

REVISION OF THE SCRIPTURES.

In Acts 12: 4, we have it recorded, that Herod having commenced a persecution of the Church, and slain James the brother of John with the sword, apprehended Peter also, and put him in prison, "intending after Easter to bring him forth to the people." What construction would a child naturally put upon this passage? Or what construction would an uneducated person put upon it? If he were the child of Episcopalian or Roman Catholic parents, or if he lived where he had full opportunity to become acquainted with the practices of Episcopalians and Roman Catholics, he would in all probability say, that it referred to the annual festival observed by those people in commemoration of Christ's resurrection—Easter Sunday. No conclusion would be more natural. But would it be a correct conclusion?

The word which King James' translators have rendered Easter, is, in the original, pascha. It occurs in many other places in the New Tastament, in all of which it is rendered Passover. For example: "Ye know that after two days is the pascha." Matt. 26: 2. "Where wilt thou that we prepare for thee to eat the pascha?" ver. 17. "And they made ready the pascha." ver. 19. "The feast of unleavened bread drew nigh, which is called the pascha." Luke 22: 1. "With desire I have desired to eat this pascha with you, before I suffer." ver. 15. "And the pascha, a feast of the Jews, was nigh." John 6: 4. "Then Jesus, six days before the pascha, came to Bethany." John 12: 1. "Ye have a custom that I should release you one at the pascha." John 18: 37. "It was the preparation of the pascha." John 19: 14. "Christ our pascha is sacrificed for us." 1 Cor. 5: 7. "Through faith he (Moses) kept the pascha." Heb. 11: 28.

Now can any man tell why the king's translators should have rendered the word Passover, in some fifteen or twenty places, and in one solitary instance Easter? What error or mischief would have resulted from the adoption of the term Passover in the latter instance? It would not have been an erroneous translation; that is evident to any one. Would it, then, have conveyed an idea which the Holy Spirit did not intend to convey?

But how do we know what idea the Spirit intended to convey, except from the words He uses? Words are signs of ideas; and from the fact that the Holy Spirit used the word PASCHA, in the passage under consideration, the presumption is, that He intended to set forth the idea of the festival known as the Passover. There is, certainly, nothing in the context which authorizes any other conclusion. Why, then, did the translators use a word conveying a different idea?

The question is easily answered. The Church of England was in the practice of celebrating Christ's resurrection annually, and always upon the first Sunday after the Full Moon, which happened upon or next after the twenty-first day of March. This annual festival had received the designation of Easter. It was the great feast of the Church; the feast from which all other movable feast and holy-days were reckoned. To keep up the impression that this celebration had originated with the Church, in the times, and under the direct sanction of, the Apostles—an impression sanctioned only by tradition—the passage under consideration was rendered as it was. No other reason can be assigned for the rendering.

In the revision of the Scriptures undertaken not long since by the American Bible Society—they call it only a "collation," evidently using the term, however, in the sense of revision—some twenty-four thousand emendations have been made. Most of these have been in particulars affecting only orthography of proper names, punctuation, divison of verses, &c. Nevertheless, there have been some instances, in which the "collators" have altered the sense of the common version; and few as these instances have been, they fully justify the principle of revision. Yet, in the passage under consideration, the word "Easter" is still retained. Why was this? "Joshua" was substituted for "Jesus" in Acts 7: 45, and Heb. 4: 8, without any scruple; and why not substitute Passover for Easter in Acts 12: 4? True, the word "Passover" is inserted in the margin; but how few of our Bibles are printed with the marginal readings! Besides, if to insert the word in the margin was all that was necessary, in this instance, why was it not deemed sufficient to insert "Joshua" in the margin, in the other instances? The reason is found in the fact, that Episcopalians make a part of the American Bible Society; so God's truth must be compromited for the sake of pleasing men!

Upon the historical accuracy of the idea that the celebration of Easter is traceable to the Apostolic age, we need not now enter. Granting all that the most rigid Churchman would demand, in this respect, we still maintain that, in the passage under consideration, the Holy Spirit had no reference to such celebration. His reference was to the Passover, as celebrated by the Jews. The occurrences recorded in this chapter, took place only about ten years after the death of Christ, at which time the Passover, and all other Jewish festivals, continued to be celebrated, as they did for nearly thirty years after.

But is the error of any practical importance? Aside from the fact that it falsely ascribes the origin of the celebration to the churches of the Apostolic age, it might seem that it was not. But, in our opinion, it goes farther than this. It gives countenance to the notion that Christianity originated festivals. But Christianity, as such, has no festivals. In this respect, it has a marked distinction from Judaism. (See Rom. 14: 5, Gal. 4: 10, Col. 2: 16.) The weekly Sabbath is not a festival of Christianity as such; and the term "Christian Sabbath," so much in vogue with nearly all denominations, conveys a most anti-evangelical idea, because it conveys the idea that Christianity originates festivals—contrary to what is taught in the passages above referred to. Neither is the weekly Sabbath a festival of Judaism as such. It pervades Judaism; it pervades Christianity. But its origin lies back of both, and its observance devolves upon men with an obligation commensurate with that of the Moral Law. We repeat it, that Christianity, as such, has no festivals; and the error which teaches that it has, is an error of importance; otherwise, Paul displayed an unnecessary anxiety about it.

We intended to exhibit some other instances of mistranslation, but having already drawn out our remarks to considerable length, we forbear for the present. T. B. B.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Matters in the Church of England.

Glasgow, October 22, 1852.

A crisis in the history of the Church of England seems approaching. Men of talent and ambition, both amongst her clergy and higher dignitaries, feel themselves sadly circumscribed by State control. Unwilling to relinquish the emoluments they receive, they feel shackled by the implied terms on which they enjoy them. With much of the Papal spirit of dominancy, the Tractarian party are bent on obtaining power to assimilate their doctrines also more closely to that apostate system. For this end, they are earnestly striving to acquire for the Church a state of independency of the Legislature—to have a power which Parliament cannot control.

Convocation was originally of Papal creation. It consisted first of an Upper House of Bishops and a Lower House of the inferior clergy, and was afterwards split into two Convocations for the two provinces of York and Canterbury. They were summoned in old Papal times for the purpose of granting taxes to the King—it being held derogatory that a lay authority like the Parliament should tax spiritual persons. In the time of Charles II. this system of self-taxation was abolished, and they were deprived of the power of doing any thing without the sanction of Parliament. Parliament having more than enough to do with its own affairs, the ecclesiastics, having little else allowed them to do, began to quarrel among themselves—to prevent which, again, all power of action was taken from them. The Morning Advertiser, a fortnight ago, however, intimated that the Earl of Derby had promised to the Tractarian party that he would recommend to the Queen to summon Convocation for the dispatch of buisness—which is understood to mean, that they shall be permitted to deliberate and decide on ecclesiastical affairs. Little credence seems to have been given to this announcement, till on Monday last both the Times and the Record indignantly repeated it. The latter, as the organ of the Evangelical party, is evidently alarmed for the consequences, if the rumor prove true. The Morning Herald, however, denies that it is so, and the Times of yesterday seems disposed to take credit to itself for having prevented the consummation of the blunder. There is, however, little reason to doubt, that although for the present matters be conducted as they have long been, there is a widening breach between the secular and ecclesiastical powers of the Establishment. Bishops and clergy, unwilling to be dictated to even by a friendly Parliament, are too well aware that there is an increasing number of members of the House of Commons hostile to their aims. On this account, as well as from the increase of the Romanizing element among the Tractarians of the present day, is to be traced the effort for the revival of Convocation. A failure in that effort is likely to send such men the sooner into the Papal ranks; and success in their efforts to obtain Convocation, will enable them to assimilate the Church in which they are to that of Rome, which they seem to regard as a model—compelling men of more scriptural views to secede.

The introduction of Confession into the Church of England, is exciting great dissatisfaction. A large and influential meeting was held at Plymouth, at which resolutions to use means to prevent the scandal of it were adopted. One of these resolutions asserts that "the system of Confession carried on at St. Peter's church, [Mr. Prynne's, Plymouth,] is contrary to the doctrine, the practice, and the spirit of the Church of England." This resolution was moved by the Rev. H. A. Greaves, and the Bishop of Exeter has indignantly called upon him to prove the truth of his assertion. He names the Court of Arches as the proper tribunal, and with the air of one confident of success, is ready to regard Mr. Greaves as a slanderer if he avail not himself of the proffered opportunity of trying to establish his proposition. If it be true, that the Church of England does afford facilities for the immoralities to which the confessional has always afforded opportunities in the sister apostacy, then the sooner she is leveled in the dust the better for those over whom she exercises influence and control.

THE NORTH-WESTERN ASSOCIATION.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The North-Western Seventh-day Baptist Association convened at Albion, Dane Co., Wisconsin, on the 29th of September, and enjoyed an interesting session. Eld. Lucius Crandall, then on a visit among us, presided. Excepting Eld. Samuel Davison, all the ministers of the Association were in attendance. The business was entered upon with commendable interest, and unusual unanimity and harmony of feeling characterized all the deliberations. The recently-organized Church at Southampton, Ill., was received into the Association.

Various subjects of interest occupied the attention of the Association; among them, that of Education. All seemed to feel a lively and permanent interest in this, and the Report of the Committee on the subject elicited some very interesting remarks and addresses. Many thanks are due to brother Crandall for his interest in our behalf, and for his efforts to awaken a deeper interest in Education. The Report having been unanimously and enthusiastically adopted, a "Board of Education" was appointed, in compliance with the recommendation in the Report, who immediately entered upon the duties assigned them.

It was resolved, from the beginning, to devote the evenings and mornings to religious exercises, and to make an effort to effect the spiritual good of all present, avoiding all occasion for strife or discord in the business of the Association. The result was most happy. Union and harmony prevailed. Elds. L. Crandall and V. Hull addressed a large concourse of people in the grove on the Sabbath and on First-day; and the speakers seemed inspired with the importance of the occasion. The evenings were devoted to preaching and prayer; and all taking part in the exercises seemed to regard the occasion as a propitious one for the beginning of better times, especially for the revival of the Church in Albion. Eld. V. Hull (for the first week seconded by the labors of Eld. Crandall) remained with the Church, and still continues a series of meetings. The consequence is, that the Church has been much revived, God has manifested his mercy, and we trust that angels have had occasion to rejoice over the conversion of not less than sixteen souls, "born into the kingdom." *

Educational Report.

Your Committee respectfully report, that they have considered with much satisfaction, though not unmingled with regret, the present condition of our educational facilities and prospects. There are at present two academic schools in progress within the limits of this Association, in which we have an immediate interest.

The school at Milton, under the supervision of brother A. C. Spicer, though laboring under great embarrassment for want of adequate room and other facilities, is in as prosperous a condition as circumstances will admit of, and highly commends itself to the patronage of the public. But it is kept in progress only by the personal efforts of brother and sister Spicer, who, notwithstanding the offers of living salaries elsewhere, have sacrificed all to it, truly commending themselves to our sympathy and co-operation.

The school at Farmington, conducted by brother James Hill, we are glad to learn, is highly prosperous, presenting good inducements to the youth of that community. By the personal efforts of brother Hill, a commodius academic building has been erected; but we learn, with much regret, that he has become so involved in building it as to much embarrass the prospect of its being retained by him. Bro. Hill has made a very commendable effort, and we commend the interests of that school to the sympathy of the denomination, and the patronage of the public.

Considering the extensive and rapidly increasing demand for the education of our youth, your Committee are of opinion, that the present accommodation for conducting a school in this State, and the facilities for instructing in experimental science, are far inadequate to that thorough and practical course of studies which is desirable, and essential to our best interests. We would, therefore, commend to all, a prayerful consideration of the bearing education must have upon our influence as a denomination, and upon the advancement of truth and happiness in the world. God, from whom all things are, in his wisdom has chosen to work by means, promoting the cause of truth through the instrumentality of his children; and intellectural power, sanctified by God, your committee regard as the hand-maid of religion—as the strong arm by which "the sword of the Spirit" is to be effectually wielded. Like godliness, education, hallowed by God's grace, "profiteth in all things." As a people, our prosperity and power to wield a controlling influence in society must be, as observation and experience clearly prove, just in proportion as we are properly educated in a knowledge of the world around and within us. But how can we be instructed without the means of instruction?

There is, in the opinion of your committee, an urgent demand for immediate action to improve our educational prospects by an increase of facilities pertaining thereto. Schools are being multiplied around us, prejudicing our interests by securing the patronage of scholars who might be induced to patronize and contribute to the support of a school of our own, and also by securing the investment of interests which ought to be reserved to ourselves, and which, when once lost, can with great difficulty be retrived. But more, for want of these facilities to place our school above successful competition, we are subjected to embarrassments from among ourselves; and our young people, as they look for increasing advantages, are left the alternative of seeking that education abroad, which ought to be furnished them at home.

Finally, in view of all our relations, and the circumstances surrounding us, it appears absolutely essential to our highest interests, by early action to so direct our educational matters, taking the lead in this respect in society, as to secure somewhat extensively the patronage of people other than of our own denomination, and thus obtaining an advantage ground, to retain it by keeping in the advance.

Your committee, then, believe an immediate, decided, and unanimous effort should be made for the erection of a suitable academic building, at some eligible point in this State, hereafter to be determined upon; and for that purpose, we recommend the appointment of a Board of Education, by the Association, so located as to secure the most extensive interest and influence possible, who shall proceed immediately to raise funds; determine the plan of the building, and the location of the same; appoint a building committee; and transact all other business necessary for the accomplishment of such object.

HEAD QUARTERS IN NEW YORK.

At the Third Annual Meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society, held in Plainfield, N. J., on the 13th day of September, 1852, the Board of Managers presented a full report of their operations, from which the following is an extract:—

"Among the subjects which have occupied the attention of the Board during the past year, is one upon which they desire an expression of opinion from the assembled Society. The active friends of the Sabbath cause have long felt the importance of having, in some accessible part of the City of New York, a building owned by and devoted to the use of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination—a building in which the business of our Missionary, Tract, and Publishing Societies may be transacted, provided with a room or rooms for meetings of the Boards of those Societies, with a reading-room for a Sabbatic Library, and a collection of missionary curiosities—a place, in short, where every Sabbath-keeper passing through the city would feel an interest in calling, and in which he might feel that he had a share. That New York is the place for such a building, cannot be questioned by any one who considers that it is the metropolis, morally and religiously, as well as commercially, of our vast country, and that the light which emanates therefrom shines throughout the world. To secure such a building will of course involve considerable expense; but this expense, when divided among many, will be small for each, and will bear no proportion, it is believed, to the good influence which will result. Three years ago a Chapel in Shanghae was proposed, to which objection was made by some on the score of expense; but now the Chapel and two dwelling-houses have been built and paid for, to stand for generations as monuments of Christian liberality. And who is poorer therefor? Probably not one of those who contributed the funds for their erection. A Seventh-day Baptist House in New York is now proposed; and the Board of Managers of the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society have appointed a Committee to make inquiries and see what can be done. Will the Society sanction the measure, and promise pecuniary aid commensurate with its importance, and with the liberal spirit which has characterized its members in times past?"

The subject of the above paragraph was taken into consideration by the Society; and after a free consultation upon it, the following resolution was unanimously passed:—

Resolved, That this Society approves the proposition of the Board, to obtain a building in the city of New York for the transaction of its business, and would recommend that the Board take such measures as they may deem necessary to secure this important object.

In accordance with the spirit of this resolution, the Board have instructed Geo. B. Utter, the General Agent of the Society, to open a book for subscriptions to a Building Fund, and to solicit such subscriptions as he has opportunity. It is hoped that many friends of the object will consider its claims upon them, and notify the Agent of the amount they are willing to give, without waiting to be called upon.

CELEBRATION OF THE LORD'S SUPPER.

Will one of the Editors of the Recorder answer the following questions? Are we to follow the example of Christ, when he first instituted the Eucharist, on the night of his betrayal, when he ate with one whom he knew to be his enemy? In view of this example, are we justifiable in excluding from the table of the Lord any whose Christian character and love of Christ we have no grounds of questioning? Is our example salutary upon the minds of unbelievers, when we refuse to partake of the elements representing the broken body and spilled blood of our Lord, when invited by Christians? In fine, where is there a "thus saith the Lord" for what is termed close communion?

Mathetes.

☞ Having set forth some thoughts touching this subject on a former occasion, and having nothing new to offer, our correspondent is referred to the Recorder of August 29th, 1850. T. B. B.

Revivals among Methodists.—The New York Christian Advocate and Journal, the great Methodist organ, has the following:—

"Our paper is rich, gloriously rich, this week, in revival intelligence; much that we have not received, and much on hand. The camp meetings have been very successful, showing that the members went to them in the spirit of prayer, and reliance upon the promises of God. And in many instances they have returned to hold protracted services in their places of worship, where awakenings and conversions still bless their zealous efforts."

The People of Hayti.—Rev. W. L. Judd, who has spent several years in Hayti, in a letter to the Boston Traveler, thus speaks of the character of the people, and the security for life and property among them:—

"I hesitate not to say, that I believe there has been in the past six years less murder, less robbery, and less incendiarism, at Port-au-Prince, than in any city of the same size, and during the same period, in the United States. During this whole period, and even longer, there has been but one fire in that city of thirty thousand inhabitants! Where can a parallel case be found in the United States? I have traveled in the country at all hours of the day and night, 'o'er mountain hights and in valleys low,' in lonely forests and amid cultivated fields, and have never been treated with disrespect by the coarsest peasant or the rudest mountaineer. In these journeys I have never been refused a night's lodging at the poorest cabin where from necessity or convenience I chose to stop. And when I have called for the bill of fare, I am almost universally answered by the expression, 'Just what you choose to give.' And, although it is the land of the old buccaneers, and where the example of foreigners has exhibited more of violence and fraud than of gentleness and honesty, still, from Tiburon to Samana, and from Jacmel to Cape Haytien, I know not of a single cove where a ship may not enter, nor a single mountain fastness where a traveler may not pass, with safety from robbers."

Gerrit Smith going to Congress.—One very gratifying and significant result of the recent election is the choice of Gerrit Smith to represent the 22d District of New York, composed of Madison and Oswego Counties, in the next Congress. Mr. Smith was the Independent Free Soil candidate; and though opposed by both of the old parties, he was elected by a handsome majority. This places in Congress one of the most consistent and uncompromising opponents of slavery in our country—a man who believes that slavery is unconstitutional, and will do all in his power to strip it of the support of the Federal Government. Nor will his influence be confined to the subject of slavery, though that is sufficiently important to engross the attention of any number of men; but there is reason to believe that every measure calculated to promote freedom, equality, and justice among men, will receive his cordial support. Alluding to the results of the election, the N. Y. Tribune says:—

"We are heartily glad that Gerrit Smith is going to Washington. He is an honest, brave, kind-hearted Christian philanthropist, whose religion is not put aside with his Sunday coat, but lasts him clear through the week. We think him very wrong in some of his notions of Political Economy, and quite mistaken in his ideas, that the Constitution is inimical to Slavery, and that injustice cannot be legalized; but we heartily wish more such great, pure, loving souls, could find their way into Congress. He will find his seat any thing but comfortable, but his presence there will do good, and the country will yet know him better and esteem him more highly than it has yet done."

The East and the West.—At the Congregational Convention in Albany, Rev. Dr. Todd spoke in favor of the plan to raise $50,000 for building churches at the West. "He wished, however, we should all understand one another. We are bound to the West—we send our sons to the West, and they return and take our daughters. The West must know that the East has its trials, although we have no Missionary Magazine in which to tell them. The average salary of ministers in our county is $525, which is not large when we pay 24 cents a pound for butter. At one time there were 26 agents in New England soliciting aid for the West, which I knew of. Now we wish the West to remember, that we have a great deal to do here. Many of these agents tell us that at the West the soil is knee-deep with cream, and the corn grows so high you will hardly be able to see the top, and they would not have the hard hills of New England as a gift; and yet they run to New England as though it was all made of gold. New England is growing in wealth, but cannot do every-thing. They might do more than they do—especially the Churches—although my own people give $8 a church member for foreign objects. A clergyman in our county, with a salary less than $400, gives more than his whole congregation. It has been said that New England clergymen are good financiers. They need to be so. But it is the wives of the ministers who do the business, and deserve the credit of all the financial ability."

William and Ellen Crafts.—These widely known fugitives from American Slavery are now in England. The London Anti-Slavery Advocate says that they have just entered upon a second year of instruction at the Industrial School at Ockham, near Ripley, Surrey. "During the first year of their residence there, they have been unremitting in their studies, and have made great proficiency in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and in various branches of useful knowledge." Their physical wants are provided for "by the efforts of some who have taken a lively interest in them personally, and who also feel that they have a strong claim upon the sympathy and generosity of the country whose hospitality they have sought."

Ordination of Bro. L. M. Cottrell.—By request of the Church in Persia, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., a Council convened with that Church on the 26th ult., to assist in the ordination of Bro. Libbeus M. Cottrell, that church having engaged him to labor with them as a Minister. An examination was waived, as Bro. C. had passed an examination at the last session of the Western Association, which was satisfactory to all the Council and the Church. The ordination exercises were as follows:—Ordination discourse, by Eld. N. V. Hull; consecrating prayer, by Eld. L. Andrews; charge, by Eld. J. Bailey, hand of fellowship, by Eld. T. E. Babcock; benediction, by Eld. L. M. Cottrell.

Death of Dr. Maginnis.—The death of Dr. Maginnis, one of the Professors in Rochester University, was announced two weeks ago. The following account of his last days we find in one of our exchanges:—

"For several years he had suffered from a severe bronchial affection, and disease of the heart. About two months since, symptoms of dropsy on the chest and of general anasarca, manifested themselves, and awakened the most serious apprehensions of his friends. At the commencement of the present collegiate year, Dr. M. was compelled, by the pressure of disease, to relinquish the recitation in Moral Philosophy, of the senior class in the University. He could not, however, consent to omit the exercises of his theological class, and continued to meet them at his own residence. A sad interest was imparted to his instructions by the apprehension that they were the last which he would ever deliver. On Tuesday, the symptoms of his disease became more alarming, and the exercises of his class were relinquished. An increased difficulty of breathing was experienced, and it soon was evident that no hope of his recovery could be cherished. But no fears of immediate death were felt. This afternoon, while sitting in his study, having just ceased conversing with a friend, who was present, he suddenly expired. He died so quietly, so free from pain, that those who were with him could hardly believe that he was no more."

Missionary Intelligence.—At a meeting held in New York on the first Monday in November, intelligence was communicated of the death of two missionaries—Mrs. Pierson, of the Choctaw Mission, and Mrs. Morgan, of the Jewish Mission in Turkey. The intelligence from several of the Armenian Missions, was highly encouraging. A new church has been formed at Rodasta, by Mr. Everett. An instance of persecution had occurred at Khanus, by enraged Armenians against Christian converts. The missionary in Assyria gives information that he has had put into his hands, from the Pasha of Mosul, the sum of 4,500 piasters for Rev. Dr. Bacon, of New Haven, and the party with him, that being the loss sustained by them from the robbers in the mountains of Kurdistan. The offenders have been secured, and will be punished. At the Sandwich Islands, Mr. Coan reports a very interesting state of things at Hilo and Puna. The church of Hilo was much revived. Forty-four new members had been admitted to the last communion. Mr. Smith describes in strong terms the happy influence on the piety and spiritual strength of the churches of the new mission to Micronesia. The children of the missionaries have formed themselves into a Missionary Society.

Missionaries for the Pacific Coast.—A public meeting in reference to the departure of eight missionaries for the Pacific Coast, under commission from the American Home Missionary Society, was held at the Presbyterian Church, corner of Fourteenth-st. and Second-av., New York, on Sunday evening, Nov. 7. Statements and addresses were made by one of the Secretaries of the Society, Rev. Dr. Smith, Rev. G. H. Atkinson, of Oregon, and Rev. R. S. Storrs, Jr., of Brooklyn. These missionaries, with their families, making a party of twenty-two individuals, including children, were to sail from this port for San Francisco, in the Trade Wind. Six of these laborers are to be stationed in California, and the remaining two in Oregon. The names of missionaries are as follows: Rev. E. B. Walsworth, S. S. Harmon, S. B. Bell, James Pierpont, Thomas Condon, O. Dickinson, John G. Hale, and William C. Pond, son of Dr. Pond, of Bangor. Each is accompanied by his wife.

Statistics of the German Universities. The number of students in the twenty-eight Universities of Germany and Switzerland, during the recent summer term, was 18,810, of whom 17,060 were matriculated, and 1,750 not. The number of students averaged to each University 609. Sixteen institutions had less than this number; twelve more. 1,800 students pursued Catholic Theology in eleven Universities; 1,765 do. Protestant Theology in nineteen Universities; 6,761 do. divided among twenty-six institutions, studied jurisprudence and kindred sciences; 4,183 do. medicine, &c., in twenty-three Universities; and 2,644 do. in twenty-seven Universities studied philosophy, ancient languages, &c. The number of officers of instruction in these Universities is, in the aggregate, 1,666; there being 851 regular, 348 extraordinary, 40 honorary Professors, and 427 Tutors.

"Sunday Traveling."—Under this head one of our exchanges has the following:—

"More than 14,000 persons were carried over the Eighth Avenue Railroad, (N. Y.,) on a recent Sunday—yet the sun did not refuse to shine, nor was there any evidence that the heavens and earth were likely to be destroyed in consequence."

Sabbath Traveling.—From the same paper which furnishes the foregoing, we copy the following:—

"Hannah Shair fell between the platform and the cars, at the Providence depot, on Saturday afternoon, as the five o'clock train for New York was starting. She was bruised severely, and died of her injuries soon after, at the hospital."

Clergy Reserves in Canada.—The Quebec Chronicle gives the following return, lately obtained, showing how the Clergy Reserves Fund is now divided:—

Church of England, Upper Canada,	£12,646
" " Lower Canada,	2,173
" Scotland, Upper Canada,	7,114
" " Lower Canada,	1,096

Wesleyan Book Concern.—The General Conference of the Wesleyan Methodists, recently held at Syracuse, decided to remove their Book Concern, and their weekly paper, The True Wesleyan, from New York City to Syracuse. The saving in rent, expense of printing, &c., was a prominent reason for the change.

General Intelligence.

European News.

One week later news from Europe has been received; the substance of which we give below.

In England, preparations for the funeral of the late Duke of Wellington go on apace, partly under the superintendence of Mr. Cubit, the Engineer, who is charged with fitting up St. Paul's to accommodate the largest number of spectators. Windows along the proposed line of procession of the funeral cortege are already hired at almost fabulous prices, and a brisk business is doing in autographs of the deceased, at high prices.

Considerable feeling had been created in London by a fatal duel of two French refugees—one a Socialist, and friend of Louis Blace, the other a Red Republican, and friend of Ledru Rollin. They had challenged one another two years ago, but met in London only recently. The common misfortune did not unite them—the duel took place.

Another agrarian murder is reported in Kings's County, Ireland. W. R. Manifold, a land agent, was the victim. He was fired at from behind a hedge, and his head shattered by 34 slugs from a blunderbus.

After virtually accepting the Empire, by his speech at Bordeaux, Louis Napoleon has returned to Paris, there to await the more formal declaration of his new position. His entry into Paris, Saturday, 16th, passed off with the greatest éclat.

The Moniteur announces the liberation of Abd-el-Kader, who is to be conveyed to Broussa, in Turkey, with the honors due to his rank. He has sworn on the Koran never to disturb Algeria. Louis Napoleon himself communicated to Abd-el-Kader the news of his liberation. El-Kader will be pensioned by France.

An advertisement in the London Times of Tuesday, Oct. 19, calls for tenders to supply 1,200,000 kilograms Virginia leaf tobacco, 1,800,000 do. Kentucky, 1,350,000 do. Maryland, crops of 1851 and '52, for the use of the French Government. Tenders to be decided 10th January next, at Ministry of Finance, Paris.

Cardinal Wiseman has written to the Archbishops of the Austrian Empire, entreating them to contribute something toward the law expenses incurred by Dr. Newman in the Achilli affair.

The Univers has sent £1,000, the amount of subscription it has collected, toward repaying Dr. Newman for expenses in the suit vs. Achilli.

Typhus fever is raging with extraordinary violence at Thiers in the Puy-de-Dome. There are more than 800 persons, mostly women and children, lying ill at present in that small town.

A small vessel of about 100 tuns, called the Comte le Hon, about to be launched at Nants, is built of zinc, as an experiment of the adaptation of that metal to shipbuilding.

On the 30th ult., a fire in Smyrna destroyed 600 houses, inhabited by the poorer classes.

Another unsuccessful attempt has been made to lay a submarine cable from Portpatrick, Scotland, to Donaghadee, Ireland. This is the third attempt that has failed to cross the Irish Channel.

An extensive bed of Sulphur has been found between the village of Kench and the Red Sea, at the Strait called Bahar et Sefingue, Upper Egypt. It is about to be opened for commerce.

A skirmish had taken place in Algeria between the Ouled Mahbout Arabs and the French troops, respecting non-payment of tribute; fifty Arabs killed.

The trials of the persons implicated in the revolution in Naples in 1848 have just been concluded. Seven are condemned to death, and many to long periods of imprisonment.

The Russian Geographical Expedition to the Island of Kamschatka is at length organized. It consists of twelve persons, half of whom will set out this winter. The expedition will be absent about six years.

The Athenæum mentions that a letter has been received from Mr. Boyd Horsburg, who is in joint command of the expedition sent by the Colonial Government of New South Wales in search of Dr. Leichardt, the Australian traveler. There is reason to believe that Leichardt and his party were murdered at a spot 300 miles further inland than the searching expedition had reached.

The mail steamer Bosphorus, from Cape of Good Hope, Sept. 6th, arrived at Plymouth, Oct. 16th. Gen. Cathcart had returned from his expedition across the river Kei, having burned the camp of the Caffre chief Kreili, and taken 10,000 head of cattle, horses, &c. The General says that his object has been fully attained.

In 1849 a brief religious excitement was got up by a girl, who was supposed to work miracles, heal diseases, &c. &c. The house where she lived near the parade ground, corner of the Thier-Garten, Berlin, was beseiged by crowds, and a pilgrimage to the dwelling of the Wunderkind became almost a fashion. Within the last few days the girl, now 16 years old, has been arrested for a series of frauds and acts of swindling, in which she has displayed an unusual degree of cunning.

Two arrests have recently been made in Prussia on information forwarded to the Police from New York, of individuals sent to Europe to pass forged Prussian notes fabricated in America. One of them was arrested before he landed from the ship at Bremen, with a large amount of the forged paper in his possession. The other has just been taken at Düsseledrff, having arrived by another route. Every step of the forgers was regularly reported to the Berlin Police by a member of the band, and they were allowed to carry out their attempts only to fall into the hands of the authorities when the proof was ripe.

The Turkish Government acts with determination in behalf of those who have suffered from violence in its prisons. Last year three American citizens, Dr. Bacon and son, and Rev. M. Marsh, left Mosul to cross the Curd Mountains into Persia. On these mountains the inhabitants are little better than the Camanche Indians in the neighborhood of the Rocky Mountains. These gentlemen nearly lost their lives in some of the villages of the Curds, and escaped only after being robbed of all their effects and money. The American Legation made a representation in favor of the sufferers, and the Porte sent an order to the Governor General of the Province of Mosul to endeavor to find the robbers. Notwithstanding the wildness of the locality and the savage nature of the inhabitants, the authorities succeeded in apprehending the robbers, and in procuring 4,500 paistres for the losses sustained by the American travelers.

The Election.

The result of the election is doubtless known to most of our readers. Pierce and King, the Democratic candidates for President and Vice President of the United States, carried every thing before them. The electoral vote in their favor will probably exceed their highest expectations. Scott and Graham may receive fifty electoral votes, while all the rest will be cast for Pierce and King. The New York Courier and Enquirer says:—

"It is certain that Franklin Pierce was elected President of the United States, and almost as certainly by a majority unprecedented in any contested Presidential canvass since the establishment of our Government. He has beyond doubt received the votes of Maine, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Missouri, Maryland, Virginia, South Carolina, (by vote of Legislature,) Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Texas, amounting to 196 votes in the electoral college, and has probably received in addition the 58 votes of Ohio, Delaware, North Carolina, Florida, Louisiana, and California. General Scott has unquestionably obtained the 30 votes of Massachusetts, Vermont and Kentucky, and perhaps the 12 of Tennessee. In 1848, General Taylor had fifteen States and 163 votes in the electoral college; General Cass fifteen States and 137 votes in the electoral college. This change is truly extraordinary, but it has long been predicted, and therefore is not to be considered unaccountable.

"The majority given in this city for the democratic candidate is perfectly unexampled in our political annals, and insures the success of all the democratic tickets, Judicial, Municipal, and Congressional. Gov. Hunt runs considerably ahead of Gen. Scott in all parts of the State, but is doubtless defeated by a majority of several thousands."

The N. Y. Tribune gives the following list of Congressmen probably elected in the State of New York—those in italic being Whigs, and those marked * being re-elected:—

A Railroad in Broadway.—This great thoroughfare of New York is now so thronged with stages and private carriages as to make crossing it by foot passengers quite troublesome, if not dangerous. The way to relieve it has begun to be discussed in earnest. One plan, and perhaps the most feasible, is to lay a double-track railroad through Broadway, and exclude stages. The subject is now before a Committee of the Board of Aldermen, to whom persons interested are making their statements and appeals. At a recent meeting of that committee, it was stated that the following offers had been made for the privilege of laying down and using the railroad track.

FIRST OFFER—BY THOMAS A. DAVIS.

One million, in ten years, installments of one hundred thousand dollars each, for the privilege of laying down a railroad, at his own expense, according to plans to be furnished by the Common Council, and running 120 cars, or $833 33 for each car, charging three cents fare.

SECOND OFFER—BY OMNIBUS INTEREST.

To give $1,250 for the same privileges as above stated, for each car, making a total per annum of $150,000, or to charge five cents per passenger, and give one cent to the City.

THIRD OFFER—BY STEPHEN STORM.

To give for the same privileges as above stated, for each car, $1,666 66 and to charge the same fare as proposed by the petitioners, John Anderson and associates, making a total per year of $200,000, and for ten years of $2,000,000.

Melancholy Suicide—Love.—An inquest was held at the house of Mr. Henry Verplank, No. 107 West Twenty-fifth-st., New York, Nov. 4, upon the body of his daughter, Mary Verplank, 16 years of age, who died from the effects of arsenic, administered by herself for the purpose of self-destruction. The poison was taken on the 1st, while the deceased was with her father at Troy. On that day they left for New York, and while on board the steamboat Francis Skiddy, of which Mr. Verplank is pilot, the daughter was taken very ill, and then revealed to her father the fact of her having taken arsenic. Remedies were at once applied, but soon after the arrival of the boat at her dock, and while the daughter was being conveyed in a carriage to her father's house, she expired in his arms. It appears that the family had formerly lived in Albany, and while there, the deceased had been offered and had accepted the hand of a young man in marriage. He, however, having recently become heir to a considerable fortune, thought proper to break off the engagement. This so preyed upon the feelings of the girl, that she sought consolation in the poisoned cup.

Mr. Webster's Successor.—Hon. Edward Everett has accepted the office of Secretary of State, made vacant by the death of Daniel Webster. Mr. Everett was born in Boston, educated at Harvard University, studied for a Unitarian clergyman, but accepted instead the Professorship of Greek in Harvard, and in 1819 became editor of the North American Review, which he conducted for six years with marked ability. He was first sent to Congress from the Middlesex District in 1825, and served with distinction for the ensuing ten years. He was then chosen Governor of Massachusetts, which post he filled till 1839, when he was barely beaten by Marcus Morton, in consequence of the excitement created by the passage of the "Fifteen Gallon Law." In 1841, Gen. Harrison sent Mr. Everett to London as Minister. On his return, Mr. Everett was called to the Presidency of Harvard University, which post he resigned after filling it two or three years. He has not since held any public station until now. He was fifty-eight years of age last April. Probably no man in the Union is more thoroughly qualified for the important post to which he has so suddenly been called.

Delaware Negroes.—The Delaware Republican says that the suit of a free Delaware negro will take place in the State of North Carolina, during the present month, under the following circumstances: William Tillison was sold by order of the Court of Kent County, for some crime or misdemeanor, in 1840, for two months and one day. He was bought by Jacob R. Griffin. Mr. Griffin sold him to somebody; however, nothing was heard of him until it was found he was in the possession of Mr. T. A. Vastal, of Waynesburg, North Carolina, who purchased him about eighteen month since for $1,700. Tillison ran away from Mr. Vestal, and was caught again. Upon Mr. Vestal asking him why he ran away, he insisted that he was free, which led that gentleman to write to Dover for the facts; and he found, sure enough, that it was as Tillison, whose name had been changed to Tom Hyer, had stated, that he was legally entitled to freedom. This negro for the last twelve years has been unjustly held in Slavery. We are informed by those who have the best opportunities of knowing, that at least a negro a week is sold out of the State of Delaware. As the law forbids the sale of slaves out of the State, unless by an order from the Court, and as orders from the Court for such sales do not reach a tithe of that number, the excess are either kidnapped or sold illegally.

Aiding Fugitive Slaves.—The well-known case of Oliver and others against Daniel Cauffman, Stephen Wheatley, and Philip Brechtel, charged with harboring and assisting thirteen fugitive slaves to escape from their owners in Maryland, was decided in the U. S. Circuit Court of Philadelphia, on Saturday, Oct. 30, by the jury rendering a verdict for the plaintiffs in the sum of $2,800 damages, against Cauffman, and not guilty as to the other two defendants. The trial commenced on the 19th of last month, and the jury were locked up from Thursday morning until Saturday evening. This decision settles the fact that juries in the United States Courts in Pennsylvania will give verdicts against persons who aid in the escape of fugitive slaves.

Gray's Elegy.—The Providence Journal says: "We have not seen the coincidence any where noticed, that Mr. Webster was not the only great man to whose mind 'Gray's Elegy' has occurred on the eve of death, but we read that when Gen. Wolfe was moving at midnight in his boats to the attack on Quebec, with the shade of his approaching fate upon his mind, he repeated to his officers this poem, and at its close, said, 'Gentlemen, I had rather be the author of those lines than take Quebec to-morrow.' The parallel might be continued, for none can doubt, from the calm manner of Mr. Webster's departure, that he, like Wolfe, though in a far higher field of conflict, was also a conqueror even in death."

Interesting Relics.—The pulpit in which George Whitfield preached in England, was brought to this country a few days ago, and is now deposited at the Tract House, in the rooms of the New York City Tract Society. It is about six feet high, nearly square at the top, and is a light framework of hard wood, so as to be easily removed from one place to another, and stationed in the open air. It is easily put in a compact form by the operation of hinges, and held together by iron hooks. It was sent here by Mr. George C. Smith, of England. In another part of the Tract Society's building, is the chair once occupied by the "Dairyman's Daughter," and the "Shepherd of Salisbury Plain," who form the subjects of interesting narratives, widely known.

Attempt of a Female to Vote.—A female dressed in male attire presented herself on Tuesday, Nov. 2d, at the 4th Poll District of the XIXth Ward, New York, and wanted to deposit her vote. A bystander challenged her right to vote, when she declined to "kiss the book." The inspector, thinking her face to be rather smooth for a legal voter, and thinking it possible that she might be a female, requested her to take off her hat. She refused, alledging that she had a severe cold. A police officer, who was standing by, took the liberty of raising her hat, when her sex was at once discovered, and she left the poll amid the suppressed laughter of the bystanders.

An interesting slave case occurred in New York, on Saturday, Nov. 6. Eight negroes, male and female, were brought before Judge Payne, on a warrant taken out for the purpose of recovering them from the hands of their alledged owner, Jonathan Lemmon. The owner, representing his wife, the lawful inheritor of the slaves, as is claimed, proposed to take the party to Texas. It was argued, on behalf of the negroes, that having touched the free soil of this State, and being brought hither by the free consent of their alledged owner, they are entitled to their freedom. The case was adjourned.

On Sunday evening, Oct. 31st, Le Roy Barney, aged 21, a respectable citizen of Buffalo, was killed at Niagara Falls. The evening train had started for Buffalo, and he endeavored to catch it by running; he reached the front of the last car, and attempted to catch hold of the rails on each side of the steps, but caught only that nearest the carriage, with his right hand, when he was swung violently round, and the next second was hurried under the wheels, which passed over his head, crushing out his brains in the most frightful manner.

SUMMARY.

At Harrison Township, Warren Co., Ohio, on the evening of the 25th ult., Jeremiah Eskridge shot Mary Spangler, and, immediately after, placing the muzzle of the pistol against his chest, over the heart, discharged the contents of the other barrel, the ball passing through his heart, and lodging in his back, just under the skin. He was found with both hands clenched hold of the clothes over the wound. He struggled some three-quarters of an hour before he died. Eskridge had been paying attention to the girl for some months, she giving him little or no encouragement. He asked her mother for her in marriage, which she refused, saying she was too young, she being only some fourteen years of age. The girl, at last accounts, was improving rapidly, and it is supposed will recover.

In anticipation of the grand funeral procession in honor of the Duke of Wellington, there is a brisk trade in sites and seats. Near Temple Bar, Ludgate Hill, &c., the following prices prevail: East of Temple Bar—First floors, from 50 to 60 guineas; second floors, 30 to 40 guineas; third floors, 15 to 25 guineas; shop sittings, varying from 1 to 5 guineas. West of Temple Bar: First floors, 35 to 40 guineas; second floors, 20 to 35 guineas; third floors, 15 to 20 guineas; shop seats, from 1 to 3 guineas. In the Strand, for an attic room, 30 guineas. The Churchwardens of St. Mary's-le-Strand have erected covered seats on their vacant ground, for which they ask one guinea each.

The Literary Executors of Mr. Webster have made a formal demand for the unpublished letters of the great statesman for purposes of publication in the forthcoming volume of his letters and unpublished documents. The Executors refer to their legal rights in this matter, as the representatives of Mr. Webster, claiming that no publication of manuscripts from his pen can legally be made except through one channel. In return for the letters, of which copies are desired at an early day, they promise an early publication of such of them as may be deemed suitable. The document is signed by Messrs. Everett, Ticknor, Felton, and Curtis, and approved by Mrs. Webster and Mr. Fletcher Webster.

We learn from the Scientific American, that instantaneous portraits can now be taken on collodion by a very ingenious French invention. The person whose portrait is to be taken is placed at some distance off, in front of the lens, and the operator, while conversing with him, pulls a trigger. By so doing a newly-invented cap (obturateur) turns on its own axis, and in its rotary movement allows the light and the image of the sitter to pass through a hole twice the diameter of the lens. The portrait is obtained in the fraction of a second, and for quickness can only be compared to electricity.

A petition has been presented to the Vermont Legislature, from various persons in Brattleboro', asking for women the right to vote in school-meetings. Mrs. Nichols, the editress of the Windham County Democrat, was allowed to present the claims of the petitioners in the Representatives' Hall. She claimed that woman had been alienated from her true sphere, which was now too tame, and denied that naturally her sex was more dependent than the other. She claimed for woman the right to represent her property, and natural interests in her child, in overseeing its educational interests.

In Rochester, on Friday, Simeon J. Jocelyn recovered a verdict of $2550 against the Buffalo and Rochester Railroad Company. The plaintiff resides in New York, and was a passenger in one of the Company's trains from Rochester some two years since. The cars were thrown off the track just west of Rochester, and the plaintiff had the tendons of an arm severed, and was otherwise injured, for which damage the suit was brought.

Francis Becroft, a Revolutionary Soldier, died at Schoharie on the 2d inst., at 11 o'clock, A. M., aged 102 years. When his father was 105 and his mother 102 years of age, they mounted the same horse and together rode from Borst's Mill, in the town of Middleburgh, to visit a neighbor in the town of Schoharie, named Warner, two miles distant, without appearing to suffer materially from the fatigue. The family has always been noted for longevity.

It is said that an attempt is being made to form a company at New Orleans for the purpose of entering into the resewood trade. The projector owns a large tract of land near Guatuico, in the State of Ajaca, on the Pacific about 240 miles from Acapulco, which is covered with splendid rose trees from three to four feet in diameter. It can be delivered for shipment at a cost of $6 per ton, and is worth between $50 and $60 per ton of cubic feet.

The charges preferred against the Inspectors of the State Prison at Auburn, have been finally dismissed by Gov. Hunt. The Governor, after an examination of the evidence, decides that the Inspectors have been wanting in vigilance, and that abuses have been unduly tolerated, but that no sufficient cause of censure can be produced to warrant the removal of the parties from office.

A year ago, says the Nashua (N. H.) Telegraph, Ebenezer Bancroft, Esq., left a big potato in our office, which weighed one pound and three quarters. We afterwards gave it to another friend, one of the best farmers in the State, with a request that he would plant it, and make a note of the product. He now writes: I raised therefrom two bushels and three pecks. Three of the potatoes weighed two and a half pounds each.

At the late Fair of the Maryland Institute, the amount received during its continuance, for admission [illegible] was $12,500; to this are to be added the sums of $8,050 for new memberships, and about $50 from depositors who brought their goods after the Fair opened, making an aggregate sum of $20,600 received as the result of the exhibition.

The Richmond Whig says of the shock of an earthquake which visited that place on Tuesday night last, that the sensation was as if a heavily laden wagon was passing, creating a singular and uncontrollable nervous vibration. About 4 o'clock, P. M., a miniature hurricane swept by—the wind blew in whirlwinds, stripping the trees of their dying glories, accompanied by some little rain.

A City Ordinance has lately been passed in Lynn, Mass., by virtue of which any child between the ages of six and fifteen, not having any regular employment, and failing to attend school, on complaint at the Police Court, shall be fined not exceeding $10, or be sent to the House of Correction

Interesting intelligence is received from Mexico. Our dates are to the middle of October. The city of Mexico was in a ferment. The Extra Session of Congress had convened, and the cabinet ministers were on the point of impeachment. Opposition presses have multiplied, which ply the Government with reproaches and bitter attacks, and the condition of the country is more unfortunate than ever. The Government has authorized the arrest of all military personages who are destitute of passports.

Speaking of election, the Times says that in Madison and Oswego District, Gerrit Smith (F. S.) will have from 1,200 to 1,500 majority, according to the reported returns. This majority is made up in Madison County, where he resides; Oswego County giving his Democratic opponent only 38 majority. The Abolition vote for Hale, for President, was 2,058 in Oswego County, and probably as much more in Madison.

Mr. Webster expressed a strong desire before his death that his Marshfield and Franklin farms might remain in his family. He therefore constituted J. W. Paige and Franklin Haven of Boston, and Edward Curtis of New York, trustees, to hold the property for the benefit of his family. We understand that measures are being taken to remove all incumbrances from both places.

The Parkersburg (Va.) News states that recently the street in front of the Post-Office in that place was lighted up by the officers of the law, in setting fire to a huge pile of newspapers, which had been "reserved unto the day of fire," under sentence of condemnation for the Abolition sentiments they contained.

A curious decision has just been made by the Custom-House authorities of England, viz: that dead rabbits are poultry, and are therefore subject to an ad valorem duty of five per cent. They were not specified in Sir Robert Peel's tariff bill. Had they been admitted as dead meat, they would have been exempt from duty.

The Court of Errors of this State has decided, in the case of the Art Union, that it is against the law forbidding "every lottery, game, or device of chance, in the nature of a lottery," for the Art Union to distribute its pictures by lot; but that the pictures are not forfeited to the use of the poor by being offered for distribution.

The Herald publishes a table of the buildings erected or in progress in this city the present year. The whole number is 1,478, and the cost is $14,239,000. The greatest number in any one ward is 412 in the Eighteenth Ward, at a cost of $4,093,000. The cost of 27 buildings on Broadway is $1,990,000, averaging $73,000.

The area of bituminous coal mines in this country is estimated at 65,000 square miles, without including the yet unexplored region called "The Illinois Coal Field," extending from Michigan to Kentucky. About 1,750,000 tons of this coal are now mined yearly. The anthracite coal fields yield now upwards of five million tons annually.

Mary Jane, daughter of Emmor B. In Wirt, Allegany Co., N. Y., Nov. 1st, 1852, of bronchitis, Eliza I. M. Yapp, daughter of Samuel and Mary Yapp, aged 24 years and 10 days. She embraced religion some eight years ago, and became a member of the 3d Seventh-day Baptist Church of Genesee, where she belonged at the time of her death. For much of the time during six years past, she was afflicted with sickness, and deprived of the society of those with whom her name was associated, and of their privileges of public worship; but she found consolation, even upon a bed of sickness, that rendered her a bright example of piety; and when death came to summon her, she was amply ready to go. In that solemn hour she gave abundant evidence of being under the influence of a faith perfectly matured, and of a hope like an anchor to the soul.

Miscellaneous.

Home.

Home's not merely four square walls,
Though with pictures hung and gilded;
Home is where affection calls,
Filled with shrines the earth has builded!
Home—go watch the faithful dove,
Sailing 'neath the heaven above us—
Home is where there's one to love!
Home is where there's one to love us!

Home's not merely roof and room,
It needs something to endear it;
Home is where the heart can bloom,
Where there's some kind lip to cheer it!
What is home with none to meet,
None to welcome, none to greet us?
Home is sweet, and only sweet,
Where there's one we love to meet us!

"My Repose."

An advertisement to the following effect appeared in a daily paper some time ago:—"To be sold, in consequence of the death of the proprietor, that excellent villa, MY REPOSE," &c. Some particulars concerning the former owner of this property are deserving of notice.

A. T. was the son of poor parents, and, at an early age, began a life of industry as a gardener's boy. He was shrewd, sober and obedient, as well as industrious; and, by degrees, attained the station, first, of under-gardener, and then of head-gardener, at the seat of his first employer. He held this situation until past thirty years of age, when an accident, which in some degree disabled his right arm, together with the death of his patron, compelled him to relinquish it, and to seek some other means of support.

At this time he was far from being destitute. His habits had been frugal; and a legacy, added to his savings, enabled him to open a shop, in a considerable town, for the sale of seeds, plants and flowers.

T. carried with him into his new employment his old habits of industry and frugality. At the end of the first year the small capital with which he commenced business was increased; and before many years had passed he was able to purchase, with surplus savings, the house in which he carried on his trade.

During this time, also, he had married. But this change in his circumstances and position wrought no change in his character. He still plodded and toiled, and planned and executed his plans himself; and as his wife was equally industrious, his expenses were but little increased, while his means of meeting them also increased.

Years passed away, and T. was approaching the age of sixty. Providence had greatly prospered him; he was a rich man. His son, his only child, had grown up to manhood, and the father determined to relinquish business in favor of the young man, to pass the remainder of his life in easy retirement. With this end in view he purchased a few acres of ground, on one side of which he built a substantial dwelling, while he laid out the remainder of his purchase with the skill and taste of a landscape gardener. In a short time his arrangements were completed, and his house finished. His sixty-first birth-day was observed with unusual gaiety in the new abode.

"You must give your house a name," said one of T.'s guests on that occasion. "What do you mean to call it?"

"I have thought about it," replied Mr. T.; "and as we have been working hard all our lives till now, my wife and I have decided that 'My Repose' would be a good name. For now, you know, we mean to rest, and enjoy ourselves in our old age."

So the house of the retired tradesman thenceforth went by the name himself had chosen; and "My Repose" was carved on the freestone slab which surrounded the upper range of front windows. Let us see how this title agreed with facts.

For some months all went on as pleasantly as could be desired. Every day found full employment for A. T., in superintending his gardener, and perfecting his out-of-door plans; while the busy housewife was as fully occupied in arranging and re-arranging the newly acquired property within. True, this was not exactly the repose they had promised themselves; perhaps in the whole course of their lives the retired couple had never worked more incessantly or harder than during these few months. But this was a trifling drawback, which a little time would remove. Often, at the close of a day, when wearied with their exertions, they would encourage each other with the reflection that, when everything was brought into good order, they would have plenty of time on their hands for rest, and that then the house would deserve its name.

And this time came. Winter drew on apace. Short days succeeded to long ones; and long evenings to short ones. The season put a stop to gardening improvement; and every room in the house was in the most perfect order. Plenty of repose now! Yes, so much of it that time began to hang heavily upon the hands of the retired seedsman and his wife. This was a new feeling. For a little while they tried to exult in it, and to speak of it as the repose for which they so long yearned. But dissatisfaction followed. It was soon found that one thing in the world is as bad as constant labor; and of that one thing T., at least, had now his full. He was constantly idle.

With Mrs. T. it was somewhat different. She could knit all day long if she chose. At intervals, too, her repose was broken in upon by the care of her household. "Talk about rest," said she one day, when her patience and temper had been put to the test; "I am sure I had more of it when I did all my work with my own hands. Those servants are enough to worry me out of my life. 'My Repose,' indeed! a pretty name to give to such a house as this!" Spring came round at length, and released A. T. from his forced inaction by the fireside. But it brought with it to "My Repose" fresh causes of discomfort. When T. was in business there was no want of society for himself or his wife. Neighbors looked in almost every day, and enlivened the seedsman's parlor with their gossip. If it were but for five minutes, it was a relief from the monotony of labor. But now the case was different. Their old neighbors were neighbors no longer; and the new ones made no advances towards acquaintanceship. It was a source of great trouble to Mrs. T. that, though she lived within sight of many country villas of less pretension to grandeur than her own, not one of the owners, or rather tenants, of these inferior habitations had given her even a morning call. Mortified ambition is a sad disturber of repose.

Year after year thus passed away. The proud and enviable title remained. "My Repose" stared every passer-by in the face; and the really pretty, tasteful grounds excited the admiration of many who little guessed how slight an index is outward appearance to internal satisfaction. Often did T. ballance in his mind whether he had gained or lost, in real enjoyment of life, by the exchange of a close house in town and constant work, for a pleasant villa with repose. It was a knotty point which he could not solve.

With an increase of years came infirmities; and infirmities are powerful enemies to repose. To infirmities was suddenly added serious illness, and illness was the forerunner of death. Mrs. T. was first snatched away from her place of earthly repose, such as it had been. It was a striking comment upon the vanity of human wishes and human schemes, to see the mournful preparations for a burial in progress within a view of the high-sounding designation—"MY REPOSE."

Sad and solitary, the widower sought relief in travel. "My Repose" was no longer a place of repose to him. At best it had been an uneasy gratification; it was now a scene of torture. Time at length softened, though it did not remove his grief; and he returned to his deserted home. Alas; other sorrows were in store for him, which made his "Repose" an uneasy residence. His son, reversing the order of his own course, and beginning as himself had left off, had become embarrassed in business and deeply involved in debt. Too high-minded, as well as too kind to his only son, to suffer him to sink for want of immediate aid, T. at once interposed. But the sacrifice was large! and fears for the future stability of the young man destroyed his remaining quiet. O how did he then accuse himself for seeking to relieve himself by throwing off the trammels of trade! "MY FOLLY," he bitterly exclaimed, "would have been a better name for the house on which I was mad enough to spend a fortune, than 'MY REPOSE.'"

For a few months longer, T. might occasionally be seen wandering with downcast looks and faltering steps around his deserted mansion. But soon the mournful scene was closed. The bustle of a second funeral disturbed its quiet; the funeral procession was again formed, and wound through the well laid out shrubberies which surrounded the pretty villa. Ere sunset the grave was covered which had received that day the body of A. T.

And then, some few weeks after, appeared the advertisement above mentioned: "To be sold, in consequence of the death of the proprietor, that excellent villa, 'MY REPOSE.'"

There are some histories which, however indifferently told, convey with them their own instruction; and surely the history of "My Repose" is one such.

Mr. Webster on Farming.

The following letter, written by Daniel Webster in 1822, has been made public since his death. It will doubtless interest many of our readers:—

"WASHINGTON, March 13, 1822.

"JOHN TAYLOR: I am glad to hear from you again, and to learn that you are well, and that your teams and tools are ready for spring's work, whenever the weather will allow you to begin. I sometimes read books on farming; and I remember that a very sensible old author advises farmers 'to plow naked and sow naked.' By this he means that there is no use in beginning spring's work till the weather is warm, that a farmer may throw aside his winter clothes and rool up his sleeves. Yet he says we ought to begin as early in the year as possible. He wrote some very pretty verses on this subject, which, as far as I remember, run thus:

"'While yet the spring is young; while earth unbinds
The frozen bosom to the western winds:
While mountain snows dissolve against the sun.
And streams, yet new, from precipices run,
E'en in this early dawning of the year,
Produce the plow, and yoke the sturdy steer,
And goad him till he smoke beneath his toil,
And the bright share is buried in the soil.'

"John Taylor, when you read these lines, do you not see the snow melting, and the little streams beginning to run down the slopes of your Punch-brook pasture, and the new grass starting and growing in the trickling water, all green, bright and beautiful? And do you not see your Durham oxen smoking from heat and perspiration as they draw along your great breaking-up plough, cutting and turning over the tough sward in your meadow in the great field? The name of this sensible author is Virgil; and he gives farmers much other advice, some of which you have been following all the winter without even knowing that he had given it.

"'But when cold weather, heavy snow and rain,
The laboring farmer in his house restrain,
Let him forecast his work, with timely care,
Which else is huddled when the skies are fair;
Then let him mark the sheep, and whet the shining share,
Or hollow trees for boats; or number o'er
His sacks; or measure his increasing store;
Or sharpen stakes, and mend each rake and fork,
So to be ready, in good time to work—
Visit his crowded barns at early morn,
Look to his granary, and shell his corn;
Give a good breakfast to his numerous kine,
His shivering poultry and his fattening swine.'

"And Mr. Virgil says some other things, which you understand up at Franklin as well as ever he did:

"'In chilling winter swains enjoy their store,
Forget their hardships, and recruit for more;
The farmer to full feasts invites his friends,
And what he got with pains, with pleasure spends;
Draws chairs around the fire, and tells once more
Stories which often have been told before;
Spreads a clean table with things good to eat,
And adds some moistening to his fruit and meat;
They praise his hospitality, and feel
They shall sleep better after such a meal!'

"John Taylor, by the time you have got through this you have read enough. The sum of all is, be ready for your spring's work as soon as the weather becomes warm enough, and then put your hand to the plow and look not back.

DANIEL WEBSTER."

Poison Confectionery.

The papers give sad accounts of the colored confectionery in England. The following is from Household Words:—

"British confectionery contains plaster of Paris, chalk, starch, sulphate of barytes, bronze, copper leaf, leaf tin, arsenite of copper, carbonate of copper, verdigris, chromate of lead, orpiment, oxychloride of lead, red lead and vermillion. The minerals here named are all poisonous. Our bright yellow comfits contain a dangerous and insidious poison—chromate of lead, which is used also largely for giving the slight yellow tint to ginger lozengers. Let the British consumer, who has often, during the winter season a ginger lozenge in her mouth, not be surprised at a slight failing in her health. The emerald green sugar plums and ornaments in sugar have been colored with a still more dangerous poison—arsenite of copper. These mineral pills, offered to the young population of Great Britain, do their work. Dr. Letheby states that, to his knowledge, there have been 70 cases of fatal poisoning during three years, traced to the use of confectionery made and colored in this country."

Water-Proof Paints.

A writer in a late number of the Scientific American, who gives the initials of S. G., and dates at Lebanon, in this State, supplies us with the following information with regard to paints:—

Cheap and useful paint for roofs, walls, fences, outside plastering, &c., may be made by using tar, common tar or coal tar, made thin with spirits of turpentine. Let this be used instead of linseed oil, and to form the body add fine earthy matter, such as dried clay or soft burnt bricks ground fine in a plaster mill.

The soft shaly slates of different colors, like the 'Ohio Paint,' also answer a good purpose, when finely pulverized, to form the body of paint. For the coarsest kind of work, dry fine sandy loam may be used as a body. Any of these earthty bodies, when made sufficiently fine, can be used to good purpose in painting, either with the tar mixture or oil. Plastered walls on the outside of buildings may be thus rendered water-proof and lasting by using the above cheap paints, and after one or two coats, it will take but a small quantity of oil paint, with lead, to make a fine finish with a single coat of any desired color. Whenever a surface, thus rendered impervious by this cheap means, is painted over with oil and lead, a single coat upon a surface, instead of being absorbed, will dry in a thin tough film on the surface, and be more effective than three coats of the same paint put upon an unprepared surface, which, like that of common wood-work, absorbs the oil from the lead.

The Philosophy of a Little Carpet-Bag.

Among the most common of street sights is that of a gentleman hurrying along towards railway or river, bearing with him a little carpet-bag. So common is it that it fails to attract the slightest attention. A little carpet-bag is no more noted than an umbrella or a walking-stick in a man's hand; and yet, when rightly viewed, it is, to our thinking, an object of no ordinary interest. We feel no envy for the man on whom has devolved the charge of a heap of luggage. The anxiety attending such property outweighs the pleasure of its possession. But a man with a little carpet-bag is one in ten thousand. He is perhaps the most perfect type of independence extant. He can snap his fingers in the face of Highland porter extortionate. No trotting urchin is idle enough to solict the carrying of so slight a burden. While other passengers, by coach or railway, are looking after their trunks and trappings, he enters and has the best seat. He and his "little all" never part company. On arriving at their destination, they are off with jaunty swagger of uncumbered bachelorhood. In contemplating a gentleman with a carpet-bag, we are struck, to a certain extent, with an idea of disproportion; but the balance is all on the easy side. There is far too little to constitute a burden, and yet there is enough to indicate wants attended to and comforts supplied. No man with a little carpet-bag in hand has his last shirt on his back. Neither is it probable that his beard can suffer from slovenly overgrowth. When he retires to rest at right, the presumption is, that it will be in the midst of comfortable and cosy night gear. A little carpet-bag is almost always indicative of a short and pleasurable excursion. No painful ideas of stormy seas or dreadful accidents on far-off railway lines are suggested by it. Distance is sometimes poetically measured by "a small bird's flutter," or "two smokes of a pipe," or some such shadowy, though not altogether indefinite phrase. Why may not time, in like manner, be measured by two shirts? A gentleman with a little carpet-bag may be said to contemplate about a couple of shirts' absence from home.

Influence of a Newspaper.

A school teacher, who has been engaged a long time in his profession, and witnessed the influence of a newspaper upon the minds of a family of children, writes to the editor of the Ogdensburg Sentinel as follows:—

I have found it to be a universal fact, without exception, that those scholars of both sexes and of all ages, who have had access to newspapers at home, when compared with those who have not, are

1. Better readers, excelling in pronunciation and emphasis, and consequently read more understandingly.

2. They are better spellers, and define words with greater ease and accuracy.

3. They obtain a practical knowledge of geography, in almost half the time it requires others, as the newspaper has made them familiar with the location of the important places, nations, their governments and doings on the globe.

4. They are better grammarians, for having become so familiar with every variety of style, in the newspaper, from the commonplace advertisement to the finished and classical oration of the statesman, they more readily comprehend the meaning of the text, and consequently analyze its construction with accuracy.

5. They write better compositions, using better language, containing more thoughts, more clearly and connectedly expressed.

6. Those young men who have for years been readers of the newspapers, are always taking the lead in the debating society, exhibiting a more extensive knowledge upon a greater variety of subjects, and expressing their views with greater fluency, clearness and correctness in their use of language.

GREAT RAILROAD TUNNEL.—We see by the Cincinnati papers at their great tunnel is advertised for letting. The hills on the north side of the city rise about 200 feet above the upper plains of the town, obstructing, except in one direction, the free access of railways to the upper part of the town. A company has been formed to tunnel the hill, for the benefit of all the railways approaching from the Ohio side. This tunnel will be 6,000 feet in length, and will have 2,000 feet of side cuttings. It is intended to lay it with four tracks, and thus provide free and safe entrance into the city for six or eight different railways, who will each contribute to its receipts, and thus make it very profitable stock. The enterprise is a great one, and will prove eminently useful.

Paper-Hanging.

Many a fever has been caused by the horrible nuisance of corrupt size used in paper-hanging in bed-rooms. The nausea which the sleeper is aware of on waking in the morning, in such a case, should be a warning, needing no repetition. Down should come the paper, at any cost or inconvenience; for it is an evil which allows of no tampering. The careless decorator will say that time will set all right—that the smell will go off—that airing the room well in the day and burning some pungent thing or other at night, in the meantime, will do very well; but health, and even life, may be lost in the interval. It is not worth while to have any one's stomach impaired for life, or one's nerves shattered, for the sake of the cost and trouble of papering a room, or a whole house, if necessary. The smell is not the grievance, but the token of the grievance. The grievance is animal putridity, with which we are shut up, when this smell is perceptible in our chambers. Down should come the paper; and the wall behind should be scraped clear of every particle of its last covering. It is astonishing that so lazy a practice as that of putting a new paper over an old one should exist to the extent it does. Now and then an incident occurs which shows the effect of such absurd carelessness. Not long ago, a handsome house in London became intolerable to a succession of residents, who could not endure a mysterious bad smell which pervaded it when shut up from the outer air. Consultations were held about drains, and all the particulars that could be thought of, and all in vain. At last a clever young man, who examined the house from top to bottom, fixed his suspicions on a certain room, where he inserted a small slip of glass in the wall. It was presently covered, and that repeatedly, with a sort of putrid dew. The paper was torn down, and behind it was found a mass of old papers, an inch thick, stuck together with their layers of size, and exhibiting a spectacle which we will not sicken our readers by describing.

Ruins of an Ancient City.

Capt. Alfred K. Fisher, of this town, informs us, says the Edgartown (Mass.) Gazette, that when on his last whaling voyage, in the ship America, of New Bedford, (which was about eight years ago,) he had occasion to visit the island of Tinian, (one of the Ladrone Islands,) to land some sick men. He stopped there some days. One of his men, in his walks about the island, came to the entrance of the main street of a large and splendid city, in ruins. Capt. Fisher, on being informed of the fact, entered the city by the principal street, which was about three miles in length. The buildings were all of stone, of a dark color, and of the most splendid description. In about the center of the main street, he found twelve sound stone columns, six on each side of the street; they were about forty-five or fifty feet in height, surmounted by cap-stones of immense weight. The columns were ten feet in diameter at the base, and about three feet at the top. Capt. Fisher thinks the columns would weigh about sixty or seventy tons, and the cap-stones about fifteen tons. One of the columns had fallen, and he had a fine opportunity to view its vast proportions and fine architecture. From the principal street, a large number of other streets diverged. They were all straight, and the buildings were of stone. The whole of the city was entirely overgrown with cocoanut trees, which were fifty and sixty feet in height. In the main street, pieces of common earthenware were found. The island has been in possession of the Spaniards for a long time. Six or seven Spaniards resided on the island when Capt. Fisher was there. They informed him that the Spaniards had had possession about sixty years; that they took the island from the Kanackas, who were entirely ignorant of the builders of the city, and of the former inhabitants. When questioned as to the origin of the city, their only answer was, "There must have been a powerful race here a long time ago." Capt. Fisher also saw on the island immense ledges of stone, from which the buildings and columns had evidently been erected. Some portions of them exhibited signs of having been worked.

THICK WALL.—The London correspondent of the National Intelligencer says the British Government are constructing at Dover an artificial harbor for the safety of shipping. It is to consist of a space of seven hundred acres, is to be inclosed by a wall more than two miles in length; more than half of which space will at all times secure a depth of water from thirty to forty-two feet at the lowest tide. The wall will be ninety feet wide at the bottom, and fifty feet at the top; the sides will be eighteen feet thick, and consist of immense blocks of solid stone, the middle filled in with artificial stone or concrete. The foundation of this stupendous work is now laying by companies of men who remain several hours, with diving bells, under the water. This gigantic display of human power and skill will, when fully completed, cost more than two millions sterling.

JOINT LITERARY LABOR.—When the committee of the French Academy were employed in preparing the well-known academy dictionary, Cuvier, the celebrated naturalist, came one day into the room where they were holding a session. "Glad to see you, M. Cuvier," said one of the forty; "we have just finished a definition which we think quite satisfactory, but on which we should like to have your opinion. We have been defining the word crab, and have explained it thus: 'Crab, a small red fish, that only walks backwards.'" "Perfect, gentlemen," said Cuvier, "only, if you will give me leave, I will make one small observation in natural history. The crab is not a fish, it is not red, and it does not walk backwards; with these exceptions your definition is excellent."

SINGULAR DEATH.—A death occurred at the New Market, St. Louis, on Wednesday morning, 13th ult., under circumstances of a most singular character. Mrs. Sarah Jane Bolton, while passing through the market, accidentally lost her pocket-book. It was picked up soon after by a German woman, named Mrs. King, who returned it to the owner. She opened the pocket-book, examined it, and declared that Mrs. King had taken $10 of the money. The latter seemed much confused, and denied it. Mrs. Bolton then threatened that she would have her arrested and searched, when Mrs. King fell dead at her feet. The death was as sudden as has ever been known. Mrs. King was the wife of a steamboat man, and the mother of several children.

A PICTURE OF INTEMPERANCE.—The Cincinnati Times, of the 22d ult., says: Day before yesterday, Esquire Rowekamp, who is the Overseer of the Poor for the Ninth Ward, was called upon to visit an Irish family residing in an alley, between Abigail and Woodward, Main and Sycamore-sts. On entering the house, he found the father and husband, James Jackson, on the floor, apparently dead. When first discovered he was reclining on a trunk, with his throat resting upon the sharp edge of the back of a chair. Near him, upon the floor, lay his wife, insensibly drunk, and between them the cause of this horrible scene, a whisky jug, entirely emptied of its contents. In one corner of the room lay their oldest child, a girl about five years of age, dead!—and upon the bed lay an infant, crying in vain for its mother. It was the cries of the infant which at first attracted the attention of the neighbors to the spot. The parents had undoubtedly permitted the little girl to drink to an excess to cause her death. A physician was called in, who thought that life was not quite extinct in the man. Remedies were applied, but they failed to restore him. His position, it is supposed, caused his death, he being strangled by the pressure of his throat against the chair. An emetic, administered to the wretched wife and mother, soon restored her to consciousness.

NILE DISCOVERY.—Mr. Rolle, who early in last winter had gained a point on the White Nile within 4½ degrees of the equator, has sent back an account of his discoveries, with a map, which has reached the French Geographical Society. It appears from his account that the upper part of the Nile channel is surrounded by great mountains, which extend eastwardly from the southern Abyssinian range far toward the center of the Continent in a line curving to the south. In these mountains are nourished the many streams whose reservoirs supply the inundations of the Nile, continuing as they do for months. Mr. Rolle finds in that country the tradition of a white people who formerly brought merchandise from the South; he supposes that these traders were Portugese, and that they crossed the mountains by some pass which is yet to be discovered.

NEW MODE OF PAYING POSTAGE.—The Post-Office Department has made a contract with George F. Nesbitt, of this City, for a great number of Envelops, to be used instead of stamps for prepayment of postage, in accordance with a provision added to the Post Route bill at the late Session of Congress. These convenient little wrappers will consist of three sizes—Note, Letter and Official. The denominations will be three, six, and twenty four cents; the latter intended for foreign correspondence. They will be self-sealing, and bear a stamp similar in style to the English stamped envelop, and are expected to be in all respects equal thereto. As the dies are yet to be prepared, and the paper to be manufactured exclusively for this important purpose, it is probable that the envelops will not be put in circulation before the first of January next.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations o metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country. OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

The Universal Observance of the Sabbath in Millennial Times.

Such intimations are surely proof sufficient of the purpose of God to maintain the integrity of His covenant, and to hold Israel perpetually responsible for the observance of the ordinances so given unto them. Our citations testify, in language clear and decisive, their continued obligation. And although it may be objected, that the words "for ever" do not always, or necessarily, imply absolute perpetuity, (being used in reference to the life-time of a servant or willing slave, Deut. xv. 17,) yet is it to be observed, that the truth of this remark does not affect, for our argument, the value of the testimony adduced. We seek not here to extend the meaning of the phrase beyond the period of Israel's existence as a people; but we do maintain, that coeval with their national existence—so long as they remain a people—"throughout their generations"—so long must these statutes of Jehovah remain imperative upon them.

An instructive illustration of the meaning and force of God's everlasting covenant in Israel's favor, is furnished in the inspired record of another covenant, also of perpetual continuance, and which embraces all mankind. The same term, "the everlasting covenant," is used in reference to the divine pledge to Noah, for himself and his posterity, that the earth shall not again be destroyed by the waters of a flood—"The covenant," said God, "which I make between me and you, and every living creature that is with you, for perpetual generations. I do set my bow in the cloud, and it shall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth." "And the bow shall be in the cloud; and I will look upon it, that I may remember the everlasting covenant between God and every living creature of all flesh that is upon the earth." Gen. ix. 12, 13, 16. Here, then, we have the definition of the "everlasting covenant" with all flesh, as being "for perpetual generations," of which the token—the "bow in the cloud" —has, in this present day, its colors as bright and beauteous as when first the covenant was established, four thousand years ago; and the terms of that covenant point forward to the whole future period of human existence, as capable of being affected by the waters of a flood. This is distinctly expressed: "Neither shall all flesh be cut off any more by the waters of a flood; neither shall there any more be a flood to destroy the earth." ver. 11.

But it is not merely that the terms of this covenant illustrate that made with Abraham, in behalf of himself and his posterity, but the certainty of the one is made the ground of assurance of the stability of the other. In the language of prophecy, speaking of their yet future blessing, God addresses Israel by Isaiah, saying, "In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment; but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the Lord thy Redeemer. For this is as the waters of Noah unto me; for as I have sworn that the waters of Noah should no more go over the earth, SO HAVE I SWORN that I would not be wroth with thee, nor rebuke thee. For the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed, but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee." Is. liv. 8—10. In both cases, the covenant is everlasting; both are declared to be perpetual; and as the one is made with all flesh, so is the other with Abraham and his seed throughout their generations. The token of the one covenant is in the cloud, that of the other in the flesh of those who are party to it.

As God thus continues to remember His covenant with the Father of the faithful, so He requires still the maintenance of its token. Irrespective, indeed, of these decisive testimonies, it is difficult to conceive, had Israel remained faithful—had they not by their grievous transgressions provoked the Lord to scatter them from their land—that there could have been any doubt as to the abiding obligation under which, by the covenant, they were laid. And although God rejects their false confidences, and for departure from Him prevents their present possession of that land, obedience to the divine ordinance is not canceled, either by their unfaithfulness, or the punishment which it has entailed. Its sanctions still abide; and, while the very terms of their law confine in part its observances to the temple in Jerusalem, still, even in their wide-spread dispersion, fidelity to its requirements is demanded, in the measure which their circumstances admit. Thus, the Sabbath they are bound to remember, to keep it holy, though the Sabbath sacrifices they cannot offer.

Moses has very expressly commanded, "Now therefore hearken, O Israel, unto the statutes, and unto the judgments, which I teach you, for to do them, that ye may live, and go in and possess the land which the Lord God of your fathers giveth you. Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish aught from it, that ye my keep the commandments of the Lord your God, which I command you." "Keep, therefore, and do them," he again enjoins, "for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the Lord our God is in all things that we call unto Him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day? Only take heed to thyself, and keep thy soul diligently, lest thou forget the things which thine eyes have seen, and lest they depart from thy heart all the days of thy life; but teach them to thy sons, and thy sons's sons; specially the day that thou stoodest before the Lord thy God in Horeb, when the Lord said unto me, Gather me the people together, and I will make them hear my words, that they may learn to fear me all the days that they shall live upon the earth, and that they may teach their children." Deut. iv. 1—10.

There is here no indication of these statutes being designed to be of a temporary character. Declared to be all "righteous," it is required that they be taught to the people of Israel "all the days that they shall live upon the earth." Other nations, even, should see and acknowledge the righteousness and the wisdom of these statutes and judgments, as developed before them in the example of the chosen people. Often were they reminded by their venerated Lawgiver of the covenant obligations, and urgently called to continued faithful observance of the law of the Lord, in all its details, so long as they should exist—neither adding nor diminishing. "Know, therefore," he again enjoins, "that the Lord thy God, he is God, the faithful God, which keepeth covenant and mercy with them that love him, and keep his commandments, to a thousand generations; and repayeth them that hate him to their face, to destroy them; He will not be slack to him that hateth him; he will repay him to his face. Thou shalt therefore keep the commandments, and the statutes, and the judgments, which I command thee this day, to do them. Wherefore, it shall come to pass, if ye hearken to these judgments, and keep and do them, that the Lord thy God shall keep unto thee the covenant and the mercy which He sware unto thy fathers." Deut. vii. 9—12.

The promise of blessing upon their obedience, thus given, is amplified in the context; and similar promises are repeated conditionally on their obedience, while severe threatenings are also denounced against their violation of the divine law. "Ye shall keep my Sabbaths, and reverence my sanctuary; I am the Lord. If ye walk in my statutes, and keep my commandments, and do them, then I will give you rain in due season, and the land shall yield her increase, and the trees of the field shall yield their fruit," &c. "But if ye will not hearken unto me, and will not do all these commandments; and if ye shall despise my statutes, or if your soul abhor my judgments, so that ye will not do all my commandments, but that ye break my covenant; I also will do this unto you; I will even appoint over you terror, consumption, and the burning ague, that shall consume the eyes, and cause sorrow of heart; and ye shall sow your seed in vain; for your enemies shall eat it," &c. "And I will scatter you among the heathen, and will draw out a sword after you; and your land shall be desolate, and your cities waste. THEN shall the land enjoy her Sabbaths, as long as it lieth desolate, and ye be in your enemies' land; even then shall the land rest, and enjoy her Sabbaths. As long as it lieth desolate it shall rest; because it did not rest in your Sabbaths, when ye dwelt upon it." Lev. xxvi. 2—13; 14—32; 33—35.

So, again, "And it shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe and to do all His commandments which I command thee this day, that the Lord thy God will set thee on high above all nations of the earth. And all these blessings shall come on thee, and overtake thee, if thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God. Blessed shalt thou be in the city, and blessed shalt thou be in the field." "The Lord shall establish thee an holy people unto Himself, as he hath sworn unto thee, if thou shalt keep the commandments of the Lord thy God, and walk in His ways. And all people of the earth shall see that thou art called by the name of the Lord; and they shall be afraid of thee." "And the Lord shall make thee the head, and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath; if that thou hearken unto the commandments of the Lord thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and to do them; and thou shalt not go aside FROM ANY of the words which I command thee this day, to the right hand, or to the left, to go after other gods to serve them." Deut. xxviii. 1—14.

On the other hand, curses of every description are threatened against them, if in any thing they should disregard and depart from any part of the law. "It shall come to pass, if thou wilt not hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe to do all His commandments and his statutes, which I command thee this day, that all these curses shall come upon thee and overtake thee. Cursed shall thou be in the city, and cursed shalt thou be in the field." And having specified an awful amount and diversity of judgments, including their being cast out of the promised land, Moses exclaims, "Moreover, all these curses shall come upon thee, and shall pursue and overtake thee, till thou be destroyed; because thou hearkendst not unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to keep his commandments and his statutes which he commanded thee. And they shall be upon thee for a sign and for a wonder, and upon thy seed forever." "The Lord shall scatter thee among all people, from the one end of the earth even unto the other." Deut xxviii. 15—16; 45, 64. All these evils, with which they were threatened, and which have overtaken them, is the punishment of their violation of the divine law—the whole law—as given unto them by Moses. Before they entered their land they were forewarned of the danger of their going aside from any of the commandments then given unto them. The curse truly hath come upon them, to their being cast out of their land; it hath even followed them into all the lands of their captivity. It is upon them still, and that because they would not observe to do all the commandments of the Lord. (To be continued.

GREATNESS.

BY JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

There never yet was flower fair in vain,
  Let classic poets rhyme it as they will;
The seasons toil that it may blow again,
  And summer's heart doth feel its every ill.
Nor is a true soul ever born for nought;
  Wherever any such hath lived and died,
There hath been something for true freedom wrought,
  Some bulwark leveled on the evil side.
Toil on, then, Greatness! Thou art in the right,
  However narrow souls may call thee wrong;
Be as thou wouldst be in thine own clear sight,
  And so thou wilt in all the world's ere long;
For worldlings cannot, struggle as they may,
From man's great soul one great thought hide away.

THE CHINA MISSION.

Some farther extracts from the letters received by the Board from our missionaries, have been prepared by the Corresponding Secretary, and are herewith submitted. Bro. Carpenter's letter of April 4 acknowledges the remittances made to them, and then adds:—

"These two remittances have afforded gratifying and substantial evidence of the interest felt among our brethren for the poor heathen, and in our poor labors among them. By these tokens we do feel greatly encouraged, and hope to be able to labor to better advantage, and more directly, for the salvation of souls, than we have been able to do for many months past. For this privilege, we desire to thank God, gird up the loins of our mind, put on the whole armor of God, the tried and approved armor of the Christian warfare, and march up to the contest with redoubled effectiveness. May God help us so to do.

"Since sending my last to the Board, I have, a part of the time, felt an unusual burden on my heart for the poor heathen. Their New-Year holy-days have afforded us a better opportunity than we ever enjoyed before to witness the childishness, the vanity, and the pride of this deluded people. Indeed, we could not have avoided witnessing these things, to a heart-sickening degree, unless we had closed our eyes, and especially our ears, for a month together, dwelling as we do in the most dense part of the city. But I cannot now particularize. I knew not of this opportunity to send by way of San Francisco, till it was too late for me to write much."

"Three days ago, we received a large box by the Horatio, also letters and papers. The letters generally are of an unusually interesting character. Some of them breathe sentiments that are calculated to thrill the soul with delight, and have not failed to produce that effect. Surely, 'as cold water to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far country.'"

The extracts which follow are from a letter dated the 7th of June, received by overland mail. The intention of the writer was, that it should reach here in time for the Annual Meeting, but by some mismanagement it was detained on the route, and was not received till the 3d of Oct.

"The Lord is favoring us with a comfortable degree of health. Mrs. C. is just recovering from a severe cold. Almost the slightest exposure to the damp tile floors of the natives, even in a dry time, is too much for her. Even a floor of boards near the ground, with no plastering underneath, or something equivalent, would be intolerable for her in this climate. Such has been the effect upon her constitution of a change of residence from the hill country of her native land to the plain of Shanghae."

"Circumstances have occurred recently at Ningpo, that go to show that there are Chinese possessed of some energy of character, and some respect for their rights. As is often the case, the taxes became onerous on account of the overreaching avarice of the mandarins. The people in some districts, unwilling to bear it longer, proceeded to Ningpo, and after making a respectful representation of their grievances to the authorities, not succeeding in a peaceable way in obtaining their rights, proceeded in a very orderly way to take the officers, put them in custody, and destroy their dwellings and effects by fire. After this, they released the officers, who, in attempting to obtain redress by an armed force, were treated with more severity than before. What a mercy to China, if some foreign power would come and establish a republican form of government. Then we might expect to see progress in all that is noble. But I must not meddle with the politics of the country. It is, mainly as they stand connected with the progress of the spirit of free inquiry, (that is, with the spirit of the Gospel,) that I feel any interest in them.

"I understand that an American fleet is on its way to Japan. Should it succeed in establishing an unrestrained intercourse, will the Board attempt to rescue the Cross from its degraded position in that country? Shall our next missionary to the East be directed to settle in Japan, or Shanghae? If two brethren could go together, I am by no means sure that they should not take that field as early as possible. Why should we not avail ourselves of the advantage of being early on the ground? And what would our people think of such an enterprise? Would there not be many who could afford to deny themselves a little more than they have ever yet done, for the sake of sounding the gospel among the hills and vallies and the crowded villages of Japan? But we must wait for the wheels of time to roll us round the happy day when the mighty barriers of a proud seclusion shall be broken down.

"In October, 1850, we sent a letter and a set of tracts to the Rev. Mr. Bettleheim, missionary at the Loo-Choo Islands, and Japan became the carrier of the package. It actually passed through Japan, was noted with a variety of inscriptions, and was delivered to Mr. B., in May, 1851, by a Japanese, under an escort of a government officer. They reported to Mr. B., that the junk which bore our letter had been driven by storms to the Paore Island, which is one of the group called La-ka-doo. Next day after the reception of our package, he replied, and sent off his letter, but it was taken back to him. Two months after, it was sent off again, and taken back once more; both times under the pretense, that the Japanese captain dare not take it. Finally, it was sent off the third time, and via Japan reached Shanghae in about six months from its date."

"Our cook Le-Chong, and his son, are at home, at present, on a visit. The father gives gratifying evidence of being steadfast in the faith, and the son is making good progress in the language, and in the knowledge of the Scriptures. Upon the whole, he is a promising child. Brother Tong is the same meek, beloved disciple, that he has ever been, since his baptism. His piety resembles, not so much the mountain torrent, which to-day rushes down the steep declivity, and to-morrow is no more, as it does the deep rill that pursues its way noiselessly through the valley, clothing its banks with living verdure. Wang-Yuen-Sa is a heath in the desert, that knoweth not when good cometh. He went out from us, or rather was cast out, because he was not of us.

"As to my poor labors, I cannot say much. Since my last report, I have tried to preach about twice a week, on an average, in the Chapel, and occasionally at Sah-hwa-jau, the place I used to visit frequently, just before we commenced building. I have no very cheering things to say about the success of my feeble efforts. At present, we are obliged to walk by faith, not much by sight. And so it may be for a long time to come. If indeed we walk by faith, we shall not lose our reward. Is it not wisely ordered, that the best of causes must be promoted by the exercise of the best graces? We must exercise a vigorous faith, both at home and abroad; and our faith must be tried, what sort it is, and afterwards there will be fruit. This is certain; for He that said, Go, teach all nations, and, Lo, I am with you always, said also, My word shall not return unto me void. We are only prepared to engage in his service, when we reckon the object to be attained worthy of any sacrifice. Our duty is among those things which are revealed, and belong to us, and to our children, forever. But the consequences are safe in the hands of God, and we may not be too anxious to know them beforehand. Perhaps one of those consequences will be, that the gospel we preach will, to the majority of our hearers, prove a savor of death unto death. Nevertheless, it mnst be preached. Infinite Wisdom has decided in favor of it. And while a sense of our responsibility should lead us to take heed to ourselves, and to the ministry we have received, it should not close our lips.

"But it is a matter of positive encouragement, that, in the good providence of God, we are enabled to obtain the ears of some. We often have fifty or sixty in our congregation, and generally good attention. If not good attention, we regard ourselves as in the fault.

"There is need of men here, who, with manly piety and manly wisdom, can go in and out before this observing people. One such man is worth a score of indifferent ones. When this mission shall be reinforced, send us a man. I care not where you find him, whether he be following the plough, or in one of the highest institutions of learning."

"SAFE! SAFE! SAFE!"

A Missionary Fact.

Neither men nor nations truly enjoy the gifts of God, unless they share them with their fellow creatures. It affords more enjoyment to witness the pleasure created by an act of benevolence, than it is possible to derive from any degree of selfish indulgence. Man grows godlike when he gives; and in giving, tastes the pure nectar of divine bliss. Property itself acquires sanctity, when used to elevate and bless mankind. As saith the poet,

"But gold—earth's demon when unshared—receives God's breath, and grows a god, when it relieves."

And nowhere are proofs of these remarks more abundant than in the great garden of missionary toil. We give a fact, by way of illustration, which we heard related in a missionary prayer meeting.

A new England whale ship foundered in a gale, some years since, in the Pacific. Her crew took to the boats, and after toiling for several days and nights, two of the boats came in sight of an island. One of them was run through the surf, and the crew jumped on shore, making signs to the natives to express their destitute condition. But no pity dwelt in those savage breasts. Rushing upon the exhausted seamen with their clubs, they instantly killed them and made preparations to feast upon their bodies; for they were cannibals.

Seeing the fate of their companions, the other boat's crew pulled hastily away from that dreadful spot, and after almost incredible suffering, were picked up by a friendly vessel and saved.

Some years passed away, and another ship was wrecked in the same seas, and near that island. Her commander had been second mate of the former ship, and was saved with the boat's crew which witnessed the destruction of their shipmates by the cannibals. Again he approached the island, a wrecked mariner, and reduced by hunger and exhaustion to a feeble and emaciated state. He recognized the fatal shore, and told his companions of the cannibals who dwelt beyond it. But they were too weak to put out to sea again. To do so was to die. They could but die, if they landed, and perhaps the savages might be merciful. They landed, therefore, though in great fear. Perceiving none of the natives, they hauled their boat up on the beach, and sought the shelter of the adjacent woods, in the hope of finding fruits or berries for subsistence. But once in the woods, their fears increased. They moved stealthily along, alarmed at the cracking of the dry branches beneath their feet, and at every unusual rustling of the leaves. Death seemed to speak in every sound, and to leer upon them through every opening glade of the forest. Cold sweats gathered on their sunbrowned brows, and more than once they halted, and consulted on the propriety of returning to their boat. But, as often they resolved to advance, especially as they found themselves ascending a wooded hill, which they hoped might furnish them a nook or cave in which to hide. Thus trembling, they proceeded. They approached its summit, which was bold and rocky. The foremost of the party ventured from the shelter of the trees to view the island. Cautiously he stole, step by step, to the mountain's brow, until his eye caught sight of the village below. Then he literally sprang into the air, clapped his hands, and shouted, "Safe! safe! SAFE!"

"What is the matter?" asked his companions, who thought him crazy.

"We are safe, I tell you! We are safe!" he replied, pointing to the village on the plain below.

Looking down, the now joyful seamen beheld a church, lifting its modest front above the huts of the natives. Then they shared in the transports of their companion. They leaped, they wept, they embraced. They knew by that church the missionary was there. They knew that where he lived cannibalism must be dead. They accordingly descended to the plain and found, instead of a cruel death, a hearty, generous hospitality.

This fact beautifully exhibits the power of benevolent effort to create blessing. For was it not the gold of the good in Christian England and America, sanctified to holy uses, that transformed that island and its inhabitants from barbarism to moral beauty? True, the Holy Ghost, acting with truth and the living preacher, was the agent; but it was sanctified gold, the gift of benevolent hearts, that sent those instruments, and led to that delightful result. Could the donors have purchased as much enjoyment for themselves in any other way, as they derived from the knowledge that God had blessed these gifts, and caused them to yield such glorious fruitage? Let us learn, then, to diffuse the gifts of God; to grow godlike in our benevolence, that we may grow heavenly in our joys. [Zion's Her.

GIVING—IS IT A GRIEF OR A GRACE?

What! Is giving a grace? So the Apostle regards it. He associated it with faith and utterance and knowledge and love and all diligence. He evidently regarded it an important grace, nay, an indispensable one. By it he would test the sincerity of love. He seems to say that there cannot be any genuine love where this grace is lacking. Another apostle says this explicity and emphatically. "But whoso hath this world's goods, and seeth his brother hath need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" But to have this grace is not sufficient. The Apostle would have all to abound in it, yea, to "abound more and more." Reader, do you do this? Some do it. In view of the loud calls for help in different places in the unevangelized portions of the world, some, whose income has not increased during the past year, have added one-third to their contributions of the previous year, and some one-half, and some did even more than that; and at the same time not diminished their contributions to other benevolent objects. But all have not abounded "more and more." Some are doing less and less. And why? One said, "My expenses have been so great during the year, I cannot do as much as I have done." And for what were those increased expenditures? Not for the greater demands made for the education of children—not for sickness or any visitation of Providence? What then? The neighbors thought that it had arisen from having forgotten what Peter has said about "outward adorning and plaiting the hair and wearing of gold and of putting on of apparel." All thought she wore enough gold before, and had apparel enough, and that which was good enough. But it seems she thought differently. And so she paid twenty dollars for her bracelets, and fifty dollars for a shawl, and in her compassion for the poor dying heathen, and in her burning zeal to have missionaries sent to those places in Turkey from which such loud calls have come from the converted Armenians, she gave one dollar! Only think of it! One dollar, to save the dying Armenians, and twenty dollars for bracelets to adorn the wrists! Nor is she singular. Indeed, some who are abundantly able have done nothing. In some churches nearly one-half have done nothing either for the Foreign or Home Missionary cause, nor have they abounded in their gifts to other benevolent objects. Do such agree with the Apostle, and regard giving as a grace? I fear not. I fear that with many giving is a grief and not a grace.

GUTZLAFF ON CHINA.

Foreigners, who know nothing about the internal state of the country, are apt to imagine that there reigns lasting peace. Nothing is, however, more erroneous; insurrections of villages, cities, and districts are of frequent occurrence. The refractory spirit of the people, the oppression and embezzlement of the mandarins, and other causes, such as dearth and demagogues, frequently cause an enexpected revolt.

In these cases, the destruction of property and hostility against the rulers of the land—especially if these have been tyrants—is often carried to great excess; there are instances of the infuriated mob broiling their magistrates over a slow fire. On the other hand, the cruelty of government, when victorious, knows no bounds; the treatment of political prisoners is really so shocking as to be incredible, if one had not been an eye-witness of these inhuman deeds.

One of the most common evils is starvation. The population is very dense; the means of subsistence are, in ordinary times, frequently not above the demand; and it is, therefore, nothing extraordinary to witness, on the least failure of the crop, utter wretchedness and misery. To provide for all the hungry mouths is impossible; and the cruel policy of the mandarins carries their indifference so far as to affirm that hunger is requisite to thin the dense masses of the people.

Whenever such a judgment has come upon the land and the people are in want of the necessaries of life, dreadful disorders soon arise, and the most powerful government would not be able to put down the rising and robberies which are committed on the strength of this prevailing misery. There seems to be a total change in the peaceful nature of the inhabitants, and many a patient loborer turns fiercely upon his rich neighbor, like a wolf or a tiger, to devour his substance. No one can have an idea of the anarchy which, on such occasions, ensues, and the utter demoralization of the people.

Yet, as soon as relief is afforded, and a rich harvest promises fair, the spirit of order again prevails, and outrages are put a stop to. The people then combine, arm themselves, and proceed in thousands to catch marauders like wild beasts. No mercy is shown on such occasions, and the mandarins, on account of their weakness, cannot interfere. Scenes of this description very often occurred, without giving rise to severe reflection on the character of Taoukwang's administration.

A NOBLE RESOLVE.

A counsellor of a great kingdom in Europe charged with the superintendence of its public instruction, of Education for the People, thus expresses the inspiring, guiding idea under which he worked. "I promised God," says he, "that I would look upon every Prussian peasant child as a being who could complain of me before God, if I did not provide for him the best education, as a man and a Christian, which it was possible for me to provide." Noble purpose! and is it not one that it well becomes each one of us to form, who would glorify God by improving man's estate? He who goes forth to guide and rule the flock of Christ, should he not say, "I will hold myself accountable for all of sorrow and evil which I am not honestly and heartily endeavoring to remove; my duty is bounded only by my ability?"

Is irreligion rife throughout the land? Then let me count myself irresponsible only when, in person and thought, the voice and efforts of all whom I can inspire by my example, or move by my remonstrance, I have labored to the utmost, that God's ways may be honored, and his saving health known and accepted by all.

Is there crime in our highways, and even in our homes? Is there dark depravity and sensuality in our lanes and alleys? Let me never protest, in respect to it, my innocence before Heaven, until I have done all that in me lies, to educate and humanize the young, to reclaim the mature in age, and to shut off all the parent sources of this iniquity.

Are there social usages which still prove, as they always have proved, abounding sources of immorality and crime? Let me not hold myself acquitted before God, unless I have done, by precept and example, all that I might have done, to protest against their continuance.

Is there idolatry of wealth and pageantry —senseless servitude to the tyrannical fashions of the day? Let me not hold myself innocent, unless I have steadily and urgently recommended a nobler service; unless I have been myself a model of simplicity and frugality.

In one word, let me resolve like Dinter, that I will regard every human being, old and young, gentle and simple, who may be reached and benefited by my prayers and exertions, as one who can complain of me before God, if I have not done him good at every opportunity, and by every means.

WARNING FROM A NEGRO.

One of the most impressive discourses we ever heard, came from the lips of a pious negro.

"This religion of Jesus Christ," said he, "is a religion that requires work. I said to my brother yesterday, 'Well, Newton, how are you getting along in the Christian course?' 'Oh,' said he, 'I am standing still.' But my brother is not standing still, for if we don't move forward in the heavenly course, we are sure to go backward. Yes, yes, this religion of Jesus Christ, makes us work, work. Faith without works is dead. The Christian course I can compare to a canoe on the river there. The man in it works his paddles—his course is against the current; he works harder, harder—his progress is slow, but still he is making headway up the stream, and he will at last reach his landing place. But let him only stop—let him rest his oars—let him fall asleep —down, down, his canoe goes with the rapid current. Swiftly and easily it moves—faster, faster every moment—his back is to the danger—he sees not that great mill-dam below, but on, on goes the canoe. It is on the cataract's edge—it is swept into the boiling gulf below—the man is lost—lost forever!"

Truly, "God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the mighty, and things that are not, to bring to nought things that are, that no flesh should glory in his presence." Such were our reflections, as we treasured up in our heart the strikingly beautiful simile of our poet sable preacher, and the solemn, truthful admonition will long ring in our ear. It will rouse us up; our paddles must not rest.

A TOUCHING CUSTOM.

There exists at Lhassa a touching custom, which we were in some sort jealous of finding among infidels. In the evening, as soon as the light declines, the Thibetian men, women, and children cease from all business, and assemble in the principal part of the city, and public squares. As soon as the groups are formed, every one sits down on the ground, and begins slowly to chant his prayers in an under-tone; and the religious concert produces an immense and solemn harmony throughout the city, powerfully affecting to the soul. The first time we heard it, we could not help making a sorrowful comparison between this pagan town, where all prayed in common, with the cities of Europe, where people would blush to make a public recognition of their faith.

MISSION TO CANADA.

We find it necessary to call the attention of our readers to the doings and prospects of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society. It is now in contemplation to establish a mission in Lower Canada. Brother Jones' exploratory visit to that country, an account of which has already appeared in the Recorder, has brought to view the fact that Canada is a vast and needy field; also, that there are points which, so far as we can judge, demand the early attention of our denomination.

At a recent session of the Missionary Board, the subject was taken into consideration; and after viewing it in all its aspects, weighing arguments and comparing facts, for the purpose of forming as correct a judgment as possible, it was determined that Bro. Jones be requested to hold himself in readiness for the work of carrying the Gospel into that country. Bro. J. is, therefore, our appointed missionary to Canada. The measure is resolved upon, and will be steadily prosecuted, so long as the Providence of God shall appear to invite our labors in that direction.

As a very strong desire has recently been manifested, in some parts of our denomination, for a mission to Palestine, it may be thought strange that the Board did not respond to that desire first. Certainly, the Board has no wish to check the ardor that is kindled in reference to Palestine; it would rather feed it, and rejoice in the indication it affords of a growing missionary spirit among us. To turn a deaf ear to the voice of the denomination, in this respect, is far from the intention of the Board, and far from the intention of any one of its members. But, that a mission to Palestine may be creditably and successfully prosecuted, something more than a feeling of enthusiasm in our churches is necessary. We need a man of rare qualifications, to take the conduct of the enterprise. Such a man—a man possessing superior scholarship as well as piety, energy and boldness as well as meekness, and withal an adroit tactician without any trickishness of character—has not yet presented himself. God will, no doubt, raise him up, if the now prevailing enthusiasm shall prove to be any thing more than a fire of shavings. If it is an enthusiasm kindled by the love of Christ, and by a longing after the salvation of them who crucified him; and if it shall continue to give proof of its genuineness, in great conflicts of prayer that God will furnish the needed laborer, or laborers; the enterprise will not, can not, be long delayed. But, till a man suitable for the undertaking, in the judgment of the Board, shall be found, nothing more can be done than to take those preliminary steps which are even now in progress, and which may possibly result in all that the fondest wishes of our people can anticipate. Let there be no needless uneasiness, then, about the Palestine Mission; it will be undertaken as soon as Providence shall make the way clear,

The Canada Mission, however, is presented to us under different circumstances. Bro. Jones is abundantly competent for the undertaking. He speaks French fluently, and has spent much time in preparing himself to preach in that language. He has already had five years experience as a missionary among Roman Catholics. He has a longing desire for the work; and does not feel in his element while kept from it. He has visited Canada, and has come back impressed with the importance of that field. Protestants, scattered here and there among the villages of that country, received him kindly, and earnestly wished him to return; and even Catholics treated him courteously. No other country containing a French population seems to be more open to missionary labor, and none so readily accessible. And is it a misinterpretation of the leadings of Providence, to suppose that, as God has furnished us with a man competent to carry the Gospel to people who use the French tongue, He intends that we should employ him in that capacity?

We trust that the churches of our denomination will, every where, lend a cheerful countenance to this movement of the Board, and follow it with abundant contributions for its support. It will be necesary to enlarge the funds of the Treasury, for this purpose, immediately; and, to insure this result, it may be necessary for the Board to resort to a special agency. But will the churches wait for such an agency? We hope not. If the pastors will take the matter in hand, promptly and vigorously, the funds will be raised, and the expense of an agency avoided. But, in case an agent should be sent out, it may be well to remind the churches of the apostolic injunction: "Upon the first day of the week, let each one of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him." It will then be in readiness when the agent comes, and his time will not be unnecessarily hindred.

Bro. J. will, probably, leave the United States early in the Spring, or as early as the season will permit. He will locate himself, temporarily, at some one of the villages, or cities, visited by him last summer, and from that, as a central point, extend his labors in different directions, as God shall give him opportunity. He will continue to operate in this way till near the time of our next Anniversary. In the mean time, he will not omit to explore the country still farther, with the view of ascertaining whether there may not be a more eligible location for the mission than the one which he may make his temporary place of labor for the summer. He will then return, and attend our Annual Meeting at Adams, with the view of going back to Canada immediately after, and of establishing the mission permanently at such point as may have been ascertained to be, on the whole, most desirable. After that, the mission will be furnished with a school, or with such appendages as may be necessary to place it upon a respectable footing, and make it a blessing to the people for whose benefit it is designed. Such, we think, will be the course pursued, though we do not say this by authority of the Board. We give it, merely, as our own view of the course desirable to be taken.

The Canadas have been under British rule for nearly a century. Of course, the form of religion recognized by law is that of the Church of England. Some three millions of acres of the public lands, reserved for the purpose by the constitutional charter of 1791, constitute the endowment of the fifty-seven Rectories, into which the Provincial Church is divided. This endowment has, however, been the occasion of much litigation, and its legality has been stoutly contested. About a year ago, the Legislature resolved to refer the question of legality to the Court of Chancery, with the right of either of the contending parties to appeal to the Privy Council in England. Whether the question has been finally settled, we are not informed.

But notwithstanding the power of the Church of England in law, the Church which is most powerful in fact, is that of Rome. Montreal has always been regarded as the head-quarters of Romanism on the North American continent, and 41,463, out of its 58,715 inhabitants, are the zealous disciples of that faith. Quebec, city and county, contains 50,307 inhabitants, of whom 40,163 are of the Church of Rome. The entire province of Lower Canada, (or Canada East, as it is now called,) contains something like a million of inhabitants, nineteen-twentieths of whom are Roman Catholics.

Those who have been accustomed to look upon Catholics as a God-forsaken race, will, no doubt, regard Canada as a very uninviting field for missionary enterprise. So, also, those who are in the habit of considering the denomination blessed and prospered only in proportion to its success in gaining converts to its faith, will regard the projected enterprise as a useless waste of time and strength. But with both of these classes we take issue upon their respective positions. There is hope even for Roman Catholics, as modern missionary labors have abundantly proved. The wrath of God is not yet come upon them to the uttermost, notwithstanding the strong delusion under which they lie. Some of God's elect are yet in Babylon; and before she can be "utterly burned with fire," they must be brought out of her. And who can tell but what Seventh-day Baptists are chosen to the work of bringing them out? Then, as to the idea that we are blessed, only in proportion to our success in making converts to our particular faith, it is time we were rid of it. It lies so palpably upon the face of God's Word, that we are blessed not according to our success, but according to our faithfulness, that we wonder how it should be overlooked. We verily believe, that a score of years, faithfully spent in trying to show the benighted Canadians the way of righteousness, would be of incalculable benefit to us, though not a solitary convert should be made in all that time.

It may be, that immediate success in Canada is among the least of the advantages to be gained by this undertaking. It may be but a beginning towards gaining access to the French population of the world. Or it may be but the beginning of a communication, more extensively, with the whole British Empire, through such connections as are now hid from us. We know not, indeed, what is to be the final result. All we can discern is, that God appears to open the way for us, with about as much clearness and distinctness as he is accustomed to do, when he would lead his people on to any enterprise. Let us, then, go forward.

SELLING AND DRINKING LIQUORS.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Some time ago, one of your correspondents propounded certain inquiries concerning spirituous liquors, for the consideration of your readers; and, with your permission, I propose to reply to these inquiries.

The first inquiry is, "Which inflicts the greatest injury upon a given community, the man who sells three hundred dollars worth of spirituous liquors, to be used as a beverage, or the man who steals three hundred dollars from the same community?" By "three hundred dollars worth of spirituous liquors" must be understood an amount which costs either the consumer or the man who sells to the consumer, the amount named; for spirituous liquors, used as above described, are worth in reality much less than nothing. Three hundred dollars stolen from a community would be a loss which might occasion a degree of inconvenience to some. It would be an invasion of human rights. But no one's virtue would be lost in consequence, except that of the thief. Such an act would leave the social and domestic happiness of the community but little impaired. But this amount of intoxicating liquor sold, though we can not accurately compute its evil consequences, will doubtless do much towards hardening the seller's heart, and also in widening and deepening the great and furious river of intemperance, which in its destructive course is sweeping away all that is lovely and of good report, which comes within its power. This amount of strong drink will start a number of temperate youth on the downward track, while those farther down will be hurried along more swiftly, and some in consequence thereof will probably fall into a drunkard's grave and a drunkard's hell! The common thief is an honorable man, compared with him who robs his fellow men of virtue, reputation, health, life, soul, and every thing; who robs families of peace and happiness, of husbands and fathers; who tears hearts with untold anguish; who robs community in the shape of taxes to support paupers made so by strong drink obtained at his bar, and to pay the expense of bringing intemperate criminals to justice.

2d. "Is it in agreement with that Scripture which says, 'Love worketh no ill to his neighbor,' to sell spirituous liquors to be used as a beverage?" It is love, indeed, which moves a man thus to do—not love to his neighbor, but "the love of money," which "drowns men in destruction and perdition."

3d. "Does the man who uses spirituous liquors as a beverage, set a good and wholesome example in this respect?" This man may drink moderately, and only occasionally, and never become "the worse for liquor," as some would say; and yet his example is such as may influence the young to take the first steps in their downward career, and encourage those who have commenced to keep on. And many a man who has been enabled so to restrain himself as never to become more than a moderate drinker, has seen his sons, less able to restrain their appetites, descend early to a drunkard's grave. The more noted a man is for piety, morality, or amiability, and the greater his influence in community, the more unwholesome will his example be "in this respect," if he be a moderate drinker—far more so than the confirmed sot, upon whom the people will look with disgust. In view of the influence of such examples, we may say with a holy apostle, "It is good neither to eat flesh, nor drink wine, nor any thing whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak."

There is another question, nearly connected with those above considered, which I wish to propose, and also to make some remarks upon. It is this: Is he innocent who sells the products of his farm to the manufacturer of intoxicating liquors, or any one else, with the expectation that it will be converted into poison? These liquors are made chiefly for men to drink. The drinking of them, as we have seen, is a fruitful source of misery and death. We should look with abhorrence upon the man who would make and sell instruments of death to a band of murderers. Yet the farmer knows full well, that his grain will be turned into liquid fire, which will ruin mankind, and yet, for the gains of unrighteousness, he becomes and remains a partner in the work of death.

THE MILL YARD CHURCH.

Several months ago, the Corresponding Secretary of the General Conference wrote to Rev. Wm. H. Black, pastor of the Mill Yard Church, London, for information relative to the present condition and prospects of the Sabbath-keeping congregations in England. Last week he received, by the hands of Dr. J. D. B. Stillman, who has recently spent some time in London, an interesting letter from Mr. Black, and several publications throwing light upon the subject of his inquiry. From the letter of Mr. Black, dated Oct. 21, 1852, we make the following extract:—

"To me it hath been a matter of deep concern, that my absence from London, on urgent public business at Chester Castle, during the greater part of the past three months, prevented me from preparing the usual Church-letter to the General Conference, notwithstanding that I several times took up my pen for that purpose. Indeed, I had hoped to obtain more exact information on the state of the two other congregations, before the Conference, which my secular duties prevented me from obtaining. I now take an opportunity of Dr. Jacob Stillman's return, to salute you with this epistle, which perhaps you will take some opportunity of communicating to the brethren.

"Our Meeting-House was duly re-opened, after repairs, in fourth month last, and its 159th Anniversary was at the same time celebrated. We have reason to be thankful for the proofs of the divine blessing on our persevering endeavors to uphold God's holy Sabbath, and a testimony for his truth. Public worship hath been better attended than it had been before; and we plainly see the work of the Lord prosper in our hands. You know already, that my eldest daughter hath been baptized, and hath joined this Society; now my two younger daughters have made their profession of repentance and faith, and are accepted for baptism, which I hope to administer next week. I am truly grateful for this blessing, both as their father, and as the elder here.

"During my absence at Chester, (where I received your esteemed letter of 28th July,) public worship was kindly and ably conducted here by several ministers whom I occasionally assist on First Days, and by my learned and dear friend Turnbull, whom I have joined in the Anglo-Biblical Institute, as he hath joined me in the Chronological Institute—two useful Societies, of which I inclose printed Addresses for you and other friends. I expect from them much advancement of truth.

"I trust that you will approve the little book of 'Anniversary Hymns,' which was printed for use at our Re-opening, and of which I send twelve copies. You are at liberty to reprint the original Sabbath hymns, if you please.

"By means of my Jewish friends, I have become acquainted with the existence of numerous Christian Sabbath-keepers in the east and south of Europe, with whom I have opened a correspondence in Greek, the particulars whereof you shall know in due time.

"Last week, being Fourth-day, the 13th instant, I aided some Jewish neighbors and friends in establishing a "Society for the Promotion of Jewish Settlements in Palestine;" when the Address of the Jews there, which you published in the Recorder, was very acceptable and interesting to them. I am sorry to hear, since, of the shameful conduct of the British Consul, and will do all that I can to set that matter right in public opinion.

"WM. H. BLACK."

Notice of the Re-Opening—from "The Church."

The Seventh-day Baptist meeting-house in Mill Yard, having been closed for four months, during extensive repairs and improvements, was re-opened on the 7th of April; and the anniversary of the opening of the original meeting-house, erected on the present spot 159 years ago, was also celebrated. The sermon on the occasion was preached from Rom. xiv. 12, by the Rev. Joseph Turnbull (Independent minister, and formerly President of Wymondley College;) Dr. Murch, and the Revs. W. H. Black, B. Mardon, and J. O. Squier, took part in the service. At the request of friends present, the Rev. Wm. H. Black gave a short account of the history of the church from 1657, when it met in Whitechapel, High-Street, to the present time, taking especial notice of those members who suffered martyrdom, and fines, and imprisonments for conscience' sake; but some of whom, notwithstanding severe persecution, lived to see the days of toleration, and to become great benefactors to the church. The service was well attended, and it gave great pleasure to all present to witness persons of almost all denominations of Christians, Churchmen and Dissenters, joining together to celebrate the anniversary of this ancient church.

Original Hymns sung at the Re-Opening.

The first of the following Hymns was prepared for the morning service of Sabbath-day, April 10; the second for the afternoon service, and the third for the Lord's Supper afterward.

Abba Father! Lord most high!
Hear Thy children's humble cry.
Hear, in this Thy House of Pray'r;
Hear, and make our wants Thy care.

All the way that we have trod,
Thou hast watched us, O our God!
Guarded by Thy mighty hand,
Monuments of grace we stand.

Every trial yet hath shown
Our best refuge is Thy throne.
Never let Thy promise fail;
Never let our foes prevail.

What, although, before Thy feet,
"Two or three" together meet?—
Though "the many" turn away,
And forsake Thy blessed Day?—

Faithful art Thou; faithful, we Witnesses of truth will be.
Still uphold our righteous cause,
While we keep Thy Holy laws.

What thanks do we owe to the Source of all good,
For gifts to our bodies, of raiment and food,—
For safety by night, for the sun's cheering ray,—
For all the week's mercies, and this Sabbath Day!

No heart can conceive, and no tongue can declare,
The thankfulness due for our God's tender care;
His providence freely bestows what is best,
And waits to be gracious on His Day of Rest.

Then let us our privilege wisely enjoy;
In acts of religion each moment employ;
With praise and thanksgiving past mercies review,
And pray that our Father His gifts may renew.

Thus week after week shall fresh happiness bring,
And inspire with fresh music the songs that we sing;
While we hallow the Day that Jehovah hath giv'n,
Till it fit us at length for the Sabbath of heav'n.

Behold the slaughter'd Lamb of God!
See, as they take his body down,
How mangled, and how stained with blood,
His hands, his feet, and thorny crown!

With trembling steps, and streaming eyes,
They bear his body to the tomb;
And, when the sun goes down, he lies
As lie the dead in their last home.

His jealous foes a watchful band
Place at his grave, and seal the stone.
By day and night around they stand,
Till full three nights and days* are gone.

The third, the last revolving light,
The Sabbath sun, drops in the west;
When God sends down an Angel bright,
To rouse the Saviour from his rest.

No guards the waking dead can stay.
No seal the Saviour can detain.
Behold! the rock is rolled away,
And Jesus comes to life again.

Thus, as we close the Sabbath hours,
The mem'ry of his death we show;
And thus, at eve,† alone 'tis ours
To show his death‡ and rising|| too.

PALESTINE.

The Jewish Chronicle, a Jews' paper published in London, under the date of Oct. 22d, copies from the Sabbath Recorder the petition of the sixty-three Jews of Palestine to John Meshullam for aid; upon which the editor makes the following remarks:—

"We perform our promise in laying before the public the above address; at the same time, we feel bound to state, that we have been informed that John Meshullam, and all his family, were baptized some fourteen years since, consequently the parties subscribing to the document may also have forsaken the faith of their fathers. Be this, however, as it may, it proves that Palestine is as prolific as ever, that our brethren are asking for means to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow, and, lastly, that if we, their brethren, do not respond to their cry, others are sure to do it for us, and to our everlasting disgrace."

The following advertisement, which we find in the same paper, shows how much the labors of Mr. Meshullam are exciting the attention of the Jews of England, as well as of Christians in America. Are not these things "signs of the times?"

Palestine.

At a numerous Meeting of Gentlemen interested in the cause of the Holy Land, held on Wednesday evening, the 13th inst., at the rooms of the Loyal Linusarian Benevolent Loan Society, 48, Great Prescott-street, Goodman's Fields, Solomon Sequerra, Esq., in the chair, the following resolutions were unanimously agreed to, viz:—

"That a Society be established for the purpose of planting Jewish Colonies in Palestine for industrial purposes.

"That the Society be called, 'The Association for Encouraging Jewish Settlements in Palestine.'

"That the gentlemen now present do form themselves into a Provisional Committe for the purposes of the Association, until a General Meeting of the Donors and Subscribers.

"That a Sub-Committe be appointed, for the purpose of preparing details to be embodied in an address to be issued to the Public, containing the objects and aims of the Association.

"That M. R. Leverson, Esq., of No. 18 Queen-square, be Honorary Treasurer, and Solomon Sequerra, Esq., of No. 9 Bury-street, Leadenhall-street, be Honorary Secretary, to whom all communications and donations of the friends to the cause are requested to be forwarded."

(By order) SOLOMON SEQUERRA, Hon. Sec.

THE SLAVES SET FREE.

The slave case noticed in our last, has been decided, and decided in accordance with the wishes of every lover of freedom. The facts in the case are, that a Mr. Lemmon, who was removing from Virginia to Texas with eight slaves, came to New York by the steamer City of Richmond, intending immediately to take ship for Texas. The slaves were landed, and shut up in a boarding house until the ship for Texas should be ready to sail. Some colored citizens, however, getting wind of the matter, procured a writ of habeas corpus, requiring Mr. Lemmon to have the bodies of his eight negroes before Judge Paine, and show the cause of their imprisonment and detention. When they were brought before the Judge, he thought they were entitled to their freedom, inasmuch as they had been brought, by consent of their alledged owner, into a State which does not recognize slavery; but as Mr. Lemmon and his counsel plead for an adjournment, and the Judge himself was desirous of fully considering the matter, an adjournment was granted. Last Sabbath the parties were brought up for a final hearing; after which Judge Paine delivered a lengthy and able Opinion, the substance of which was, that the laws of New York not only do not uphold or legalize a property in slaves, but render it impossible that such property should exist within the limits of the State, except in the single instance of fugitives from labor. Accordingly, he ordered that the eight colored persons be discharged from custody.

When this decision was announced, Mr. Lemmon's counsel begged hard for a review, and enlarged upon the sad plight into which his client was thrown. But it was of no use; the general sympathy was with the two colored women, and their children, who had worked all their lives for nothing, and the husband of one of whom was sold from her two or three years ago, without her having seen him since.

The eight persons were placed in coaches by Louis Napoleon, (the name of the colored man who has been most prominent in the prosecution,) and some other friends, and driven off, amid great cheering and waving of handkerchiefs from the colored persons, (females as well as males being present.) "Oh, thank God and good men!" was the ejaculation of a stout-built mulatto old woman, having a child with her, and holding up her hands as the parties passed her, on their way out through the hall—"thank God! thank God!"

The Report of the Committee on Resolutions being called for, the following were presented, discussed, and adopted:

1. Whereas, for several years past, we have had no regular missionary in the field, except for short seasons, in consequence of which our influence for God is much curtailed, and the blessings of the Christian religion but little enjoyed by us; and whereas, we do not lack the means, but the disposition to use that means in providing and sustaining a missionary among us; therefore—Resolved, That the Executive Committee be hereby instructed to forthwith obtain the labors of some faithful minister, to serve the churches in this association; and we hereby pledge ourselves, our property, and our sacred honor, to bear the burden of expenses thereby accruing; and this we will perform as we expect eternal life beyond the grave.

2. Resolved, That we deeply sympathize with the institution of learning in this place, known as the Select School, and hereby pledge ourselves to endeavor to have it sustained.

3. Whereas, Amercain slavery is a sin of the first magnitude, comprehending in its generic character nearly if not quite all the crimes hell is capable of inventing or earth practicing; therefore—Resolved, That we set our strongest seal of disapprobation upon it, declaring unending war with it, and non-fellowship with all who practice it, and their aiders and abettors.

4. Whereas, liberty is the God-given, inherent right of every human being, and the fugitive slave law of 1850 not only seeks to return the heroic African (who has made his way through innumerable dangers to our nominally free State, in hopes of possessing liberty in the inhospitable climes of a northern country,) to the land of whips and chains, but seeks to make us slave-hunters and man-catchers; Resolved, That we look upon the law as being iniquitous in the extreme, contravening the higher claims of humanity and religion; and while we profess and wish to be law-abiding citizens, we are ready to be fined and imprisoned, but we will never drive the panting fugitive from our hospitality, but hope that God in his providence may give an opportunity to make our professions practical.

5. Whereas, public opinion is the bulwark of slavery, and the churches are the manufactories of that opinion on the subject of morals; Resolved, That the American Churches are responsible for American Slavery.

Resolved, That the Corresponding Secretary be instructed to correspond with other associated bodies of a religious character, as he may deem the interest of the Redeemer's kingdom may demand.

The Committee on the State of Religion reported as follows:

The Committee beg leave to report, that the cause of religion among us, in the bounds of this Association, is far below what should characterize the church of God. A spirit of apathy and coldness seems to pervade us; yet a few have been added to us, while others have been excluded, and our numbers are decreasing; and too little union seems to be felt among us. In view of the present, and of the past, when the candle of the Lord shone around us, while salvation was poured upon us from on high, and sinners were converted to God, it becomes us as a people to humble ourselves before God, and repent in dust and ashes, and weep between the porch and the altar, and pray God not to leave us in our coldness to perish, but to revive us in the spirit of our minds.

GERRIT SMITH'S PLATFORM.

To the Voters of the Counties of Oswego and Madison:

You nominated me for a seat in Congress, notwithstanding I besought you not to do so. In vain was my resistance to your persevering and unrelenting purpose.

I had reached old age. I had never held office. Nothing was more foreign to my expectations, and nothing was more foreign to my wishes, than the holding of office. My multiplied and extensive affairs gave me full employment. My habits, all formed in private life, all shrank from public life. My plans of usefulness and happiness could be carried out only in the seclusion in which my years had been spent.

My nomination, as I supposed it would, has resulted in my election—and that, too, by a very large majority. And now, I wish that I could resign the office, which your partiality has accorded to me. But I must not—I can not. To resign it would be a most ungrateful and offensive requital of the rare generosity, which broke through your strong attachments to party, and bestowed your votes on me, the peculiarities of whose political creed leave him without a party. Very rare, indeed, is the generosity, which was not to be repelled by a political creed, among the peculiarities of which are

1st. That it acknowledges no law, and knows no law, for Slavery: That, not only is Slavery not in the Federal Constitution, but that, by no possibility, could it be brought either into the Federal, or into a State, Constitution.

2d. That the Right to the Soil is as natural, absolute, and equal, as the right to the light and the air.

3d. That political rights are not conventional, but natural—inhering in all persons, the black as well as the white, the female as well as the male.

4th. That the doctrine of Free Trade is the necessary outgrowth of the doctrine of human brotherhood; and that to impose restrictions on commerce is to build up unatural and sinful barriers across that brotherhood.

5th. That the national wars are as brutal, barbarous, and unnecessary, as are the violence and bloodshed to which misguided and frenzied individuals are prompted; and that our country should, by her own Heaven-trusting and beautiful example, hasten the day when the nations of the earth "shall beat their swords into plow-shares and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

6th. That the province of Government is but to protect—to protect persons and property; and that the building of railroads and canals, and the care of schools and churches, fall entirely out of its limits, and exclusively within the range of "the voluntary principle." Narrow, however, as are these limits, every duty within them is to be promptly, faithfully, fully performed; as well, for instance, the duty on the part of the Federal Government to put an end to the dramshop manufacture of paupers and madmen in the City of Washington, as the duty on the part of the State Government to put an end to it in the State.

7th. That, as far as practicable, every officer, from the highest to the lowest, including especially the President and Postmaster, should be elected directly by the people.

I need not extend any farther the enumeration of the features of my peculiar political creed; and I need not enlarge upon the reason, which I gave, why I must not, and cannot, resign the office which you have conferred upon me. I will only add, that I accept it; that my whole heart is moved to gratitude by your bestowment of it; and that, God helping me, I will so discharge its duties as neither to dishonor myself nor you.

GERRIT SMITH.

PETERBORO, Nov. 5, 1852.

RELIGIOUS AWAKENING IN JEFFERSON COUNTY.

In a recent communication from Bro. A. Campbell to one of the editors, the interesting intelligence presented in the following extract is contained :—

"It affords me much pleasure to say to you, that God was come gracious by near to us in Hounsfield of late. We have been permitted to see and feel the unmistakable evidences of the Divine presence and blessing in this place. Though really unworthy of the least of all his mercies, we have witnessed the fresh instances of God's converting grace and saving power amongst us.

"An unusual degree of solemnity and attention to the word has been manifest in the congregation for some months past, which clearly indicated the moving of the Holy Spirit of God upon the hearts of the people. Some of the unconverted have been seen, frequently, to weep during the time of Divine service.

"In view of such an apparent state of things, I was induced to preach two and three times a week, in the evening, for some little time past, with increasing encouragement. Six were added to the Independent S. D. Baptist Church of Adams last Sabbath by baptism. God's people have been quickened by the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, and a number of unhappy wanderers have been hopefully reclaimed. O my the gracious work go forward."

Good Advice.—Rev. A. D. Gillett was recently installed pastor of the Broadway Baptist Church in New York. Rev. Mr. Magoon gave the charge to the pastor on the occasion, in the course of which he said :—

"Your work is not that of a mechanic, or merchant, or lawyer, or doctor, but a publisher of Christ's Gospel. In this, the highest of all occupations, you are to be yourself, use your own tools, and that in the very best way. If you can do better in an extemporaneous mode, talk out your thought; if you can cogitate best with a pen in your hand, and prefer reading, then use a manuscript. You had better spell out sense by the sheet than roar out nonsense by the hour."

Prize Tract on Fiction.—The American Female Guardian Society, at its last anniversary, offered a premium of $50 for the best Tract delineating in its true light the guilt of those who read, publish, or sell, pernicious fiction. The committee of award, consisting of Rev. Drs. Cheever, Tyng, Williams, and Rev. R. S. Foster, have announced that thirty-five manuscripts were received, of which they deem the one written by Rev. Samuel Harris, of Pittsfield, Mass., entitled to the premium.

* * *

Dr. Judson's Dictionary.—The Burman Dictionary at which Dr. Judson worked so long, and which he had such a desire to complete before his death, is now in the hands of Rev. E. A Stevens, who expresses a hope of comcompleting it in a short time. About three hundred pages quarto are already printed, and it is progressing at a good and steady rate.

Arabic Bible.—High expectations are entertained in Syria from the Rev. Eli Smith's translation of the Arabic Bible, which he has now in progress. The present Arabic translation in use by the missionaries, was made at Rome some three hundred years ago, and abounds in errors.

* * *

First Presbyterian Church, New Brunswick.—Rev. Robert Davidson, D. D., of New Brunswick, N. J., has prepared a minute history of the First Presbyterian Church of that City, of which he is the Pastor. It was read before the Historical Society of New Jersey at its last meeting. The facts it gives repecting the Tennents, Whitfield, and others, make this document one of rare value and interest in ecclesiastical annals. The example of Dr. Davidson in thus preserving the early memorials of his Church, might be followed with great advantage by other pastors.

Church Member's Manual.—Messrs. Champlin & Babcock, of Westerly, R. I., have published a very neatly-printed and well-arranged Manual for the use of the Members of the Pawcatuck Seventh-day Baptist Church. It was prepared by order of the church, and contains an account of its organization, a list of its officers, the Covenant, Confession of Faith, Act of Incorporation, By-Laws, Rules of Order, Time of Stated Meetings, a series of Practical Questions, Observations and Resolutions, and a Catalogue of Members, showing when each was admitted, and when any have died or been dismissed. No better way can be devised to acquaint the members of a church with its history and design, or to interest them in its business. We hope the example of the Pawcatuck Church in this respect will be imitated.

Tract Agent.—Eld. Lucius Crandall has been engaged by the Board of the American Sabbath Tract Society, to act as their agent, in lecturing upon the subject of the Sabbath, distributing publications, selling the volume of Sabbath Tracts, obtaining subscriptions taking collections, &c. Bro. Crandall has also been commissioned to transact business for the Publishing Society, such as obtaining subscribers and making collections for The Sabbath Recorder, The Sabbath-School Visitor, and The Seventh-day Baptist Memorial.

The Annual Reports of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society and the American Sabbath Tract Society are out of press. Parcels have been put up for each church in the denomination, which will be forwarded by the first opportunity. Meanwhile friends residing within the bounds of our churches, and visiting New York, are requested to call at the office of the Recorder, and take those for their respective neighborhoods.

Collegiate and Theological Education at the West.—The Society for the Promotion of Collegiate and Theological Education at the West, held its Ninth Anniversary in Boston on the 27th and 28th days of October. From the Annual Report of the Board of Directors, presented on that occasion, it appears that the receipts of the past year were $21,117 89, an amount considerably larger than the receipts of any previous year. Eight colleges had been aided during the year, viz., Marietta, Wabash, Illinois, Knox, Belfast, Iowa, Wittenberg, and the college of the German Evangelical Conference of Missouri. All these had been gradually advancing, and no doubt was entertained that, with continued aid judiciously applied, they might one by one be brought to a position where they might maintain a useful and permanent existence. Revivals of religion had occurred in five of these eight colleges, resulting in the hopeful conversion of some forty young men. Brief notices were also given of revivals in eleven other institutions in different parts of the country, not connected with the Society, of which two hundred or more students were the subjects. The number of institutions blessed with revivals since the last Concert of Prayer for Colleges, was believed never to have been exceeded in the most favored year of college revivals. While the churches were assembled in the Annual Concert, God heard, and, almost before they asked, he answered. It had been well said, that the results of this Concert from year to year, had furnished the most striking illustration of the power of prayer to be found in the modern records of the Church, and that we here saw one of the leading methods by which the destitute churches are to be supplied with pastors, and the heathen with missionaries. It was stated that a benevolent individual, deeply impressed with a sense of the importance of this subject, had placed at the disposal of the Society $150, to be offered as a premium for an essay that should most successfully unfold it, and press it upon the attention of the churches.

British and Foreign Bible Society.—From the report, just printed, we learn that the receipts in full during the year have amounted to £108,449 0s. 10d., being an increase, as compared with last year, of £5,118 18s. 2d. The sum applicable to the general purposes of the society is £56,683 8s. 1d. The receipts for Bibles and Testaments have amounted to £51,765 12s. 9d., being an increase of £2,230 17s. 11d. The most striking feature in the actual receipts is the item of free contributions from auxiliary societies, &c., which have reached £34,100 19s. It should be borne in mind, that this is the more important, as it best proves the hold the society possesses on the public mind. The expenditure of the year has amounted to £103,930 9s. 10d., being £386 19s. more than in the preceding year. The donations have amounted to £6,754 17s. 10d. The issues of the year have amounted to 1,154,642 copies, showing an increase of 17,108 copies over the preceding year. The total issues have now amounted to 25,402,309. The engagements of the society amount to £52,341 2s. 7d.

Literary Institutions for Oregon.—Rev. G. H. Atkinson, of Oregon, who is now visiting the Eastern States, is endeavoring to procure aid in endowing and putting in operation two literary institutions, one for males and the other for females, in that distant region of our country, which is some 500 miles from the older colleges of the land. The female seminary is in Chockawa county, and is urgently needed to meet and counteract the schemes of the Popish "Sisters of Charity," who spare no expense that they may train the future mothers of Oregon under Jesuit influence. The seminary has been established at a cost to the people of $11,000, but needs friends to sustain a full corps of teachers, because they say that "unsuccessful competition with Papal schools is worse than their complete monopoly." The other is Tualatin Academy, which has a college charter.

European News.

European news to Nov. 3d has been received, of which we give the principal items.

Breadstuffs are in demand, and holders have advanced their views 6 cents per bbl. on Flour, and 2 or 3 cents per bush. on Wheat. Cotton also has received an impulse, and is held higher.

The Duke of Wellington's funeral is definitively fixed to take place on the 18th November. The Duke of Terceira, with an aid-de-camp and several staff officers, had arrived at Southampton in the steamship Tagus, deputed by the Portuguese Government to be present at the ceremonial.

A verdict of willful murder against the parties in custody who were concerned in the duel at Epham, near Winsdor, had been brought in. Suspicions of foul play were excited.

The Morning Herald, (Government organ,) announces that ten line-of-battle ships, being built, or about to be built, are ordered to be fitted with screw propellers.

On Wednesday, the 27th, a gale in the Engligh Channel caused several shipwrecks and some loss of life.

The position of affairs between the United States and Cuba attracts the attention of the English press of all shades.

The celebrated daughter of General Rosas was married at Southampton to a Spaniard.

In France, public attention was principally occupied with the approaching meeting of the Senate on the 4th November. It was said that to avoid all discussion, but one single article would be submitted to the people, to the effect that "the French Empire shall be hereditary, in the direct line in the family of Louis Napoleon, but in the event of Louis Napoleon having no male issue, he shall have the right of naming his successor."

A telegraphic dispatch via Trieste, in anticipation of the arrival of the overland mail is published in The London Journal, conveying intelligence that a Brigade of the British Army, accompanied by General Goodwin, had left Rangoon for Prome. The steamers were to return immediately for a second Brigade. The Burmese had destroyed Prome, and had posted themselves in masses on a hight ten miles off the town. They were said to be only 7,000 strong, with a few guns.

California News.

The steamship Star of the West, from San Juan, with California news to Oct. 16, arrived at New York Nov. 8. We give the principal items of news brought by her.

Miners are preparing for work with ardent anticipations, and some good fruits are already secured.

Crimes are not so general nor so atrocious as we have often recorded.

A party of men on Clear Creek, in Shasta County, recently went out on an Indian hunt, and returned with a number of squaws and children. During their absence they killed fourteen Indians. The bodies of three white men, one woman and three children were recently found beyond the Butte, twelve miles from the immigrant trail leading to Yreke. They had evidently been butchered by the Indians.

The crops of the country have not realized the expectations of our farmers this season. There are many reasons for this, but chief among them is the inexperience and want of knowledge among our agriculturists of the requirements of the soil, the time of planting, &c. The wheat crop in some of the northern valleys has proved almost a total failure.

The Mormon Settlement at San Bernardino was constantly receiving large accessions from the Salt Lake of men and families by the superb southern route. This colony is in a prosperous condition. It bids fair to absorb and direct the business of the southern part of the State. The few resident Americans scattered throughout the lower districts are the most inert, unenterprising and inefficient representatives of the Anglo-Saxon race in California.

During the past season, the prospects of no place in California have so materially improved as those of Sacramento. Real estate is again advancing in value. Fine blocks of brick buildings are beginning to adorn and give an air of permanence to her busy streets. Competition in trade is lively, and the old-time vigor of her river business has returned, to make her levees the scene of daily active commercial life. Sacramento is still the busy mart of mountain traders, and the depot of supplies for a large extent of mining interior.

The crop of wheat harvested by the Mormons at San Bernardino, the past season, amounts to 60,000 bushels; barley, 3,000 bushels; also, a large quantity of onions. They have two threshing machines, one grist mill, and five fanners in operation, and are making preparations for the immediate construction of another grist mill.

In the northern section of San Joaquin County, near the line of Sacramento, the Journal says, there will probably be ten thousand acres of land sown with wheat this season.

By the Santa Clara Register we are informed of the following particulars of a duel which came off in Santa Clara County, near Gilroy's ranch, and which, in ferocity and desperation, we find no parallel for in the State. It occurred, says the Register, between a Mexican and a native Californian, about a game of monte, and Colt's navy revolvers were the weapons used in combat. Nine shots were fired, and four of the balls took effect in each of the combatants. Both parties expired immediately, and they were each ushered into the presence of their Maker to answer for the murder of the other. After the second or third shot, the Californian crawled on his hands and knees nearer his antagonist and fired, in order to make sure of his victim. This shot took effect in the abdomen of the Mexican.

From Oregon, advices are as late as Oct. 9th. We have afflicting reports of destitution among the newly arrived immigrants across the plains. The citizens were taking active measures for their relief, although the Governor had not yet dispatched a Relief Train. Numbers are constantly arriving in the territory, and they bring tales of distress of the parties who are still backward. It is said that over one thousand wagons were behind. The crops this season, throughout Oregon, have been generally good. Many of the immigrants were going to Puget's Sound in search of claims.

From Australia we have dates to July 7. The village of Gundagai, on the north bank of Murrumbidgee, was destroyed by a freshet on the 26th of June. Between sixty and eighty lives were lost. The town has been completely ruined. The rains have been very severe. Business was brisk, and provisions high. The gold discoveries are reported to extend and increase in value over an immense surface of country. Fortunes are being made, it is said, with great facility, and hundreds of English emigrants are arriving in the country almost daily.

An Infernal Machine or Torpedo.

It is stated that on the evening of the 18th ult., a man, whose identity has been made out, employed a hackman at the Park to take him to Fulton Ferry, New York. On their way down the person stopped the hackman at the Herald office, and asked him to deliver a package. The hackman did as he was requested, and left in the Herald office a small round box. The box was subsequently handed to Mr. Bennett, the editor of the Herald. It was, as is said, marked as follows: "Native silver and copper ore from the Cuba mountains, with letter inside the box. For James Gordon Bennett, proprietor and editor. Office, N. W. corner of Fulton and Nassau-sts. Private and with care." Accompanying the box was a card, on which was printed with a pen as follows: "Senor V. Alcazor, of Cuba, for Mr. Bennett, who will call on his return to the city." The outer envelop being removed, the following inscription was read: "Specimens and private documents from the interior of Havana, for Mr. Bennett (only). Should he be out of town, keep for him. Island of Cuba, September, 1852." As the box could not be readily opened, Mr. Hudson, one of the editors of the Herald, who was present, made an incision with a knife, when some hard substance rolled out upon his desk. These grains proved to be powder, and a subsequent investigation proved that the paper box contained a quantity of explosive powder, pellets of paper, and friction matches, so placed as to ignite when the cover of the box was turned round. It is supposed that mischief was intended; though none resulted from the torpedo. [N. Y. Times.

Gerrit Smith polled 213 votes in DeRuyter, at the late election, against 102 for the regular Whig candidate and 72 for the Democratic—majority over both, 39.

Another Revolution in Mexico.—A dispatch from New Orleans, dated Nov. 11, says: By the arrival of the steamship Texas, from Galveston, the Picayune has received late and important news from the Rio Grande, giving an account of the commencement of hostilities, and a battle between the Government troops and Revolutionists. It appears that a body of 600 of the National Guard, who had been stationed at Matamoros, left that town and encamped upon the American side of the Rio Grand. They afterwards re-crossed the river above Matamoros, and marched upon Victoria, and attacked Governor Carolenas and General Avalos, who were in command of a large body of the revolutionists. General Canales, on being apprised of their intentions, pursued them with an army of 500 men, and 18 pieces of artillery. The Guards thereupon turned back, and a general engagement ensued, which resulted in the entire route of General Canales and his forces.

The Maine Law in Rhode Island.—In the R. I. House of Representatives, a few days since, Hon. R. B. Cranston moved the repeal of the Maine Law of that State. The proposition was quashed by the decisive vote of forty-nine to fourteen. A proposition by Mr. A. C. Barstow (Mayor of Providence) to make the Law more stringent in the matter of searches of houses wherein liquor was suffered to be sold, passed the House by a vote of 30 to 28, but received the 'go-by' in the Senate.

SUMMARY.

A lad aged about 14 years, an adopted son of Mr. David Simon, residing in South street, above Second, Philadelphia, was tickled by a young lawyer named Micheson, a few days since, for some alledged offence respecting a book. It is charged that the lawyer, to punish the boy, held him fast between his knees, and commenced tickling him in various parts of the body. The lad struggled to get away, and in so doing strained the sinews of one of his legs, and also bruised the flesh. In a short time after this he was taken ill, the limb became black, and several medical gentlemen were called in, who have announced that the only chance for saving the boy's life is by amputating the limb. The case is to undergo legal investigation.

A short time ago, a young man, a clerk in a house in San Francisco, having $5000 to spare, sent it to China and invested it in rice. He sold the cargo (to arrive) at 22 cents per pound, and made the handsome sum of $37,000 by the operation. The purchaser was a Chinaman, and it so happened that the cargo arrived the very day after it was purchased. The Chinaman made $65,000 on his bargain. The large sum of $102,000 has, therefore, been cleared on an investment of $5000.

The Perth (Scotland) Courier mentions the curious case of a servant-girl, about thirteen years of age, residing in that city, who is in possession of a double row of teeth in the under jaw. The two sets of teeth are beautifully regular, but are not easily noticed unless a hearty laugh happens. The front and inner teeth have each their fellows; and the possessor, as may be supposed, has good masticating powers, and feels no inconvenience from her additional stock.

The Boston Commonwealth says: During the services in relation to Webster, at the United States Circuit Court room, there were seated within the area appropriated to the members of the bar, in close proximity to such men as Judges Parsons, Warren, and Rogers, Hon. Messrs. Winthrop, Choate, and Loring, and a long train of other notables in the law, Messrs. Morris and Allen, the young and talented colored members of the Suffolk bar, who were regarded with as much deference as any in the assembly.

We see it stated in an English paper, that a man in the vicinity of London undertook lately, for a bet of twenty-five dollars, to lay a gun upon the ground, throw a potato up, turn heels over head, pick up the gun, and hit the potato once out of five shots, before it fell to the ground. He afterwards actually performed this feat, winning his bet the first shot.

A resident of Leeds, England, apprises the editor of the Galway Vindicator, that he can prepare a liquid, a pint of which in a glass grenade-shell, thrown through a barrack window in the night, would silently destroy the whole of its living inhabitants, or, broken in the face of an advancing force, horse or foot, would arrest their progress by death or paralysis.

In many of the neighboring cities, and generally at the South, we perceive that boxes were placed at the polls during the election, to receive the contributions of voters towards the completion of the Washington National Monument. The amount collected in this manner must have been very considerable. At Buffalo, $346,25 were received; at Baltimore, $1500; at Washington, $1210.

A Temperance Convention has been held at Macon, Ga., at which resolutions were unanimously adopted in favor of the enactment of a law allowing each county to determine, by vote of the people, whether liquor shall be sold in its limits; and also in favor of taking a vote of the people of Georgia to determine whether a general law for the State shall be adopted, to prohibit the sale of liquor within its limits.

The Rochester, which left Cleveland at 3 o'clock on Saturday, Nov. 6, loaded with 600 tuns of coal, when off Grand River, sprung a leak, and lost one man overboard. About 1 o'clock on Sunday morning, she was headed for the shore, and struck about 3 o'clock, near Walnut Creek. The captain and one hand swam ashore, but the balance of the crew, it is feared, are lost. They were nine in number.

Mr. Jamieson, of the Lodiana Mission, (Pres. Board,) toiled eight or nine years at Sabathu, without fruit, after which the station was given up; but recently, five of his old disciples have been baptized at Lodiana, and there are others in and about Sabathu, who confess the truth; and some also have died expressing hope in Christ.

Hon. David Henshaw died at his residence in Leicester, Worcester County, Mass., Oct. 11, after an illness of several days. Mr. Henshaw had been a leading "Democratic" politician in Massachusetts for many years.

The Montreal Courier hints that some daring incendiaries have lately attempted to burn the remainder of the city of Montreal, and it therefore warns the citizens to be prepared with loaded arms, and if they detect the ruffians, to "finish them at once."

The U. S. Mail steamer Illinois, from Chagres, arrived at New York, Nov. 11, bringing California dates to Oct. 20th, and $2,000,000 in gold dust. The time made is less than 23 days from San Francisco, and a little over 8 days from Panama. Among the passengers was Lieut. Gillis, U. S. N., who brought dispatches from Mr. Clay, U. S. Chargé at Lima, relative to the final settlement of the Guano question. He also brought reports from Commodore McCauley, who arrived at Callao on the 13th ult., from Valparaiso.

A dispatch dated Cincinnati, Nov. 13, says: The steamer Buckeye Belle exploded both boilers in Beverly Locks, 12 miles below Marietta, last night, killing fifteen persons, and wounding several others, among them several ladies. The boat is completely torn to pieces. Every flue in one boiler is collapsed, and the boiler cannot be found. The accident is attributed to the gross carelessness of the engineers, one of whom at the time of the explosion was standing on the safety valve.

We have dates from China, by way of San Francisco, to the 7th August. The Government had not been able to suppress the rebellion. A horrible story is related of the murder of fifty thousand persons—men, women and children—by the rebels, in a successful assult upon the City of Chunchow. The slaughter is said to have lasted for three days and three nights. The account is not authenticated.

The Albany Evening Journal says that "Messrs. A. Meneely's Sons, of West Troy, N. Y., are constructing, at their celebrated Foundry, a peal of ten bells—to cost $4,000—which Jo. S. Fay, Esq., presents to an Episcopal Church in Savannah, Georgia. The fame of the Meneelys is, on every Sabbath, pealed forth from a thousand steeples. And they deserve the fame they enjoy. They are accomplished mechanics, and have no superiors in the world."

A dispatch dated Philadelphia, Nov. 14, says: A woman named Treadway was killed by her husband on Thursday last, at Hallstown, four miles from Salem, N. J. She had sued him for separate maintenance, and having obtained a verdict in her favor, he repaired to the house where she boarded, and fired at her through the window, killing her instantly, the ball passing through her heart.

Third-day, Nov. 16, was selected by the Common Council of New York for the obsequies of Daniel Webster, late Secretary of State of the United States of America. The occasion was to be marked by a Civic and Military Procession, composed of the Military and the different Orders, Societies and Citizens of New York, and others who may unite with them.

Advices have been received from Liberia to the 27th August. The country was in a highly prosperous condition. Accessions of new territory were soon to be made by purchase, and the internal state of the Republic was most encouraging. The bark Ralph Cross was lost at Cape Palmas, on the night of the 18th July, and Mr. Jones, Agent of the New York Emigration and Agricultural Society, lost his life.

There is a man in the town of Lee, Mass., eighty-two years of age, who has never suffered an hour's illness, has never lost a tooth, and has not a gray hair, his head being thickly covered with dark and vigorous locks. He would hew down a regiment of the bald-headed, toothless and ailing young people of 1852.

A native of Calcutta, who had not conformed to the truth, recently left, by will, 259 rupees to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, a marked evidence of the wide-spread interest which missionary operations are producing.

A Proclamation,

The varied blessings enjoyed by the people of this State during the past year, call forth the grateful tribute of praise and devotion due to our heavenly Benefactor. An abundant harvest, crowning the labors of the husbandman, and filling the land with plenty; peace with all nations; the maintenance of social order and free institutions, imparting fresh vigor to the cause of civil liberty; the diffusion of religion and learning; the general prevalence of health; the merciful deliverance of the towns and cities which were visited for a season by the destroying pestilence, and the innumerable benefits which have been conferred upon our commonwealth, proclaim the infinite goodness and protecting care of the Creator and Supreme Ruler of the Universe. In compliance with established usage, I respectfully recommended to the people of this State the observance of Thursday, the 25th day of November next, as a day of prayer and thanksgiving.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto signed my name, and affixed the privy seal of the State, at the City of Albany, this 16th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1852. By the Governor: Washington Hunt.

James F. Ruggles, Private Secretary.

Autumn.

Thou comest, Autumn! heralded by rain,
 With banners by great gales incessant fanned,
 Brighter than brightest silks of Samarcand,
And stately oxen harnessed to thy wain!
Thou standest, like imperial Charlemagne,
 Upon thy bridge of gold; thy royal hand
 Outstretched with benedictions o'er the land;
Blessing the farms through all thy vast domain.
 Thy shield is the red harvest moon, suspended
So long beneath the heaven's o'erchanging eaves;
 Thy steps are by the farmer's prayers attended;
Like flames upon the altar shine the sheaves;
 And following thee in thine ovation splendid,
Thine almoner, the wind, scatters the golden leaves!

Duplex Rudder and Screw Propeller.

From the London Daily News.

Under the above title Captain E. J. Carpenter, R. N., has patented an invention in the art of propelling vessels by screw, which bids fair to constitute a new era in steam navigation. Vessels propelled by screw are indeed no longer a novelty; but the peculiarity of Captain Carpenter's invention is, that two screws are made use of instead of one, which greatly increases the speed, while the ship is steered by two rudders, which in an equal degree increases the control obtained over her. In order to obtain these results Captain Carpenter builds his vessels on a principle different from any that has hitherto been adopted. From the stem to the midships section the keel is laid down the same as in other vessels; but from the midships toward the stern the keel gradually tapers off till it is lost in the water line. But in place of this single keel, two new keels start from the midships, and are continued in parallel lines to the stern, the distance between them varying, of course, according to the size of the vessel. Each of these keels is fitted with a stern-post and rudder, and between the keel and the stern-post of each there is an orifice, in which the screw works, according to the common principle. One screw propeller is placed a little in advance of the other, so as to allow both room to work, and yet so near that, when both are in action, they constitute, in fact, one propeller with double power. The two rudders are so connected together that they can be steered by one person as easily as the single rudder on the old principle; while, by a slight alteration in the machinery, one of the screws or one of the rudders can be unshipped at pleasure, and the vessel worked with one only. By this new principle the inventor calculates on obtaining not only an increase of speed which may obviously be expected from the double action of the screws, but also on having a greater control over the way of the vessel by the action of the double rudder; and from experiments obtained from a working model, it appeared that a vessel constructed on this principle would turn complete by round in the space of her own length and a half, while the Thames steamboats usually require a circle the diameter of which is between five and six times the vessel's length, in which to turn completely round, under similar circumstances. The form of the vessel's stern also gets rid of all dead water, which has usually been a great impediment to the action of the screw; and the breadth of the vessel and stern, which is rendered necessary by the double keel, gives an opportunity for imparting increased strength to that part of the ship where it is much wanted in a screw steam vessel, at the same time that, being propped up, as it were, on the two crutches of her double keel, she will be less likely to roll in the water.

A Successful Atmospheric Railway.

Foreign Correspondence of the Ohio State Journal.

Paris, Thursday, Oct. 7, 1852.

One of the greatest curiosities in a mechanical way which I have met in my travels, is that of the Atmospheric Railway at St. Germain, about 15 miles from Paris. Atmospheric presure has here been adopted to propel trains of cars for a distance of five miles and nearly a half—the last half of which has an ascent of 3½ per cent. The object in adopting this system was to bring the terminus of the road up into the city of St. Germain, which is located on a hill forming the south bank of the Seine. The ascent was too great to be overcome in all weathers by a locomotive, and indeed only one locomotive has been found sufficiently powerful to draw a train up at any time.

The system in use in the United States on inclined planes, of drawing trains up and letting them down by means of a rope, has been found here, as elsewhere, too troublesome, too slow, and attended with too many accidents, to be made available on suburban roads where the travel is so great. Is is so rare to meet with any thing in these old countries in advance of America in real, practical utility—in the inventive genius which has an utilitarian end—that we have deemed a short description of this most admirable and really interesting invention might prove acceptable to our readers. Being fortunate enough to have for a cicerone on this occasion an American lady, long resident in France, we were enabled to obtain from the gentlemanly superintendent, through the medium of our interpreter, a full knowledge of the mechanism and the operation of this admirable machine.

An iron tube is laid down in the center of the track, which is sunk about one-third of its diameter in the bed of the road. For a distance of about 5,500 yards the tube has a diameter on only 1¾ feet, the ascent here being so slight as not to require the same amount of force as is required on the steep grade ascending to St. Germain, where the pipe for a distance of 3,800 yards is 2 feet 1 inch in diameter. The manner of applying the atmospheric pressure to the propulsion of the train is exceedingly simple. The air is exhausted from the entire length of the tube, so as to produce a perfect vacuum, just before the arrival of each train, which is every half hour, by means of powerful and beautiful engines. These engines are placed, two of two hundred horse-power, at St. Germain, and one each at the towns of Nauterree and Chaton, in the valley towards Paris.

To each engine is adapted two large cylinders which exhaust fourteen cubic feet of air per second. The pressure in the large air caldron (chaudiers) attached to the exhausting machine is equal to six absolute atmospheres. It will be readily understood that when this long tube is completely exhausted of air, if a piston so nicely adjusted to the size of the tube as to render it air-tight, is allowed to go loose at one end, it will rush through to the other end to fill up the vacuum. To apply the motive power, therefore, to the propulsion of the train, it is only necessary that this piston be attached to the train of cars in such a way as to drag them along after it.

This was the great difficulty to encounter; but so admirably and so simply was this overcome, that the engineer assured us that an accident of any kind seldom ever occurred. Throughout the entire length of the tube, a section is made in the top, leaving an open space of about five inches. In each cut edge of the section there is an offset, to catch the edges of a valve which fits down upon it.

This valve is made of a piece of sole leather half an inch thick, having plates of iron attached to it on both the upper and corresponding under side to give it strength to resist the suction of the vacuum, which are perhaps one-fourth of an inch in thickness. They are not quite as wide as the leather, but wide enough to touch the offset in the section.

The plates are about nine inches long, and their ends, above and below, are placed three-quarters of an inch apart, forming joints, so as to give the leather valve pliability, and at the same time firmness to resist the powerful atmospheric pressure which is brought to bear on it when the air is exhausted. The entire length of the valve, from one end of the tube to the other, is attached to one side, like a cellar door, for example.

From the back side of the piston, a strong iron rod passes up through the aperture, which is made by raising up the edge of the valve, and is attached to the bottom of the foremost car. As fast as the piston passes along, the valve is released from pressure behind it, the loose edge is liberated, and the bar of iron which is attached to the car a foot or more behind the piston meets with no obstruction to its passage.

The pressure of the atmosphere on the valve in front of the piston, where the vacuum still exists, is so great that there is no danger of the bar of iron exerting pressure so far forward as to loosen the pliable valve; but to render the matter more certain, and to obviate all doubt, a slide on the bottom of the car slips along on the iron plate of the valve over and in advance of the piston, and presses firmly down. Every part of the tube is kept well oiled. The rate at which trains ascend varies from fifteen to twenty miles an hour, according to the load.

When we went up, there were six cars very well filled with passengers. After the ascent commences, two bridges across the Seine, and one viaduct of twenty feet high, and wide arches, are crossed, and one long tunnel through the brow of the hill and under the King's terrace is passed, where the road is parabolically curved.

The road has now been in operation five years, and so safely and so well has it worked, that the experiment is regarded as entirely successful. The cost of the entire machinery was eleven millions of francs. The cost of working it, or the dividends which the road pays, I did not ascertain.

Sources of Perfumes.

Whether any perfumed lady would be disconcerted at learning the sources of her perfumes, each lady must decide for herself; but it seems that Mr. De la Rue and Dr. Hoffman, in their capacities as jurors of the Great Exhibition, have made terrible havoc among the perfumery. They have found that many of the scents said to be procured from flowers and fruits, are really produced from any thing but flowery sources; the perfumers are chemists enough to know that similar odors may be often produced from dissimilar substances, and if the half-crown bottle of perfume really has the required odor, the perfumer does not expect to be asked what kind of odor was emitted by the substance whence the perfume was obtained. Now, Doctor Lyon Playfair, in his summary of the jury investigation above alluded to, broadly tells us that these primary odors are often most unbearable. "A peculiarly fœtid oil, termed fusel oil, is formed in making brandy and whisky; this fusel oil, distilled with sulphuric acid and acetate of potash, gives the oil of pears. The oil of apples is made from the same fusel oil, by distillation and sulphuric acid and bichromate of potash. The oil of pine-apples is obtained from a product of the action of putrid cheese on sugar, or by making a soap with butter, and distilling it with alcohol and sulphuric acid, and is now largely employed in England in making pine-apple ale. Oil of grapes and oil of cognac, used to impart the flavor of French cognac to British brandy, are little else than fusel oil. The artificial oil of bitter almonds, now so largely employed in perfuming soap and for flavoring confectionary, is prepared by the action of nitric acid off the fœtid oils of gas-tar. Many a fair forehead is damped with eau de millefleurs, without knowing that its essentia-ingredient is derived from the drainage of cow-houses." In all such cases as these, the chemical sicence involved is, really, of a high order, and the perfume produced is a bona fide perfume, not one whit less sterling than if produced from fruits and flowers. The only question is one of commercial honesty, in giving a name no longer applicable, and charging too highly for a cheaply produced scent. This mode of saving a penny is chemically right, but commercially wrong. [Household Words.

Discoveries of the Last Half Century.

There has been no period since the commencement of the world in which so many important discoveries, tending to the benefit of mankind, were made as in the last half century. Some of the most wonderful results of human intellect have been witnessed in the last fifty years. Some of the grandest conceptions of genius have been perfected. It is remarkable how the mind of the world has run into scientific investigation, and what achievements it has affected in that short period. Before the year 1800 there was not a single steamboat in existence, and the application of steam to machinery was unknown. Fulton launched the first steamboat in 1807. Now there are three thousand steamboats traversing the waters of America, and the time saved in travel is equal to seventy per cent. The rivers of every country in the world, nearly, are traversed by steamboats. In 1800 there was not a single railroad in the world. In the United States alone there is now 8,797 miles of railroad, costing $286,000,000 to build, and about 22,000 miles in England and America. The locomotive will now travel in as many hours a distance which in 1800 required as many days to accomplish. In 1800 it took weeks to convey intelligence between Philadelphia and New Orleans. Now it can be accomplished in minutes, through the electric telegraph, which only had its beginning in 1846. Voltaism was discovered in March, 1800; the electro-magnet in 1821. Electro-typing was only discovered a few years ago. Hoe's printing press, capable of printing 10,000 copies an hour, is a very recent discovery, but of the most important character. Gas-light was unknown in 1800; now every city and town of any pretence is lighted with it, and we have the announcement of a still greater discovery, by which light, heat, and motive power may be all produced from water, with scarcely any cost. Daguerre communicated to the world his beautiful invention in 1839. Gun-cotton and chloroform are discoveries but a few years old. Astronomy has added a number of planets to the solar system. Agricultural chemistry has enlarged the domain of knowledge in that important branch of scientific research, and mechanics have increased the facilities of production, and the means of accomplishing an amount of labor which far transcends the ability of united manual effort to accomplish. The triumphs achieved in this last branch of discovery and invention are enough to mark the last half century as that which has most contributed to augment personal comforts, enlarge the enjoyments, and add to the blessing of man. What will the next half century accomplish? We may look for still greater discoveries; for the intellect of man is awake, exploring every mine of knowledge, and searching for useful information in every department of art and industry. [Phil. On Cattle Feeding.

As this is the season when feeding cattle for winter beef is a prime object with all farmers, and also when they should prepare to lay out a system for winter feeding, we presume that a few remarks on this subject will be as words in right season.

In a great many cases, cattle feeding is badly managed on account of irregularity. Although this is so very common, and the consequences so palpable, yet it is a point very apt to be overlooked. If we were to ask six persons how they use a certain kind of food for their stock, we should probably get as many different answers. Some may use hay and turnips, giving plenty of the former, and sometimes of the latter, just as they find it convenient to provide them. The hay is given in large quantities at one time, with the injunction to let them have no more till they have finished what they have got. But the best method in this is on the principle of little and often. One day they get turnips in such large quantities as to produce the symptoms, and no doubt some of the effects, of scouring, and at another time they have so few that they are bound up in the bowels. And after trying this up-and-down way of it for a time, it is found out that the beasts hardly pay the expenses of carrying the roots for them, and the whole plan is condemned as unprofitable. Perhaps some artificial food is used; but instead of giving it regularly as to time and quantity, they get it just as it suits the parties in charge; and as the beasts eat it readily, and are anxious to get it, having no stated time for that, they are always on the look-out whenever they see the feeder, and are deprived of that rest which they ought to enjoy.

A good plan for feeding is to give the cattle hay when they are cleaning out in the morning, then give each about a bushel of turnips, and litter them deep, and after breakfast give each about another bushel of turnips, or half turnips and potatoes cut up, and leave them till noon; this is for stall feeding. The cattle want to lie soft and enjoy rest, in order to grow fat. About 1 o'clock they should get another feed of turnips and a few potatoes, about a quarter of a bushel of each, and at 2 o'clock a feed of good hay. At 5 o'clock P. M. they should get some hay, and be cleaned out again, after which they should be well littered for the night, get some fresh hay in their racks, and a composition food of boiled pumpkins, potatoes, and Indian meal, slightly salted; after which, let them rest for the night. Turnips should never be given in a frozen state. Some farmers never think about this; the cattle should be kept in moderately warm, dry, and well-ventilated stables.

For winter feeding, cattle should get their food as regularly as the feeders. Dry hay is a sorry morsel, day in and day out, and especially heated hay, that miserable stuff, deprived of half its original nutritive qualities by heating in the mow. This kind of hay is too plenty. Potatoes and turnips, or cabbages and bruised Indian corn, should be given to all cattle, young and old, at least once per day during the winter season. Every farmer should have a large iron boiler in a well-built shed, and food should be boiled in it once every day for milch cows; chopped straw, hay, crushed oats, a few potatoes, turnips, cabbages, &c., make palatable and comforting meals for neat cattle, but food must be given at stated times, or the good effect of cooked meals will not be exhibited. The Snake and the Crocodile.

It was one morning that I stood beside a small lake, fed by one of the rills from the mountains. The waters were clear as crystal, and everything could be seen to the very bottom. Stretching its limbs close over this pond, was a gigantic teak tree, and in its thick, shining, evergreen leaves, lay a huge boa, in an easy coil, taking its morning nap. Above him was a powerful ape of the baboon species, a leering race of scamps, always bent on mischief.

Now the ape, from his position, saw a crocodile in the water, rising to the top, exactly beneath the coil of the serpent. Quick as thought he jumped plump upon the snake, which fell with a splash into the jaws of the crocodile. The ape saved himself by clinging to a limb of the tree, but a battle royal immediately commenced in the water. The serpent, grasped in the middle by the crocodile, made the water boil by his furious contortions. Winding his fold round the body of his antagonist, he disabled his two hinder legs, and, by his contractions, made the scales and bones of the monster crack.

The water was speedily tinged with the blood of both combatants, yet neither was disposed to yield. They rolled over and over, neither being able to obtain a decided advantage. All this time the cause of mischief was in a state of the highest ecstacy. He leaped up and down the branches of the tree, came several times close to the scene of the fight, shook the limbs of the tree, uttered a yell, and again frisked about. At the end of ten minutes a silence began to come over the scene. The fold of the serpent began to be relaxed, and though they were trembling along the back, the head hung lifeless in the water.

The crocodile also was still, and though only the spines of his back were visible, it was evident that he, too, was dead. The monkey now perched himself on the lower limbs of the tree, close to the dead bodies, and amused himself for ten minutes in making all sorts of faces at them. This seemed to be adding insult to injury. One of my companions was standing at a short distance, and taking a stone from the edge of the lake, hurled it at the ape. He was totally unprepared, and as it struck him on the side of the head, he was instantly tipped over, and fell upon the crocodile. A few bounds, however, brought him ashore, and taking to the tree, he speedily disappeared among the thick branches.

Rural Axioms.

It is as cheap to raise one ton of grass clover as a ton of burdocks or pig-weeds.

It costs no more to raise a hundred bushels of Baldwins than a hundred bushels of cider apples; or ten barrels of Virgalieus or Bartletts than the same quantity of choke-pears.

An axe costing two dollars, with which a laborer may cut fifty cords a month, is a cheaper tool than an axe costing but one dollar, and with which he can cut only forty cords.

A "cheap plough" at five dollars, costing in one season three dollars for repairs, and three more in lost time to teams, men, and by retarding crops, is a dearer plough than one at ten dollars, requiring no repairs.

A cow bought for ten dollars, whose milk but just pays her keeping, affords less profit than one at thirty dollars, giving double the value of milk afforded by the former.

A common dasher churn at two dollars, used one hundred times a year, is not so economical a purchase as a Kendall churn at four dollars, requiring but half the labor to work it.

A ten-acre field, costing fifty dollars per acre, and ditched, manured, and improved at fifty dollars more, so as to give double crops, is much more valuable and profitable than twenty acres unimproved, costing the same money.

The laborer who wastes half his strength in working all day with a dull saw, because he cannot give a shilling or afford half an hour to get it sharpened, will waste at least twenty-five cents per day, or six or seven dollars per month.

The man who loses half an hour of time, with one shilling, and wears his wagon and team equal to two shillings more, by going over a long and rough road, to avoid a plank-road toll of sixpence, loses just two and sixpence by the operation. This does not apply to the loaded wagon, where the loss is much greater than from the smaller loads.

Kossuth and Hungary.

The Boston Commonwealth, in noticing the the charge that Kossuth is living at his ease, in London, on the money given for the Hungarian cause in America, makes the following statement, which is presumed to be correct:—

"We take the opportunity of stating, from positive knowledge, that of the $90,000 or $100,000 which Kossuth collected in this country, hardly a dollar crossed the Atlantic with him. He expended it in this country in purchasing and making munitions of war, by the manufacture of which he gave employment to a large number of his destitute countrymen. He had for months nearly a hundred of them employed in making catridges alone. He expended it also in carrying on a most extensive and costly correspondence with his agents in Europe, transmitting, of course, his letters by private messengers, who went at the risk of their lives, and had to be amply furnished with money for emergencies. Every letter which Kossuth sent to Hungary cost him on an average $500. The money that he raised here was of course easily absorbed by these expenditures, and with it, as we know, was spent a considerable sum belonging to his wife, which her relatives in Hungary sent her for her own use, but which she gave to her husband for his cause. Kossuth left America penniless and in debt, as in 1849 he left Hungary, after two years' administration of the treasury of that rich Kingdom."

Despising Household Duties.

From a variety of causes, nothing is more common than to find American women who have not the slightest idea of household duties. A writer thus alludes to this subject:—

"In this neglect of household cares, American women stand alone. A German lady, no matter how lofty her rank, never forgets that domestic labors conduce to the health of body and mind alike. An English lady, whether she be only a gentleman's wife or a duke's, does not despise the household, and even though she has a house-keeper, devotes a portion of her time to this, her true, her happiest sphere. It is reserved for our republican fine ladies to be more choice than even their monarchical and aristocratic sisters. The result is a lassitude of mind often as fatal to heath as the neglect of bodily exercise. The wife who leaves her household cares to the servants, pays the penalty which has been affixed to idleness since the foundation of the world, and either wilts away from ennui, or is driven into all sorts of fashionable follies to find employment for her mind."

Good Penmanship.—Says the Christian Review: Oftentimes when an old manuscript turns up or comes under notice, written fifty, or one hundred, or two hundred years ago, we have been struck with the beauty and finish of its execution, and thought certainly the fathers were more elegant penmen than their children. This was probably owing to their superior patience and painstaking. We were lately shown a quarto volume on penmanship, written a half century ago, by Henry Dean, a Quaker and writing-master of Salem, Mass., whose success in his profession was, perhaps, unexampled. So completely satisfactory and successful was his teaching to his employers, that they gave their names—and it is a very long list—as subscribers to his book, at seven dollars the copy. It was a costly publication in consequence of the amount of engraving necessary to carry out his design. Dean is said never to have failed in making a good writer of a pupil entrusted to his care for a sufficient length of time.

Culture of Cranberry Vines.—The variety mostly cultivated in New England are hardy and prolific. They can be raised on upland or rather moist loam, but do the best on low, damp or moist meadow land, with a little sand put around the plant. They may be planted out one and a half or two feet apart each way. Two feet apart will take ten thousand plants to the acre; if on low ground, it should be pared, ploughed, or burnt over, to take out the grass or weeds, and cultivated for one or two years, until they cover the ground. The yield after that is from one hundred and fifty to two hundred and fifty bushels per acre. They are usually gathered with a cranberry rake, to be found in any agricultural store. It is not necessary to flow meadows in order to make them productive.

"Pickings" of the Crystal Palace.—A London paper tells the following about the Crystal Palace: We understand that the offers of large sums made by several parties for monopoly of the "pickings" to be found beneath the boards of the Crystal Palace, were all refused by the contractors, Messrs. Fox and Henderson, who generously gave permission to the laborers employed upon the spot to appropriate to themselves any "treasure trove" which they might chance to light upon in removing the planks of which the flooring was composed, and in turning up the surface of the turf below. These findings have been quite godsends to some of the men employed upon the works. Coins of copper, silver, and gold, crotchet purses, studs, rings, lockets, &c., have turned up daily, to say nothing of gold and silver headed canes, and other miscellaneous articles, and one day last week a poor man was fortunate enough to stumble upon a purse containing between 7*l*. and 8*l*. It would seem from this fact that all the treasures lost in the Great Exhibition last summer did not fall into the hands of the light-fingered gentry, though many of them doubtless reaped a plentiful harvest of the spoils.

Champagne.—The average quantity of genuine champagne annually produced is said to exceed fifty millions of bottles, a quantity quite insufficient to meet the public demand, as the great number of establishments for the production of spurious champagne attest. I have heard it stated on good authority, that in one establishment alone upward of 500,000 bottles of so-called champagne, made principally from the stalks of rhubarb, are annually sold. Some idea may be formed of the relative consumption of real champagne by different countries from the following return of the sales in 1843 of the Department of the Marne. The total quantity amounted to 2,689,000 bottles, which were thus distributed: England and British India, 467,000; Russia and Poland, 502,000; Germany, including Prussia and the Austrian dominions, 439,000; United States of America and the West Indies, 400,000; Italy, 60,000; Belgium, 56,000; Holland, 30,000; Sweden and Denmark, 30,000; Switzerland, 30,000; South America, 30,000; Spain and Portugal, 20,000; Turkey, 5,000; and France, 620,000 bottles. A Castor Oil Epidemic.—On a late trip of one of our New Orleans steamers, she was crowded with German emigrants. As might be expected, their appetite for fruit and vegtables after a long sea voyage was most voracious. At Selma, a short distance below this city, the boat received some fifteen or twenty sacks of castor beans, consigned to Mr. Blow. The appearance of the bean, "good to the eye," excited the cravings of the emigrants. Finally, curiosity and appetite triumphed; a bag was surreptitiously opened, a large pan full extracted, and a huge luncheon of soup prepared. In a short time the passengers in the cabin, and the officers of the boat, were startled by the report that the cholera in its worst form had broken out on deck. On going down below, they found that the castor oil was doing its work. The bag lay exposed and a large pot full of this rare delicacy steaming hot on the table. The thing was soon solved, and the captain had to go into quarantine, because, as he said, the Dutch didn't "know beans." [St. Louis Repub.

The Causes of Fire in Boston.—The annual report of the Boston Fire Department states the loss by fire in Boston, for the year ending September 1, 1852, to be a fraction short of half a million dollars. It also gives the cause of each fire, as far as ascertained, a recapitulation of which may be useful.

It appears that the number of fires during the year has been 134, and the chief causes thereof as follows: Incendiary, 26; bed clothes, beds, bedding and clothing, taking fire from lamps, 8; fire-crackers, 7; from children playing with matches, 3; camphene, 6; explosion of gas, 2; from defects in the erection of furnaces, chimnies and flues, 33; from stoves and stove-pipes, 4; spontaneous combustion, 2; from a lamp set in a bureau, 1; rags in attic windows taking fire from a spark, 1; kindlings in a closet taking fire, 1; hot ashes in a box, 1; box taking fire from stove, 1; from slacking of lime, 1; &c.

A Southern Feud.—The Memphis Express gives an account of a most extraordinary and fatal feud existing in Gerrard College, Kentucky, between two powerful families—the Hills and Evanses, and their adherents. At a recent investigation, it appears that the quarrel dates as far back as 1822, and never was feud more bloodily or unsparingly followed up in the worst days of baronial England or Scottish clanship than has been this between two prominent and otherwise highly respectable families, in our own age and country. At a recent examination, three of the Hills were tried, and two of them ordered for committal. Five of the Evanses, however, were in jail, and it would not do to confine them together, lest more bloodshed would follow. While the subject was under debate, the Hills escaped, and the Evanses made a desperate but ineffectual attempt to break out of prison. A reward is offered for the apprehension of the Hills.

A Modern Miser.—Mr. John Crofts Coffield, aged seventy-six years, died on the 28th ult., at his residence in Ann-street, Boston, where he has for several years lived in a penurious and retired manner. It was believed that by his penurious habits he had saved a small sum of money, earned at his trade, cobbling boots and shoes; but great was the surprise of his friends and others on overhauling the old boots in the corner of his room, soon after his death, to find some of them literally crammed with old wallets well filled with the "root of all evil." It is impossible at present to tell the amount of fortune he has left; but it has been estimated at so large a sum as to seem incredible, $200,000. He has left a will, well and faithfully executed, in which he decrees that his estate shall be kept in trust for twenty years before the heirs, with one exception, can receive any benefit therefrom.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

The Sabbath Recorder.

OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

The Universal Observance of the Sabbath in Millennial Times.

The cause of such displeasure, the Lord expected and foretold, should be matter, not of wonder only, but of inquiry also, at a future and distant time. "The generation to come of your children that shall rise up after you, and the stranger that shall come from a far land, shall say, when they see the plagues of that land, and the sicknesses which the Lord hath laid upon it, and that the whole land thereof is brimstone, and salt, and burning, that it is not sown, nor beareth, nor any grass groweth therein, like the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorah, Admah and Zeboim, which the Lord overthrew in his anger and in his wrath; even all nations shall say, Wherefore hath the Lord done thus unto this land? what meaneth the heat of this great anger? Then men shall say, Because they have forsaken the covenant of the Lord God of their fathers, which he made with them when he brought them forth out of the land of Egypt." Deut. xxix. 22—25. That this is a prophecy of their state down to the present time, will admit of no dispute; for although it is to anticipate in part our argument, the continuation of Moses, discourse (contained in the ensuing chapter) predicts not only the termination, not only of the sorrow, but also of the sin which occasions it—while it foretells the abundance of blessing, spiritual and temporal, which shall follow, in terms which preclude the possibility of misapplication of it to any period in the past history of Israel or Judah. "And it shall come to pass, when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse, which I have set before thee, and thou shall call them to mind among all the nations whither the Lord thy God hath driven thee, and shalt return unto the Lord thy God, and shalt obey his voice, according to all that I command thee this day, thou and thy children, with all thine heart and with all thy soul, that then the Lord thy God will turn thy captivity, and have compassion upon thee, and will return and gather thee from all the nations whither the Lord thy God hath scattered thee." And following up this promise with blessing and prosperity "above" their fathers, and hearts "to love the Lord," the prophet continues, "And thou shalt return and obey the voice of the Lord, and do all his commandments WHICH I COMMAND THEE this day." Deut. xxx. 1—8.

From this prediction it is evident, that when Israel and Judah are gathered from the dispersion and captivity to which they have been subjected on account of their violation of God's covenant, that they will return to the observance of the whole law, as given unto them by Moses—the observance of the Seventh Day as the Sabbath of the Lord therefore included. This we shall see abundantly confirmed. It is indeed when they shall return to "obey" this law, that God here promises to remember them in mercy, to restore them to the land which their fathers possessed, and to do them good, and to multiply them above their fathers. The very extent of promised blessing is the best evidence that the prophet refers to a yet future time, while all the blessing promised stands in connection with their observance of the whole Law. "And the Lord thy God will make thee plenteous in every work of thine hand, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy land, for good; for the Lord will again rejoice over thee for good, as he rejoiced over thy fathers; if thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to keep His commandments and his statutes, which are written in this Book of the Law, and if thou turn unto the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul." ver. 9, 10.

In harmony with this view of the continuing obligation of the Law of Moses upon the house of Israel, is the last charge of God unto them in the Old Testament, by the prophet Malachi: "Remember ye the law of Moses my servant, which I commanded unto him in Horeb, for all Israel, with the statutes and judgments." Mal. iv. 4. It is, indeed, remarkable, that the book which closes the canon of the Old Testament Scriptures, should thus terminate with a charge so clear and precise for Israel to remember "the law of Moses." If the view which the Gentile church has adopted were correct, we might rather have expected, instead of a renewed nd earnest enforcement of the observance of t se "statutes and judgments," a prediction th the time was drawing near when they sho cease to have authority, and when, by divin opointment this order of things would wholly taken away. As it is, how much evil may charged against those who have unnecessa y, laid a stumbling-block in their brother's w Need we be surprised, that the Jew sho be incredulous, when told that the earnest nctions, given in such statements, all wit limitation of time for observance, were referring to institutions which, without premonition, were to lose their value and obligation? Or is it marvelous, that such as knew Christianity only through the precepts and practice of its professors, should question the Messiahship of Him to whom such allegations are falsely ascribed? Although the sacrifices by necessity ceased with the overthrow of the Temple, to which they were by the law restricted, the Jew can look back to the captivity in Babylon, when also the sacrifice had ceased to be offered. He sees in the cause and circumstances of that time, a full explanation of his present condition. The sin of the people of the Lord was the cause why Nebuchadnezar was permitted to burn the temple built by Solomon—thus preventing for a period the possibility, on the part of any, of observing as previously the Mosaic law. But the fact of the Temple's re-erection, under divine sanction, is evidence that the law itself was not annulled by the interruption which transgression had occasioned. Thus, its destruction, as distinctly intimated in the Scriptures, exhibits the reason of the later power of the Romans, when they again laid low "the holy and the beautiful House" in which Israel's fathers had praised the Lord. And the rebuilding of that House, on their redemption from Babylon, explains the principle of the divine proceedure, and gives encouragement to faith in our depending upon the promises that yet again the House of the Lord shall be established to His praise. (To be continued.

THE CHINA MISSION.

An interesting communication from Bro. Carpenter has been received, dated the 15th of August, 1852, from which we make the following extracts:

"The hot season has been upon us as an armed man, and we have all felt, and do still feel, the effects of it. It came on earlier, this season, than usual, and got through earlier. In June, the mercury stood at 100° in the shade, on two successive days. Many days since it has been at 98°. Within a few days it has fallen about 15°, and we expect no more hot weather this season.

"We have just had a three-days typhoon, during which an American ship, the Hoogly, just from San Francisco, was wrecked, a little way out from Woosung. All on board, except one, were saved.

"During the oppressively hot weather, we have been enabled to keep up our regular services in the Chapel, and to do something out of the Chapel; but have met with no special encouragement in our labors, except such as is independent of any apparent success in striving to win souls to Christ. Shanghae is certainly a hard field; and its importance, as a mission station, will have to be estimated, in no small degree, from its connection with other parts of the country.

"On the 11th of last month, we were agreeably surprised by the coming of two Jews from Honan. One of them was the same man who was here a year ago; the other, his own brother. They came from the ship direct to our house. They say that, after they returned home last fall, they consulted with their brethren, and wrote us; and getting no reply, wrote again, and again. Their letters, if they sent any, never reached us; and we, wearied with waiting, had just prepared a letter to send, when they came.

"A year ago, while they were here, a Jewish firm in Shanghae offered to take and educate some of their children. We, also, had consented to take a very few. Accordingly, this year, they had collected fourteen children, intending ten of them for the Jewish firm, and four for us. As they were upon the point of starting, they heard of the disturbances at Ningpo, which frightened them so that they left the children under the instruction of the teacher who was here a year ago, and these two men came on. The object of their coming was two-fold. 1. They had some business to transact with Dr. Medhurst. 2. To make arrangements for the education of some of their children. Connected with this was a desire to obtain a preacher to go and instruct their people. The elder brother is a merchant, a shrewd, active, energetic man. His younger brother appears to be a man of an amiable disposition, good abilities, and can read the Chinese character tolerably well.

"After spending the first night with us, they went to see Dr. M., and accepted an invitation to stop with him. They tarried there about half a month, frequently visiting us, and attending nearly all of our Sabbath meetings. Finally, failing to accomplish their business with Dr. M., they left his premises, and came to us, and tarried about ten days. During this time, we enjoyed numerous and interesting interviews with them, mostly concerning their own people and the Gospel of Jesus Christ. The younger brother, especially, manifested an ardent thirst for knowledge, which was as ardently supplied. Tong was in his element, while laboring to instruct them. During their stay, I found in myself a marked improvement in the ease with which I could converse with them.

"Before they left, they made an earnest request, that we take some of their children to instruct in the Hebrew language, and in the truths of Christianity. They proposed, definitely, that the younger of the two should return in about three months to Shanghae, with his two sons, and stay with them, to attend to the preparation of thir food and clothing; and that the elder, (who expects to be engaged, hereafter, in mercantile operations, that will call him to visit Shanghae twice a year,) bring his two sons next spring, and that these also be under the same superintendence, in regard to food and clothing. They also proposed that we send Tong to them, early next year. They make no reliance, now, upon the Jewish firm in Shanghae, to take any of their children. So far as we know, there are none in Shanghae to whom they look, excepting us, to do this for them.* Whether this opening be a mere accident, or the dictate of Divine Providence, we leave for you to judge. We have though it was God, who opened the door, and bid us enter.

"You will be anxious to hear how we have disposed of their requests. In the first place, the sending of a Timothy, or a Titus, (had we the man,) would, of course, appear to be the first duty to be considered. But in deliberating upon this matter, it appeared that we could not unite in recommending to the suffrages of the Board, for this mission, any native we have with us. The business is so important, requiring such sterling qualities, that it is feared no Chinaman we are acquainted with would answer the purpose. And in reference to Tong, although he is well adapted for the work in some respects, it is feared that he is not in all respects. At any rate, there would be a risk which we, at present, feel unauthorized to run. But on the contrary, we fear, we might be laying hands too suddenly upon a novitiate, tempting him to be lifted up with pride, and being the occasion of his falling into the snare of the devil.

"But if we should afford these Jews no encouragement, they would return disheartened and disgusted, and it would be vastly more difficult, hereafter, to do any thing for them. So we have consented to take four of their children, at least, and sustain a man to have charge of their food and clothing. We have advanced fifty dollars, to get the first two children, and promised twenty-five dollars a year for each child, and fifty dollars a year for the man who is to look after them. He has a wife and mother-in-law, at Kai-fong-fou, to sustain. The number can remain stationary, or be increased, according to the pleasure of the Board. We have not bound ourselves, or them, to any definite number of years. If the Board should think we have acted too hastily in these things, our apology is, the case seemed to us to demand dispatch. The distance between here and Honan is great, to a Chinese, and expensive: more than half the way is by land. The people are poor, and feel, very sensibly, the expense of the two trips already made to Shanghae; and we felt so confident that we should be cheerfully backed up in this measure by our brethren, that we have felt but little hesitation in making such a beginning. In this way, we think, we can feel our way along; and perhaps the way may be prepared, after a while, to send a preacher into Honan. At present, if the children come, we shall need the services of Tong, for a while, in instructing them, and also the man who will come with them, and in other ways. Perhaps I shall translate my Hebrew and English Lexicon, and make it a Hebrew and Chinese Lexicon, and subject the Grammar and Chrestomathy to a similar process. If so, it will require some months to bring them out.

"Three days ago, (12th inst.,) the two Jews, after bowing the knee with us before the God of Abraham, to invoke his blessing and protection, took their leave of us, and were accompanied by Tong to the ship. They took with them a letter from our little church, addressed to their synagogue, stating, among other things, the arrangement we had entered into in regard to the children.

"If our people feel spirited in regard to this enterprise of attempting something efficient for the Honan Jews, and if the Board approve of our plan for commencing it, and furnish the means, we can prepare the room for ten boys, for study and sleeping, for fifty dollars or less, and allow them to bring on that number as soon as they please. In this case, the whole expense, for the first year, would probably fall not much short of five hundred and fifty dollars; and after that, about three hundred dollars annually. Perhaps this is more than our people would like to undertake in this line. The whole expense, for the first year, for those already pledged, will be probably about two hundred and thirty dollars; after that, one hundred and fifty dollars."

Kai-fong-fou, the capital city of the province of Honan, where the Jewish colony resides, is distant from Shanghae about 900 English miles, and lies on the south bank of the Hoang-ho or Yellow River, in latitude about 35° N. As the river, from the excessive rapidity of its current, is unnavigable for the greater part of its length, the journey from Kai-fong-fou is performed, part of the way, by land. For the information of our readers, we subjoin the following extract from Williams' Middle Kingdom:—

"This existence of Jews in China has long been known, but the information possessed relative to their present number, condition, and organization, is very imperfect. Mr. Finn has lately published a well-digested account of the data collected concerning them by Gozani and other Jesuits, in the last century and before. The only city where they are found in a separate community large enough to attract attention is Kai-fong-fou in Honan, where they are known by the designation Tiau-kin-kiau, the sect which pulls out the sinew; De Guignes says they are also called Lau-mau Hwui-tsz', 'Mohammedans with Blue Bonnets,' because they wear a blue cap when they assemble in the synagogue. The whole place of worship occupies a space of between three and four hundred feet in length and about one hundred and fifty in breadth, comprising four successive courts. The first court has in its center a portal, bearing an inscription to the Creator and Preserver of all things. The second court, entered through a large gate with two side wickets, contains dwellings for the keeper of the edifice. The third court contains a portal like that in the first, and tablets with inscriptions, and two chapels commemorative of their benefactors, with guest chambers. The fourth court is divided by a row of trees, and half-way down there is a brazen incense vase, and some other vases and sculpture. Adjoining the northern wall is a recess, where the sinews are extracted from animals slain for food. A hall of ancestors is placed on the north and south sides of this court, where the Old Testament worthies are venerated at the equinoxes in the Chinese manner, their names being written upon tablets; censers are in them dedicated to Abraham, Moses, and others. Between these two halls, the booths used at the Feast of Tabernacles are annually erected. At the upper end of the court is the Li-pai-sz', or synagogue, a building about sixty by forty feet, having a portico with a double row of four columns before it. In the center of the room, between the rows of pillars, is the throne of Moses, a magnificent and elevated chair with an embroidered cushion, upon which they place the book of the law while it is read. Over it is a dome, and near by is the Wansui pai or Imperial tablet, but his majesty's title is surmounted by a Hebrew inscription, 'Hear, O Israel: the Lord our God is one Lord. Blessed be the name of the glory of his kingdom, forever and ever.' There is also another inscription in Hebrew in the room, on a portal: 'Blessed be the Lord forever: The Lord is God of gods, and the Lord: a great God, strong and terrible.' There is a table on which are placed six candelabra, and an incense vase in the middle of them; and near it is a laver for washing hands. Separated from the rest of the room by a railing is the beth-el, or house of prayer, square outside and round within, where none but the rabbi can enter during the time of prayer. Rolls of the law upon tables, and the Ten Commandments in Hebrew on the wall, and closets containing manuscripts, occupy the remainder of the apartment.

"On entering, the people take off their shoes; and the minister covers his face with a gauze when reading, and wears a red silk scarf across his breast; no instruments of music are used in the services. They observe circumcision, the passover, and feast of tabernacles, the rejoicing of the law, Sabbath, and perhaps the day of atonement; make no proselytes, and never marry with the gentiles. They use their sacred books in casting lots, and pay homage to Confucius as the Chinese do. They say Adonai for the ineffable name, and render it in Chinese by tien, and not by shangti. They have no creed, but hold to the unity of God, and the doctrines of heaven, hell, and a sort of purgatory, resurrection, final judgment, and angels. Of the Lord Jesus Christ they had never heard, nor had they any prejudices against the crucifix. They worship no idols, and refuse to take an oath in a heathen temple; and pray westward towards Jerusalem. It is quite likely that they have all the canonical books of the Old Testament, but the Romish fathers were not allowed to copy them, and those who saw them were not able to read when they had the permission; these books are preserved with rigid care. Many of the books they once had have been destroyed by inundations, to which the city of Kai-fong-fou is subject from its nearness to the Yellow river. Comparisons were made between portions of their manuscripts and the Hebrew text, the result of which showed a complete conformity in sense, with a few verbal differences only. The time of the arrival of the Jews in China is involved in great uncertainty, but Mr. Finn sums up the evidences to show that they are Jews of the restoration from Chaldea, adducing the fact of their having portions of Malachi and Zechariah, adopting the era of Saleucus, and having many rabbinical titles and rules for slaughtering animals. He thinks, too, they belong to the two tribes, and quotes some authorities to show that they came through Central Asia—a different route from the Mohammedans, who seem for the most part to have reached China by sea. Members of this community are said to have once lived at Hang-cau-fu and Nangking; but the man whom Mr. Milne asked concerning them at Ningpo knew of none except at Kai-fung, and of them not much beyond their existence."

JAMES BRAINARD TAYLOR.

We find this note appended to the memoir of the man of God whose name stands at the head of this article, which will enable us to see how it was that he made such extraordinary progress in the divine life, and give us light in reference to our duty.

"Mr. Taylor's familiarity with the contents of the Bible, was observable by all with whom he associated. It was an interesting trait in his habits of intercourse with friends, that when the conversation seemed at a stand, he would take out his little pocket Bible, saying, 'I guess I can find something here to amuse us;' and then would give a familiar exposition of some passage, and connect with the illustration some anecdote; at the same time repeating and turning to parallel passages; so that no one could listen to him without feeling deeply interested. So peculiarly happy was he in these familiar illustrations, that it was not an unfrequent thing to see those around him smile with delight, and at the next moment weep with deep emotion. There are many, who were often in his society, who will recognize the truth of this remark in their own experience. He would often speak of his Bible as the 'dear little book.' I was present at his examination, and never heard any man quote the sacred Scriptures with such fluency for confirmation of his doctrinal views, as the questions were successively proposed to him."

SCRIPTURES ENLIGHTENING THE EYES.

About fourteen years ago, there dwelt a zealous young Romanist on the mountains of Tyrone, in Ireland. Being a youth of talent, he held frequent discussions with the Irish teachers of the district; and, that he might be thoroughly furnished for the controversy, he commenced to study the Scriptures. The more he studied, the more he doubted; and such were his mental struggles, that he would spend hours at a time on the solitary mountains, behind his father's house, in such agony of thought and prayer, that the cold sweat would break out on his temples. At length he resolved to go to Stewartstown to hear the Rev. Robert Allen preach. His text on that occasion was, "And the Spirit and the bride say, Come," &c.; and little did he dream the results that were to follow that sermon. The bow was drawn at a venture, the Most Holy directed the arrow, and the young man left the church a Protestant, and we trust, a true Christian. He was taken up by a few Christian ladies, educated, and at length ordained. And that young peasant is now the Rev. Michael Brannigan, one of the most honored instruments in the great missionary movement at present going on in the province of Connaught.

AUTUMN WINDS.

Autumn breezes murmur gently,
Sweeping onward, wild and free;
And I listen to the breathings
Of their varied minstrelsy.
Mingled tones are sweetly blending,
In a mournful, mirthful strain;
Trembling, gushing, moaning, dying,
And anon they swell again.

Aye! their tones, so sweetly thrilling,
In my heart a spell have wrought;
All their gushing harp-notes seeming
With unearthly music fraught.
Vague and fitful are the shadows
O'er my secret spirit cast;
Chords are swept within my bosom,
By the music of the blast.

Summer roses all have faded,
Flowerets withered at a breath,
By the autumn breezes shaded,
With the gloomy hue of death;
They have borne upon their pinions,
Lavish treasures of perfume;
Oft they chant, in mournful murmurs.
Requiems o'er the floweret's tomb.

They have tinged with gold and purple
All the leaflets of the wood,
And the wildwood boughs are waving
To and fro in solitude;
They have shorn the forest monarch
Of its leafy diadem,
And its branches now are studded
With the frost-pearl's flashing gem.

Yet, the autumn breezes whisper
Truthful lessons to the heart;
If we heed their golden precepts,
We will "choose the better part."
Aye! they teach us life is fleeting,
As the summer season past,
And its winter coming fast.

And they sing, in mirthful measures,
Of sweet spring-time's sunny hours,
Which from earth in beauty waken
Lovely, fragrant, blooming flowers.
Would we hear, they whisper to us
Of a resurrection morn;
Mouldered dust may then be quickened,
And to life eternal born.

Then to us should sighing breezes,
Messengers of mercy prove,
Fanning sparks on faith's pure altar,
Into glowing fires of love;
Calmly cooling passion's fever,
Soothing wounds of sorrow's dart;
Giving life to plants of promise,
Springing up within the heart;

Crystal fountains there unsealing,
Welling up in rills of bliss,
Purifying thought and feeling,
Giving birth to inward peace.
We should hail their angel voices,
As they chant each thrilling strain,
Treasure up their holy teachings,
Garner well each golden grain.

Then the clouds of grief and sorrow,
May not shroud our souls in gloom;
Flowers fadeless and immortal,
In our hearts may ever bloom;
Which the autumn winds of sorrow
Cannot blast, though fiercely driven;
Which shall bloom through life eternal,
In the atmosphere of heaven. ELLIS.

PLAINFIELD, N. J., Nov. 11th, 1852.

DR. ROBINSON'S TOUR.

The Rev. Dr. Robinson, the celebrated Biblical and Oriental Scholar, has returned to New York, with his wife, son, and daughter, after an absence of a year. The family of Dr. Robinson has remained, during that time, with relations in Berlin, while he has been occupied in extending his researches in Palestine. He reached Beyrout in the beginning of March last, and remained there a short time, to be present at the annual meeting of the Syrian Mission, which commenced on the 18th of that month. The latter rains, which were unusually protracted, were also a cause of detention. He represents the meeting to have been one of great interest. Several important questions were brought forward for discussion. The new Arabic version of the Scriptures, by Dr. Eli Smith, was one topic. The Pentateuch has been translated. It was interesting to Dr. Robinson, of course, to find that all but four of the ordained missionaries present, had been his own pupils.

It had benn arranged, that Dr. Smith should accompany Dr. Robinson to Jerusalem, and on to Hasbeiya, at which point Mr. Thompson should take Dr. Smith's place, and return with Dr. Robinson to Beyrout. Accordingly, Drs. Robinson and Smith, taking the necessary guides, donkeys, &c., set out for a leisurely tour to Jerusalem, in the same way that they took fourteen years ago. With what emotions they must have undertaken the journey, after so long an interval, we can, in some degree, imagine.

They traveled very slowly, examining every principal point of interest, especially in Galilee, which has hitherto been almost entirely neglected by travelers. The country was found to be fruitful, beyond anything to be found in our own Western country. Immense crops of wheat were growing with unparalleled luxuriance. They found many remains of temples, which were of most elaborate and elegant workmanship. In the southern part of Lebanon, and throughout Galilee, they are very numerous. Dr. Robinson refers them to a period near the birth of Christ. Among the places visited, (and some of them for the first time discovered by moderns,) were the two Ramahs—Meron, a place of Jewish pilgrimage, where many of their doctors are buried—Cana—Bethlehem of Zebulon, now a miserable village—the plain of Esdraelon, (in the middle of which they encamped)—the sites of Megiddo and Taannuk—the battle-field of Jabin and Barak-Dothan, where Joseph was sold by his brethren into Egypt—Nabulus, where Dr. Smith obtained an Arabic version of the Scriptures, the work of the Jesuits—Lydda, where they found an ancient wine-press in perfect preservation—the valley of Ajalon, over which the moon stood still—Zorah, the birth-place of Samson, near which women were carrying water from a fountain, as did Samson's mother, and as they do throughout Palestine.

In Jerusalem, Dr. Robinson found little that he had not seen before. He was able to get facts sufficient to explode some recent theories of travelers, respecting ancient typography. After remaining there twelve days, they struck north, to Micmash—visited the ancient Adomah, where they had a fine view of the Jordan—descended into the valley of the river, to Succoth, now nothing but a ruin—encamped there with the people who had come out with their wives, children, horses, and donkeys, to secure the harvest—instituted a successful search for Pella, after crossing the Jordan without difficulty—visited "The Stone of the Christians," from which they saw the view of the Sea of Tiberias, spoken of by a writer in the seventh century—came to Kadesh, and thence back to Hasbeiya. After remaining there three days, Dr. Smith returned home, and Dr. Robinson and the Rev. Mr. Thompson took up the thread of investigation. They passed through a chasm of Lebanon to Lake Phiala, which, they found, is not the source of the Jordan, as has been supposed, but only a stagnant pool, full of frogs and leeches—they settled the disputed point, that the three great sources of the Jordan do unite, before entering the first lake—passed through another chasm to Damascus, finding ten or twelve heathen temples on the way, which Dr. Robinson thinks are older than Baalbec—from Damascus to the ancient seat of Aggrippa's kingdom—to the sources of the Orontes—thence north to Baalbec, where are the finest temples they had ever seen; the columns being seven feet in diameter, resting upon a base fifty feet in height, and yet the whole so symmetrical, as to seem of airy lightness; thence to the Sabbatical river, which Titus crossed, and was said to flow but six days in the week—to Adonis, where the ruins of the temple of Venus are still seen—and then back to Beyrout.

This is a meagre sketch of the general course pursued by Dr. Robinson. A complete account will, of course, be given to the [illegible] searches will be made into a geography of Palestine. Such a work would be hailed with great satisfaction by all Biblical students, and would constitute a lasting monument of the author's scholarship and diligence. Palestine has been appropriated, almost, by Dr. Robinson. He was the first of moderns to go up and possess the goodly land. He has now left little to be done in this field by travelers. How strange that it should have been left for an American scholar to make known to the world the exact feature of that country of wondrous interest! [Puritan Recorder.

PETE AND THE OAK.

A man some twenty-five years of age, who had a small family, and who was notorious for his profanity and wickedness, applied to a worthy and pious man for the rent of a small house, which he obtained on moderate terms. The landlord called upon him one morning for a day's work, and they went together to the woods to chop fuel. They fell to work upon a huge white oak, some three feet in diameter at the base. After a vigorous and persevering effort, its massive form, with tremendous crash, fell to the earth, sweeping all in its course. The good man, springing upon the prostrate trunk, cried out,

"Pete, do you think that tree will ever get up again?"

"No," was the stern reply.

"Well, you know the Scripture truth, 'In the place where the tree falleth, there it shall be;' and, as death leaves us, so the judgment will find us. (See Eccl. 11: 3, and Heb. 9: 27.)

Pete made no reply, and they both earnestly engaged in trimming off the branches of the fallen tree. It was evident, however, that the truth had made a deep impression on Pete's mind. So, after a long silence, the landlord said, "Pete, do you ever ask those pious friends of yours to pray, when they come to see you?"

"No, I never thought of it; but I will ask them the next chance."

Time passed on, and when the pious friends next visited at Pete's house, he remembered the landlord's suggestion; so, in the evening, he said to one of them, calling him by name, "Will you pray for us, before we go to bed?"

"No, Pete, pray for yourself; you have most need of it."

This was a damper; but it only increased his uneasiness. He felt that he ought not to go to bed without prayer; he went out into the field, and tried to pray. When he came into the house, the conviction seized him that prayer must be made in the house, before he slept. He knelt at his bedside and prayed again. The next Sunday he went to the landlord's house and asked him if he was going to meeting; he replied,

"Yes, before long. Are you going?"

"I am."

In a short time they were ready, and started on foot for the place of meeting. Pete went forward, and the landlord followed rapidly, just to remain in his company. It was a prayer meeting; but poor Pete was attentive, and soon his tears began to flow. No uncommon religious interest was prevailing in the neighborhood, but at the close of the service, Pete requested that a similar one might be held at his own house that evening. Notice was accordingly given, and his small habitation was filled with attendants. Earnest prayers and exhortations were that evening heard, where such sounds had long been unknown. At the close of the meeting, Pete was calm. The next morning his friend found him filled with joy and peace in believing; and, ascertaining that he was destitute of the Bible, he was furnished with a copy from the depository of the Warren County Bible Society. The book was received with smiles and tears of joy, and was put to immediate use. We learn that he still holds on his way, a student of the Word of God, and a man of prayer.

A Proclamation.

The varied blessings enjoyed by the people of this State during the past year, call forth the grateful tribute of praise and devotion due to our heavenly Benefactor. An abundant harvest, crowning the labors of the husbandman, and filling the land with plenty; peace with all nations; the maintenance of social order and free institutions, imparting fresh vigor to the cause of civil liberty; the diffusion of religion and learning; the general prevalence of health; the merciful deliverance of the towns and cities which were visited for a season by the destroying pestilence, and the innumerable benefits which have been conferred upon our commonwealth, proclaim the infinite goodness and protecting care of the Creator and Supreme Ruler of the Universe. In compliance with established usage, I respectfully recommended to the people of this State the observance of Thursday, the 25th day of November next, as a day of prayer and thanksgiving.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto signed my name, and affixed the privy seal of the State, at the City of Albany, this 16th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1852. By the Governor: Washington Hunt.

THE JEWS OF HONAN.

The recent communication of Bro. Carpenter to the Missionary Board, will be read with a great deal of interest. We bespeak for it a careful perusal, not merely as affording curious information, which we may speculate upon and treasure up as so much added to the stock of our literature, but as indicating a Providential opening to the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination of a new field of labor. Let it be read practically, each one asking himself, "How much can I do, by my prayers and contributions, towards bringing the Jews of Honan to the knowledge of Christ?" Let it be pondered upon prayerfully, as at least meaning something, and let no one hastily say, that it is not the moving of the cloud of the Lord in that direction.

The extract which we have made from Williams' Middle Kingdom—a work which ought to be read by every one who desires to inform himself concerning China and its institutions—shows, that the existence of Jews in China has long been known. About 150 years ago, Father Gozani, a Jesuit missionary, made them known to the European world, and gave many curious particulars of his visit to and researches among them. Unfortunately, however, he was ignorant of the Hebrew language, and failed to inform himself concerning the manuscripts of the Law which they possessed, notwithstanding the facilities they afforded him; they having, according to his own account, "showed him their religious books, and permitted him to enter even into the most secret place of their synagogue, whence they themselves (the commonalty) are excluded." Some have supposed that these manuscripts were of a very ancient date, prior to the settlement of the Jews in China, and prior (of course) to the Christian era; and this opinion is not without probability. Their former sacred books, however, were destroyed, first by an inundation of the Great Yellow River in 1446, afterward by a fire about 1600, and lastly, those they possess were greatly damaged by a second inundation in 1642. So we learn from Milman.

It would appear that there was a time when learning was cultivated among them with considerable success; and that some of them had enjoyed the tokens of imperial favor, having attained to the rank of mandarins. Father Gozani saw certain inscriptions which attested this; and one of these inscriptions, bearing date in 1515, praises the Jews for their integrity and fidelity in agricultural pursuits, in traffic, in the magistracy, and in the army, and their punctual observance of their own religious ceremonies; it assures them of the Emperor's high esteem.

One account that we have read says, that they entertain distinct though remote hopes of the coming of the Messiah; though Gozani says, "I spoke to them of the Messiah promised in Scripture, but they were very much surprised at what I said; and when I informed them that his name was Jesus, they replied, that mention was made in the Bible of a holy man named Jesus, who was the son of Sirach; but they knew not the Jesus of whom I spoke." We think the Jesuit must have fallen into some mistake here. If they had nothing more than the Pentateuch, they could scarcely have failed to cherish the expectation of the coming of the Shiloh; and if, according to Williams, "it is quite likely that they have all the canonical books of the Old Testament," it is hardly credible that they have not received from them some decided impressions concerning a coming Redeemer. According to Bro. Carpenter's account, which we published about a year ago, it is only for the last forty years that they have had no man among them who could read their much venerated books.

Dismissing all speculation, however, and looking at the case as one of the Providential developments of the age, we ask if there is not in the visit of these Jews to our missionaries, and their earnest request to have some of their children instructed in Hebrew and in the truths of Christianity, something like a Divine call upon us to extend our labors in that direction? Who can tell but what the Jewish youths of Honan, after being trained for a while under our missionaries, may become subjects of the New Birth—firm believers in Jesus of Nazareth—and go back and plant the Gospel in the very heart of China? Who knows but this is God's chosen method for leavening that mighty empire with his truth? Nay, who knows but this is the way which God is opening for the conversion of the Israelites, who are known to be scattered all through Asia? For they are known to exist in considerable numbers in Cochin, in Thibet, in Tartary, in Northern India, in Cabul, in Balkh, in Bucharia, in Persia, and in the Russian Asiatic dominions about Caucasus, and in Georgia, to say nothing of Asia Minor. In fact, the dispersed of Judah are in all lands. What country is there where they are not? In the East, they have a never ceasing communication with each other. Their families, it is true, are generally stationary, being subject to despotic princes; but the men move much about in a commercial capacity, and the same individual will pass through many extensive countries. Hence, when any thing interesting to the nation of the Jews takes place, the rumor passes rapidly throughout all Asia. Is it too extravagant, therefore—is it visionary—is it fanatical—to suppose that this providence which has called our attention to the Jews of Honan is the opening of 'a great door and effectual' to the Seventh-day Baptist denomination?

There is one fact connected with this discovery which ought, perhaps, to be viewed as one of some importance. Williams says, "Of the Lord Jesus Christ they had never heard, nor had they any prejudices against the crucifix." With all other Jews of whom we have any knowledge, there is the most bitter prejudice against the name of Jesus of Nazareth. From their infancy, they are taught to execrate his name, and they grow up under the impression that by doing so they render God service. A double barrier is thus presented to their conversion; and though the identity of their Sabbath and ours creates a sort of friendly feeling between us, and gives Seventh-day Baptists a comparative advantage over other Christians, it does little or nothing towards a removal of that bitter hatred which has been instilled in their hearts against the Founder of Christianity. Christianity in us, except so far as it guards the integrity of the Sabbatic institution, is as hateful as it is in any other sect. But with the Jews of Honan we are placed on a different footing. Their ignorance, and the native depravity of their hearts, are all the obstacles that are to be overcome. They already acknowledge the One God, the Creator of all things; they worship no idols; refuse to take an oath in heathen temples; keep the Sabbath; believe in heaven and hell, resurrection, final judg[illegible] taught to blaspheme the name of Jesus; they have no prejudices against his doctrine, that we know of, except such as are common to unrenewed men. The fact is certainly one which ought not to be overlooked; let it receive its due measure of attention.

And, now in the name of Him who died for all, and said, "Preach the gospel to every creature;" and in the name of these his lost sheep, who have not waited to be sought out, but have come of their own accord seeking a shepherd to guide and feed them; we ask our brethren if they do not see in this circumstances a clear intimation of their duty to stir up afresh the missionary feeling that is in them, and to give more abundantly of their substance, that the enterprise may not fail. "Consider of it, take advice, and speak your minds." T. B. B.

THE COLONY IN PALESTINE.

Artass, (Bethlehem,) Sept. 27, 1852.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

At the present time, the masons are building our new house, which consists of two stories now, on the side of the mountain; and we expect to have it finished in two weeks more. All Jerusalem are building—many Greeks and natives are building outside the walls, as never before. The price of labor is gone up from 2 and 3 piasters to 8, 10, 12, 18, and even 21 piasters a day, according to ability; building stone, that were formerly of no price, and lime, charcoal, and camel-hire, wheat and barley, more than four double.

One thousand five hundred Jews arrived last week in Jerusalem, besides a constant silent increase. This country and Jerusalem are surely rising, and being built and cultivated—and there is a great increase of planting trees, and vines, and inclosing fields, especially by the Greek native church, under the direction, and with millions of Russian money! The Emperor is determined to preöccupy and own the land; and the Greeks (as his people here are called) are our greatest opposers, and intrigue in every way, with the heaviest bribes, to get Artass from Meshullam and his Arabs; but God still keeps it strangely in M.'s power, notwithstanding his and our poverty. It is by far the most favorable spot in Judea. Keeping it, and this position, is very expensive, and we know not how long we shall be able to stand; for, on the other hand, is the English Consul, with the Episcopal State Church Mission, continually tempting M. to send away these poor Americans, and join them on a sure foundation, and money will come in loads from England, which is, no doubt, true. But God can help us, we trust and hope, though we be so feeble.

Oct. 5.—Meshullam has been into Jerusalem, and Mr. Finn (the British Consul) has received several letters from England, with money, in answer to his appeal in Meshullam's name; but he only tells M. a part, and keeps the money in his own hands. He also read part of a letter to him, stating that a gentleman deceased there had left £1000 to the one who first began agriculture in this land; but it was from an Episcopalian, and the trustees had received word from here of M.'s insubordination to the English Church, and Mr. Finn, who has just set up to buy and cultivate some land without water, near Jerusalem, and has not succeeded in raising much, is trying to get that also for his own effort; but to-day Miss W. and I are helping M. to write to England about it.

Oct. 7.—Our health, at present, is good, and the weather has been, since June, very delightful; only a very few hot days; the thermometer has not been up to 90 deg. but twice, and the mornings and evenings pleasant and cool. We like the climate much. We have had fruits ever since June—plenty of grapes, figs, pears, apples, and pomegranates, and the peaches are exceeding fine; I measured one, 9¼ inches in the longish round, and 8½ round. We have had plentiful crops of vegetables. Our sweet potatoes (of which Bro. Cyrus Thacher has had all the charge and care,) have yielded very fine, and in greatest plenty, and they promise to be a great blessing to this land, and to the poor Jews.

Elijah M. will carry this letter to-day for the mail, which leaves Jerusalem to go on its long journey westward. He has been very kind to us in our temporary sickness; and, from his six years' experience in the English Hospital in the city, with the few marked diseases in this country, has succeeded very well. Many Arabs around us are constantly coming to him, and generally all healed.

By the last mail, we received from our agent in Philadelphia, J. L. Boyd, the sum of £14 ($71,) forwarded to us through our French friend Huguenoit, which is here acknowledged. C. S. Minor.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Crystal Palace—Sunday in France—The Madiai—Paris and London Telegraph.

Glasgow, November 5, 1852.

The question as to the opening of the Crystal Palace on Sundays, is still undetermined. The Committee of the Alliance which has the Church's self-constituted weekly festival specially for its care, transmitted, seven weeks ago, a Memorial to the Earl of Derby against granting the promised charter, unless the place were to be kept shut upon Sunday; and, under the influence of that Alliance many other memorials have since been transmitted. The Congregational Union of England and Wales have, besides doing so themselves, recommended that the Independent Congregations, of which they are the representatives, should also do so separately. The Nonconformist, which, in general, is an exponent of the views of that denomination, had last week a lengthened leading article objecting to this, as it would be the acknowledging of the authority of Government in reference to religion. The Record, which is the organ of the Evangelical party of the Church of England, has repeatedly returned to the subject. In one of the articles, of editorial aspect, the writer confesses to having traveled once by railway on Sunday, "in a case of life and death." He does not mention it as a matter in which he had erred; yet it seems to justify Sunday trains generally. For if all who are interested in cases of life and death in these realms, or any other, may righteously travel by railway on Sunday, then must those be justified who run trains so employed—and possibly there may be few of the obnoxious trains that have not at least one traveler who may have such a plea. With such a principle admitted, it seems not improbable that the number of Sunday trains might be increased—and be justified, not by the word, but the work of even the Record itself. It has been stated, that if the Crystal Palace be opened in the afternoon on Sunday, the Provincial Railway Companies intend to run trains from all parts of the country, arriving just in time for admission—returning in the evening. This is exceedingly probable; and that the result will be a great increase of what is improperly termed Sunday "desecration," we do not doubt. The secular papers generally are in favor of the Palace being opened on Sunday as proposed, and the Times is laboring, inconsistently enough, indeed, with its former self, zealously to that end. The work goes on, and great expense is being incurred, under the pledge already given by the Prime Minister, that he would recommend the Crown to grant a charter. The Archbishop of Canterbury says, in a letter which has been made public, "Some of us tried to prevent the Minister giving his promise to the parties, but in vain. . . . . The great obstacle is, the promise was given. It was extracted from the Minister previous to the foundation being laid." "Yes!" says the Christian Times, which gives the quotation, "This is the great obstacle." After all, however, it is now affirmed, that the Earl of Derby, either afraid of the opposition encountered, or doubtful of the power of the Crown to secure the objects of the Palace Company, declines to take the full responsibility to determine. Prince Albert, when applied to by the Sunday party, replied, that "he had no authority in the new establishment." I may add, that the plough is now busy upon what formed the site of the Palace, in which the Prince took so much interest, and which gave the suggestion for that which is now exciting such deep interest of a different nature. We are far from being surprised that the church—resolved, as she has shown herself to be, to give a preference to her own day, rejecting God's—feels as if about to be robbed of her most precious treasure.

We have chronicled the advance of Sunday sanctification in France, and the expectation of some, that that country was, in this respect, about to be assimilated to England. But, already, "the Gazette de Lyon, has received a warning for censuring the Government in allowing the works of the Paris and Lyons Railway to be carried on on Sundays." The weekly festival is, in fact, not the highest in the Romish Calendar; and Monday last was observed much more strictly in Paris, being "All Saints' Day." The Protestants have accepted of Rome's lesser festival, and exalted it to higher place; but Rome, in this respect consistent with herself, keeps her own traditions, and gives to them their relative places of importance.

The deputation in behalf of the Madiai arrived in Florence on the 23d ult.; but the Grand Duke had not then returned. The Morning Advertiser of yesterday, however, gives a letter from the Earl of Roden to the Earl of Shaftesbury, intimating that although they failed in obtaining immediately their object, he yet expects that the Grand Duke will shortly set at liberty these victims of Papal intolerance, suffering for the crime, in the language of the act of accusation, of "becoming laborers of propaganda and of proselytism to the so-called evangelical confession or of the pure gospel," by the diffusion of books, to the danger and disgrace of the Catholic religion.

The first direct message between London and Paris, by telegraph, including that which is sub-marine, was sent on the 1st instant—the break which has hitherto existed at Dover, being now supplied. A large number of gentlemen interested in the success of the experiment were assembled at the company's office in London on the occasion. One of the messages forwarded to Paris was an expression of thanks to the Prince President for the encouragement he had given to the undertaking.

MOUNT AUBURN CEMETERY.

"If I could choose my time to die, it would be when misty autumnal days, falling leaves, and the farewell songs of the departing birds, bring earnest longings to the spirit for a higher and holier existence—when my cast-off garment, worn with age and long service, and that of nature, would moulder together, and my free spirit seek a lovelier spring-time than ever gladdened this earth." Thus wrote one whose soul ever vibrates in harmony with nature and the love-lit spirit-land. With corresponding feelings I wandered forth, on a fine autumnal day, to Mount Auburn—the city of the dead.

The idea of rural cemeteries was a lovely conception with him who first originated them. When the labors of life are finished, and the spirit takes leave of the body, its tired and worn-out servant, instead of shuffling it off into some ill selected and worse attended grave yard, overrun with briars, thorns, and thistles, or rudely trodden under foot of both man and beast, it would seem more consonant with the promptings of our finer and better feelings, to have such a faithful and cherished servant laid away to rest amid the quiet and lovely scenes of nature, forming a place of attraction rather than of repulsion to mourning friends. In accordance with such feelings, many of our cities, and some of our larger villages, are constructing their cemeteries amid rural and quiet scenery, and embellishing them with shrubbery, flowers, fountains, and sculpture. Similar cemeteries would be desirable in all of our villages, and indeed in rural districts, where the expense might be comparatively trifling.

Dr. Jacob Bigelow was the first suggester of a garden cemetery in this country. He, with other gentlemen of Boston and vicinity, formed a society, in 1825, for the accomplishment of this object. They purchased a piece of woodland, situated about three miles from Boston, and about one from Cambridge, to which they gave the name of Mount Auburn. With some more recent additions, it contains, at present, about two hundred acres, beautifully diversified with hill and dale, and covered, in some parts, with young and thrifty groves of oak—in others, with pine, hemlock, and cedar—in others, with beech and maple. The whole cemetery will admit of about twenty thousand lots; but only a part is yet laid out. Lots are sold for one hundred dollars each, and the proceeds devoted to improving and beautifying the grounds. Some two thousand lots have been sold, between three and four hundred slabs, shafts, obelisks, cenotaphs and monuments erected, and thirty or forty miles of winding paths and avenues constructed. A large gothic chapel has lately been erected within the grounds, where the dead repose a while, on their way to their final resting place, and the last sanctuary services are performed. It is a place of great resort for the friends of the deceased, and those attracted by curiosity or the love of quiet and solemn retreats.

Although this necropolis is comparatively new, and its inhabitants few, yet it is destined to endure long, and to receive almost daily accessions, year after year, generation after generation. The ceaseless tide of life, surging back and forth through the neighboring cities, is ever bearing on its bosom treasures for this. Man may strive as he will—may build round about him citadels of wealth—may guard himself with many cohorts of friends; yet no shield, no hiding-place, no sympathy, will avail when he receives the summons to take up his abode with the dead. Here death reigns sole monarch—his sway is undisputed—his regulations admit no compromise. He marshals the living in rank and file to suit his own caprice—while the hearts of his unwilling subjects are ever but "muffled drums, beating funeral marches" to his dominions.

Various are the ways used to express the respect, love, and sorrow of surviving friends, and the wealth, talents, services, worth, and religious belief of the departed—from a bit of shingle, with its inscription in pencil marks, to monuments of elaborate workmanship, costing twenty-five, fifty, and even a hundred thousand dollars, embellished and illustrated with various devices, emblems, and mottoes. Some reveal the ties that have been severed, by the simple word, father, mother, brother, or sister; some, by short and expressive mottoes; others, by copious quotations of poetry; while many are content with a formal statement of the chief incidents in the life of the deceased. Many prefer symbolic representations of faith, hope, sorrow, or love, the fleetness of time, the uncertainty of life, the deceptiveness of earthly bliss, the characteristics of death, or the realities of eternity. Some choose the figures of animals, human beings, or of angels, as representatives of an idea or of taste in statuary.

Simplicity, joined with expressiveness, is ever desirable in such representations. Besides the cold, formal statement of birth, age, and death, it is proper and pleasant to have something apposite and direct, expressive of the admired traits of character—the spirit-life of the one that has passed onward to the spirit-land. It is agreeable, also, to behold some simple and touching representation of grief or affection—some delicate reference to the ties that have been severed, and showing that the memory of the departed is yet cherished on earth. But anything that does not create emotions in the beholder similar to those felt by the friends of the deceased, or that draws the mind away from spiritual ties and sympathies, and centers it on cost, and form, and show, is not good. The true and deep affection of simple, earnest natures, ever shuns the gaze of the world, and shrinks from surrounding itself with trappings, or hanging out signals of distress, and saying to the world, "Behold, was ever sorrow like unto my sorrow!" Instead of this, the sorrow of a sincere, earnest heart, reveals its fullness to but a kindred spirit or two, seeking rather the solitudes of nature, where, shut out from the glare and bustle of society, breezes may sigh to it the requiems of love, flowers may impart their gentle, unobtrusive sympathy, bringing the thoughts of death kindly to mind. It loves to steal away in the still and solemn hours of night, when none can behold but those from the spirit-world, and thus hold spirit communings.

While I thus mused, as if in confirmation of my thoughts, a brother or sister, child or parent, wife or husband, was, ever and anon, seen wandering away from the multitudes around, to contemplate some spot sacred to that individual above all other spots. A child goes to read again the name of father or mother, and to pour out the burden of its young heart, with the falling leaves, upon the parental grave. A widow, with the drapery of mourning but recently cast about her, hurries with a handful of the last of autumnal flowers—fit emblems of affection—as one more tribute of love, to lay upon the grave of buried hopes, and to water them with her tears. An aged form is seen following a path that has been trod through many a long and weary year. She is going to deposit one more token of affection upon a grave bedewed with many a tear, and whence many a fading flower has bespoke the crushed and withering heart of the mourner. The feeble step shows that ere long she will lay her tired, worn-out body in the place most sacred to her of all the earth, and perhaps other hands will strew the earliest flowers of the coming spring over a new-made grave.

It is good to spend occasionally an hour among the habitations of the dead, communing with our own spirits, and reflecting upon that eternal world to which we are hastening with such rapidity. It draws a veil between us and the busy scenes of life, and loosens the ties that bind us so closely to earth. It softens the heart, and awakens aspirations after a higher and holier life. We are led to see more clearly the insignificance of the pleasures of time, compared with those of eternity. We are forcibly reminded of our own weakness, and are constrained to lean with renewed resignation and confidence upon the arm of God. Macom.

Baptist Foreign Missions.—The supporters of the Baptist Missionary Union seem to have become fixed in the custom of delaying to send in their contributions till near the close of the financial year. The Secretary has issued a circular, in which he says that the Committee were directed by the Society to arrange their plans on the expectation that the churches would give them $135,000 during the year, or $11,250 a month, while the receipts have been little more than $4,000 per month, causing a deficiency already of nearly $43,000, and leaving $110,000 still to be obtained of the churches in the coming six months, nearly $20,000 per month. At the same time they have sent and are sending twenty persons to reinforce the missions in Asia and Africa.

The American Tract Society.—From a condensed statement of the affairs of this Society, we learn that about 20 presses and 250 operatives are employed in the manufacturing department, with a daily product of about 50,000 publications. The amount of printed matter in the periodical form is equal annually to a million volumes of 200 pages each. The gratuitous issues of tracts and books amount to more than $45,000 annually, besides appropriations of $20,000 in cash, for distribution in more than 100 languages in foreign and pagan lands. The number of colporteurs in this country, including nearly 100 for the foreign emigrant population, is between 400 and 500. More than $1000 are required daily to meet the current demands on the treasury.

The New York Hospital.—A proposition has been made to enlarge and endow the New York Hospital. The institution was founded in 1773, mainly by private munificence. As the population of the city has increased, the demand for hospital accommodation has likewise increased, while the income of this institution has remained nearly stationary. $250,000 is spoken of as necessary to endow it, of which one man offers to give $25,000.

ITEMS OF RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

The Prudential Committee of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions have just made the appropriations for the current year, amounting to $300,664. An effort was made by the Committee to reduce the appropriations to a lower sum; but after repeated attempts, they were satisfied that it could not be done without seriously embarrassing the missions, or at least some of them; and this they did not feel at liberty to do.

An interesting letter was lately read at the Missionary meeting in Dartmouth College, from Rev. Mr. Wright, missionary of the American Board to the Nestorians, describing the discoveries of a commission employed to run a boundary line between Turkey and Persia. The commission had discovered the ruins of the ancient palace, Shushan, and near it what seems to be the grave of the Prophet Daniel, with an inscription yet to be deciphered. By the grave stands the statue of a lion. On the walls of the palace were found many inscriptions. Each inscription is in three languages.

The Legislature of Pennsylvania has appropriated two thousand dollars per annum to facilitate the emigration of the free people of color, within the State, to the Republic of Liberia. The Synod of Pittsburg has enjoined it upon all the churches under its care to raise a collection, for the same object, on or about the fourth of July.

The Protestant Methodists have commenced a movement to establish a College in Alabama. About $30,000 has been already raised for the purpose, one-third of which was contributed in the form of an endowment by Abner M'Gehee, Esq., residing near Montgomery, Ala.

Several young men connected with the Baptist Churches in Phiadelphia, have lately presented a set of Bunyan's Practical Works, published by that denomination, to the pastor of the Tenth Baptist Church, and to the Rev. Mr. Jacobs, the editor of the Christian Chronicle of that city.

Miss Sarah Stille, a member of the Seventh (O. S.) Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, recently bequathed $2,500 for a scholarship in the Princeton Seminary; $400 for Bibles for the blind; $300 to the Board of Domestic Missions; and $300 to the American Sunday School Union.

The Old South Church in Boston has a unique and valuable collection of books, chiefly relating to the department of theology and ecclesiastical history of New England. The works are mostly the donation of Rev. Thomas Prince, formerly the pastor of the church.

Mrs. Cornelia C. Adams, wife of Rev. S. W. Adams, a Baptist clergyman of Cleveland, O., and daughter of the late Rev. Dr. Kendrick, of Hamilton, N. Y., on her death-bed expressed her wish to make a donation of $500 to Madison University.

A public Convention has been called to meet at Salem, O., during next month, to discuss the origin, authority, and influences of the Jewish and Christian Scriptures. The call originated with certain members of the Sect of Campbellites.

The remains of Rev. Hiram A. Graves, formerly editor of the Christian Reflector, Boston, (Baptist,) were removed from Kingston, West Indies, on the 4th inst., the anniversary of his death, and re-interred in Woodlawn Cemetery, near Boston.

Oberlin College, O.—We have received the annual Catalogue of the officers and students of this institution for the college year 1852–3. The Webster Pageant.

The New York Funeral Pageant in honor of the late Daniel Webster, came off on Third-day, Nov. 16, and was followed with an address at Metropolitan Hall, by James F. Brady, Esq. Of the procession, the Tribune gives the following account:—

The Military were out in full force, as a matter of course, in pursuance of the order of the Major-General. Many of the companies were in winter uniform, and looked remarkably well.

After the soldiery came the Funeral Car, bearing the symbolic urn, &c. The Lafayette Fusileers formed the Guard of Honor for the occasion. The Car was drawn by eight gray horses, caparisoned in black, and their heads decked with plumes composed of black and white feathers. They were led by as many grooms appropriately clad in mourning. The platform of the Car was seventeen feet long and eight and a half wide. In the center of this platform a dais or bier was constructed, upon which the Urn rested. This second platform was ten feet long, four feet in width, and elevated one foot above the first. Both platforms were covered with velvet and properly trimmed. A canopy was erected over the platform, supported by a post at each corner; and under the canopy, on the center of the dais, stood the large gilt Urn, emblematical of the place where rest the remains of the late Statesman—bearing upon each side the inscription, "Webster," and shrouded with crape. Behind the Urn was a large bronze eagle, holding an evergreen wreath in his beak, over the Urn. The canopy was covered with black cloth, appropriately trimmed, and extended in ample folds to the corners of the platform and enveloping the columns by which it was supported. Within, the canopy was composed of the American flag, so adjusted that it formed a covering to the urn. The canopy was capped by a dome representing the Temple of Liberty, and surmounted by a representation of an American eagle shrouded in crape and holding in his beak an evergreen wreath. From the sides of the main platform a drapery of black cloth hung like a curtain to the ground. It was decorated by bands of silver lace laid on in diamond form, and interspersed with stars formed of the same material. On each side of this drapery in the center was represented a shield, on which were the initials "D. W." The bight of the car from the ground to the eagle on the top of the dome was twenty-two feet.

Accompanying were thirty-one pall-bearers, and next came the Mayor and Aldermen in carriages, with their guests, portions of the municipal authorities of Brooklyn, Williamsburgh, Jersey City, and Newark. There were also a number of distinguished civilians and military men, and City and County officers, in carriages.

A number of stages, trimmed with mourning, and loaded with members of the Veteran Corps, come next in order; and after them followed the New England Society, in full numbers, with their banner. After them the Democratic and Whig General Committees marched in unison.

Of the hundred and twenty fire companies in this City, only two were represented in the procession. Of the hundreds of societies of Odd Fellows, Sons of Temperance, Rechabites, Masons, Good Fellows, &c., &c., not one appeared; nor (except the New-England) a single one of the scores of social and professional organizations which distinguish the metropolis. A fair representation of the United Americans closed the line.

The route of the procession was down Broadway from where the various divisions fell into line, and from the City Hall, around the Park, up Chatham and the Bowery to Astor-place, thence down Broadway to the Park, where the line of the military opened and the remainder of the procession passed through to the front of the City Hall, where the dignitaries and their guests alighted, and the various companies were dismissed from the line, while minute guns, fired in front of the City Hall, closed the ceremonies for the day.

A METHODIST TRACT SOCIETY.—At the last meeting of the Methodist General Conference, steps were taken towards the organization of a Methodist Tract Society; a Constitution having been framed, and the Presidents and Corresponding Secretary agreed upon. A meeting has since been held in New York, to organize and put the Society in operation. The objects of the organization are thus stated in one of the daily papers:—

"This institution is designed to meet the wants of the Methodist Church. One of its special aims will be to supply the demands of their German and Scandinavian Missions, Domestic and Foreign, with translations. This is an urgent demand; several German Tract Societies now exist in the Church, having originated in this felt necessity, but they need consolidation and more general help. Another object will be to scatter tracts where needed. Measures have already been taken to enlarge the catalogue, to revise it thoroughly, and supersede many of the old tracts. Vast amounts of tract stock are piled away in the Book Rooms; an attempt will be made to bring them forth into circulation. Another important but difficult work of the Society will be to provide some system of colportage in the Conferences for the sale of their publications. It will be a chief subject of deliberation with the Board. The plans and resources of the Society will necessarily be of slow development, as were those of the Sunday-School Union, but it is hoped they will be sure and permanent."

MR. FRY'S LECTURES ON MUSIC, advertised in another column, promise to be wider in scope and more elaborate in detail than any thing of the kind ever attempted in this country. Persons who are acquainted with Mr. Fry, and with the means at his command for carrying out this gigantic enterprise, express the utmost confidence that he will be able to fulfill all his promises, and to meet the highest expectations of the public.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY IN ILLINOIS.—The Directors of the New School Theological Seminary for the Northwest, have fixed on Galena, Ill., as the location. Citizens of that place have pledged $20,000, on condition that the Seminary be located there.

It is stated in Paris as certain, that the Senatus Consulte will declare the Imperial Crown hereditary in the person of Louis Napoleon and his male descendants; and in the event of his not having male heirs, then in the person of his adopted son; should the latter die childless, afterward in the person of ex-King Jerome and his family.

The Semaphore de Marseilles contains a letter dated 27th Sept., from Tabris, Persia, received via Trebisonde. It states that 400 Babis had been put to death with great military display at Teherau, as accomplices in the recent attempt against the life of the Shah.

M. Camille Seguin, the well-known French engineer, has just departed this life, at the age of 59. He introduced the system of suspension bridges into France, and constructed 86 of them in France, Spain, and Italy. He also brought to a successful termination several other great public works.

A most singular accident, causing loss of life, is described in Galignani's Messenger as having recently occurred on board the Swedish steamer, the Lennart, as she was proceeding from Stockholm to Ystad. In the night a violent tempest arose, and a large vessel, containing sulphuric acid, placed on the deck, was broken. A portion of the corrosive liquor passed through the crevices of the planks, and fell on a bed in a cabin beneath. In this bed the Count Erie Chrection de Pontin, Chamberlain to the King of Sweden and Norway, was sleeping. The acid soon burnt through two blankets, and reached the abdomen of the unfortunate gentleman, burning it dreadfully. The gas which escaped made it impossible for him to cry for help, and he became senseless. The next morning his servant, on going into the cabin, found that he had the lower part of his bowels entirely eaten away. The unfortunate gentleman was unable to speak a word. The steamer immediately put back to the port of Colmar, and the Count was conveyed to the hospital. Every possible attention was paid to him, but he expired after some hours of horrible suffering. He was only 26 years of age.

The gales along the East coast of Britain were very destructive to shipping and life. Among the vessels lost were the following, all near the mouth of the Tyne and Ware: Brig Amulet of Rochester, all hands; St. Hilda, Shields, all hands; Acorn, Shields, all hands; laden galliott, all hands; schooner, all hands; ship, all hands; Swedish ship, all hands; brig Wensley Dale, all but two. The following were wrecked, part of the crew of each saved; Brig Northern, Newcastle; Victoria, Hartlepool; Naind, London; Sophie Augusta, Cherbourg; Fredricke, Danish; Brilliant, Shields; Cherub, Yarmouth; Kiloe, Sunderland; Rifleman, Newcastle; Britannia, Hartlepool; Velante, Blyth; Sarah, Whitby; Hartwicke, Sunderland; Russian ship; Merchant, Hartlepool; Sisters, Harwick; Marie Elizabeth. The last named ship had a cargo valued at £100,000, which was fallen on and plundered by the people along the coast. Several of the other ships were plundered in like manner by the wretches on whose coast they were cast.

Twenty-four men, says the Leader, between the ages of twenty and forty-six, who had been imprisioned since 1849 for political offenses, that is, for partaking, with more or less notoriety, in the Roman national movement of 1848–9, are taken from the dungeons in which they had been confined, and, weak and haggard as they were, are led out into the public square in Sinigaglia—eight the first day, six the second, and ten the third—and are there shot by the Swiss soldiers in the pay of the Pope. They go to their death bravely and calmly, shouting for Mazzini, and singing the Marseillaise. To the last it was not believed that they would be executed. Most of them were working men—poor, warm-hearted men, who had gone heart and soul into the movement for the liberty of their country, and some of whom had, perhaps, in their enthusiasm, done things which were not approved of by all the republicans themselves, through none of them were accused of any crime other than what might be resolved into patriotism.

AFRICAN EXPLORATION.—Lieut. Lynch, of the United States Navy, who acted as Superintendent of the late Dead Sea Expedition, has recently embarked at New York for London, whence he will proceed in the new British line of steamers for Africa. The object of the mission upon which he has entered, under the orders of the Government, is to make certain inquiries and arrangements preliminary to an intended exploration of the West Coast of Africa. It is certainly a matter worthy to excite general interest and approbation, that the United States have at last determined to investigate the physical character and resources of a country which is rapidly growing into commercial importance, and that so competent an officer has been chosen by the Executive to take the initiative steps in the movement.

SYMPATHY FOR THE SLAVE-HOLDER.—Mr. Lemmon—the Virginian who brought his family of slaves to New York on their way to Texas, and here learned, to his sad mortification, that they were no longer slaves, but freemen—seems to find considerable sympathy among our Union-saving and Cotton-selling citizens. A subscription has been started to pay him for the unrecompensed labor which he did not get out of the slaves. The Journal of Commerce has an article upon the subject, of which the following is the closing paragraph:—

"The proposition to raise $5,000 by voluntary subscription, to indemnify Mr. Jonathan Lemmon, of Virginia, for the loss of his slaves, while touching at this port a few days since, on his way to Texas, has been universally approved, so far as our information extends. Pledges exceeding $500 in the aggregate, have been sent to us by responsible citizens as a part of the fund, on condition that the whole amount should be raised. There is reason to hope that the money contributed will be refunded by the Legislature at its approaching session. Still, it may not be, and subscribers should be prepared for either alternative. Whatever is done in the matter will come with a better grace if done promptly and voluntarily."

NEW HAMPSHIRE BLACK-LEAD.—The editor of the Keene (N. H.) Sentinel has recently visited the Black-Lead Mines in that State, of which he gives the following account:—

In April, 1848, Mr. Carleton, of Lancaster, Mass., having heard that black lead had been discovered in Nelson, N. H., a town lying twelve miles east of Keene, went there to see what could be found. He found the lead to be of good quality, and thinking there might be considerable of it, bought of the owner all the ores and minerals of every description on forty acres, with the right and privilege to carry on the mining business to the same advantage that he could were he the owner of the land, for which he paid $135. Mr. Carleton got out about five tuns the first season. Finding the lead was well liked, and would sell readily at $100 per tun, he concluded to go into the business more extensively. The second season he got out 40 tuns, which he sold for about $4,000. The business has been increasing every year up to the present time. Last year there was 85 tuns taken from the mine; this season, from April 1 to October 1, 100 tuns; and if they continue to work until the 1st of December, which is the time the cold weather usually compels them to leave, there will be from 130 to 140 tuns taken out—employing about eight men per day, with one yoke of oxen. Over 60 tuns of the lead taken from the mine this season has already been been sent to New York, and sold, on an average, for $100 per tun.

GOVERNOR OF THE MORMONS.—A letter from Salt Lake City to the Cleveland Herald gives the following description of the Mormon Governor:—

"The residence of Gov. Brigham Young would be called a splendid residence in any place in the States, as would also the Court-House be considered an elegant building. The former is finished on the outside with white lime, that gives it a beautiful color, while the architecture is after the most approved modern style. It is on the north side of the city, near the Temple block, and has a commanding view of the whole city before the eminence upon which it stands. His yards, out-buildings, trees and shrubbery, all show that the Governor of the Territory and President of the Mormon Church is preparing himself a permanent place to enjoy forever what he fancies to be the divine pleasure of Omnipotence. He is a man of about 46 years of age, low in stature, thick set, light brown hair, light complexion, with an active temperament, and considerable talent."

OPINION IN THE ANTI-RENT CASES.—The large landholders in the Counties of Albany, Columbia, and Rensselaer, have been in the practice of inserting in their leases in fee a reservation or condition that the tenant, upon the sale of his interest in the land, shall pay the landlord a portion of the price or sale money, and that in case of non-payment the tenant's estate shall be forfeited to the landlord. The validity of this condition has long been the subject of controversy, and the provision has occasioned great discontent among the occupants of the land. The question has recently been brought before the Court of Last Resort, by which it has been determined that the reservation of sale money in such leases is repugnant to the estate granted by the lease, and therefore void. The decision applies only to leases in fee, or perpetual leases, and does not affect similar reservations in leases for lives or years.

The Bangor Mercury says that upon the arrival of the steamer Boston, on Sunday, Marshal Farnham and assistants seized seven or eight barrels of bad liquor. There were quite a number of spectators present, by whom the assistants of the Marshal were hustled about considerably. One of them was driven off the wharf, and another was covered with mud, &c. During the excitement several barrels of liquor were rolled off the wharf into the water, and afterward either rescued by the owners or friends, or destroyed by knocking in the heads. The liquor appeared to belong to some Irishmen, who were most active in behalf of the property.

We have further particulars of the late outbreak at Matamoros. It appears that Cardenas, on assuming the Governorship of Tamaulipas, established an armed military police, against which the Argutamento of Matamoros protested. Canales undertook to uphold Cardenas, and was hissed and hooted out of the room. Subsequently the National Guards crossed the river to the American side, and after receiving arms and ammunition recrossed again, and marched towards Victoria, with the intention of driving out Cardenas. They were pursued by Canales and Avalos, and a battle ensued, in which the latter were defeated with loss of their arms and artillery.

Under the title of the "Magdalena Steam Navigation Company," an association is announced for navigating by steamers the river Magdalena in New Grenada. The company further propose to place one or more steamers on the river Atrate, to communicate with the mining districts of Antioquia and Choco.

SUMMARY.

There is now on exhibition at No. 116 Broadway, New York, (the dépôt of the Ames Manufacturing Company, Chicopee, Mass.,) two complete services of the most sumptuous plate wares ever produced in America. They consist of an entire gold dinner service, for thirty persons, including tureens, vegetable dishes, castors, forks, spoons, butter and fish knives, egg-cups, wine-coolers, &c., together with a splendid suit of silver-plated ware, sufficient for the immense establishment of the St. Charles Hotel, New Orleans, for which these costly wares have been ordered—the bill falling but little short of $26,000.

The glorious principle of Free Land to actual settlers, has been agreed to by the Legislative and Executive Government of Canada, and will presently be applied. A tract of twenty-four millions of acres, lying mainly north east of Lake Huron,—in the latitude of American mining districts of Lake Superior, though with a milder climate—will, as soon as surveyed, be thrown open to the landless in gratuitous tracts of 160 acres. Alternate sections will thus be given away without price, those lying between them being reserved for sale to cover the expenses of surveying and opening the country to immigrants.

Letters from the Red River Settlement, communicated to a Canadian journal, contain accounts of the murder of Rev. Mr. Terry by the Sioux Indians. He was scalped not half a mile from the Settlement. Mr. Terry was a native of Ohio, and before his removal to Red River Settlement lived at St. Paul, Minnesota. This murder is described as the result of a state of warfare that has for some time existed between the Sioux and the Half-Breeds.

Dates from St. John, New Brunswick, to the 12th inst., have been received. On the 11th instant, as a steam ferry-boat was crossing from Carlton to St. John, she came in contact with a row boat filled with laborers, who had been engaged in loading the ship Zenobia, lying out in the stream, and were returning home. The boat was capsized, and out of from 18 to 21 men who were in it nine only were saved. Six bodies had been recovered.

The Northampton Gazette says: "Oliver Graves, aged 92; Justin Morton, aged 91; and Consider Morton, brother of Justin, aged 94, of Whately, were born in the same house, voted for Gen. Washington, and have voted at every Presidential election, and voted for Gen. Scott at the recent election. We doubt whether another such remarkable trio can be found in the Commonwealth."

Advices have been received at Boston from Buenos Ayres, bearing date as late as Sept. 11. It is reported that on that day an attempt was made to overthrow the Government of Urquiza, who at the time was absent attending the Congress at Santa Fé. A civil war was apprehended by many.

The Havana correspondent of the Tribune affirms that at least two, and probably several, cargoes of slaves have been recently landed in Cuba. On one of them, he assures us, that the Captain-General received a bribe of $17,000, no trifling addition to the revenue of a Spanish grandee who has come out to the Antilles to make his fortune.

At Concord, N. H., Nov. 19th, the opinion of the Judges of the Superior Court on the proposed new Liquor Law, resembling that of Maine, was read in the Senate Chamber. The Judges take the ground that the law conflicts both with the State and United States Constitution.

A new use for that Protean article, Indian Rubber, is to make canes of it. We have seen some of these, which were very beautiful, having all the appearance of the finest ebony, but tough and elastic. This is produced by vulcanizing the rubber to a steel temper.

The Buffalo Courier states that there was more money received for tolls at the Collector's office, in that city, on Saturday, Nov. 10, than there had been in any one day for the last four years. The amount received was $10,168 43.

The Railroad along the shore of Lake Erie from Cleveland to Buffalo is completed, and was opened Nov. 17, amid the rejoicings of the people upon the line. This is an important link in the great chain of iron which annexes the West to the Atlantic sea-board.

The Cleveland Democrat says that two women had a quarrel in that city on Tuesday night, which their husbands took up, and the result was, that Cooley fired a revolver at Kirley, which wounded him dangerously, and the ball lodged in the chest of Kirley's wife. Cause: Whiskey!

We have morning service at 11 A. M., and evening service at 7½ P. M. And after church is out, Miss C—— goes and sings at the theaters."

Pig iron was sold in Pittsburgh, on Wednesday, for $40 per ton. A few months ago it could be bought for $22. The Pittsburgh Gazette attributes this great rise to the scarcity of the article, many furnaces being out of blast. This rise will soon get them in operation again. The late rise in England has also given metal a start in this country.

While one of the freight-barges belonging to the Erie Railroad Company was being towed down from Piermont on Thursday, a drove of hogs numbering five or six hundred took fright, broke loose from the inclosure, and tumbled into the water. About half of the swine were picked up alive, and the balance were drowned.

From books and papers which have been washed ashore from Lake Erie, there is too much reason to believe that the Propeller Powhatan foundered during the late gale, and that crew and passengers all were lost!

JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

Wm. Henry Fry's Lectures on Music.

THIS COURSE OF TEN LECTURES will be given on successive TUESDAY EVENINGS, commencing on TUESDAY, the 30th inst., at

METROPOLITAN HALL.

The aim of these Lectures will be to present, in a condensed but clear form, an illustrated history of the rise, progress, and present state of all departments of instrumental and vocal music; whether sacred, dramatic, symphonic, classic, romantic or national, or of those various kinds which it would be difficult to class specifically. The manner in which the subject will be treated will enable the hearer to understand the structure of various musical compositions, to form more correct opinions of the performance of vocal and instrumental artists, and to comprehend more clearly the proper terms of musical criticism. In short, the effort of the Lecturer will be to give, as minutely and thoroughly as such a course of musical lectures can, a view of the literature, an analysis of the philosophy, and an explanation of the technicalities of music, both as a science and an art. A residence of several years in Europe has enabled the Lecturer to collect a large amount of rare materials for the practical illustration of the historical and critical text.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS

of these Lectures will form one of their principal attractions, and will be so copious and particular as to leave no Historical or Critical passage of the text misunderstood by any hearer who can distinguish the difference between varying sounds. The present state, as well as the origin and progress of the

OPERA, THE ORATORIO, AND THE BALLAD,

will be illustrated by the performance (by Artists of Distinction, an ample Chorus and a grand Orchestra) of the most popular and characteristic passages in the works of whose Overtures, Solos, Concerted Pieces, and Choruses, will all be made to contribute to the Lecturer's text. And as a condensed history of the Art from the remotest ages, and in all countries, will be given, and every statement sustained and explained by the performance of a musical composition in the style remarked upon, a copious but carefully made selection of

will be produced. The Lecturer has made researches in the great Libraries of Europe, and has obtained an unbroken sequence of musical compositions commencing at a period more than a hundred years distant, and which forms a complete exponent of the development of the art from the time of Charlemagne.

Paintings of antique and barbaric instruments, and copies of the Illuminated Music Books of the early ages of the Catholic Church, will be exhibited. In the course of the lectures there will be an analysis of Greek poetry in its musical relations; likewise an extended view of the application of English poetry to music, indicating the resources of the language and the reforms required. Among the curious music to be performed, are—"The Chinese Hymn," sung in presence of the Emperor at the Annual Thanksgiving, and supposed to be the oldest piece of music in existence; Various national and sentimental airs of the same people; The chief religious and secular airs of the East Indians, exhibiting their early efforts in the production of melody; Egyptian music collected during Napoleon's Expedition into that country; Two Ancient Greek Hymns rendered into modern notation after Meibomius and Burette: Ode of Boece of the 9th century; Song of the battle of Fontanet, of the same era; Song of Erie, Duke of Frioul; Complaint on the death of Charlemagne; "Ut queant laxis"—the origin of the modern system of solfeggi—from the original; Chorus sung anciently in Venice at the ceremony of the marriage of the Doge with the Adriatic; Song of Blondel the troubadour who accompanied Richard Cœur de Lion; Song of the French Armies in the year 1400; Chants of the Sainte Chapelle, 13th century; Extracts from Hugbald on Harmony of the 9th century, the earliest writer known on the subject; the most ancient piece of music in parts, handed down in England; Selections from the Music Book used by Queen Elizabeth: Palestrina's Original Mass: Gluck's "Orpheus" and "Euridyce:" Extracts from the Works of the Founders and Subsequent Masters of the Chief Schools of Europe.

The Illustrations having shown the progress of the art thus far, the number of Solos, Duetts, Trios, Quartettes, Choruses, Overtures, and other vocal and instrumental pieces from the works of the greatest

which will be given, are entirely too numerous for particular mention in a general advertisement. Among them, however, will be extracts from LeSeur's opera, LaCaverna, Spontini's Vestale, Felicien David's Christopher Columbus, and Meyerbeer's Prophete. And it may be remarked that some of the Lectures will embrace of Classical and Dramatic Music, with Explanatory and Historical Comments; and that for the proper attainment of this object, the Musical Illustrations will be given by over

GRAND CONCERTS

TWO HUNDRED PERFORMERS,

including a corps of Principal Operatic and Concert Singers of the first grade, an Orchestra of eighty, and a

CHORUS OF ONE HUNDRED.

The design of these Lectures being not only different from, but wider in scope and more elaborate in detail than any which have ever been presented to the public of either Europe or America.

A Prospectus, for gratuitous distribution, may be had at all the Music Stores, setting forth the plan of each Lecture, which cannot be embraced within the limits of an advertisement.

SINGLE TICKET FOR THE COURSE $5

Payment to be made on delivery of the tickets, at WM. HALL & SON'S, No. 239 Broadway, on and after Monday, Nov. 22.

Seats secured to subscribers.

Upward of one thousand subscribers have already signed the lists, which may be seen, with the prospectus at the Music Stores generally.

To non-subscribers, the price of tickets will be one dollar to each Lecture.

Miscellaneous.

I Wait for Thee.

The hearth is swept, the fire is bright,
The kettle sings for tea;
The cloth is spread, the lamps are light,
The hot cakes smoke in napkins white,
And now I wait for thee.

Come home, love, home—the task is done,
The clock ticks listeningly,
The blinds are shut, the curtain down,
The warm chair to the fireside drawn,
The boy is on my knee.

Come home, love, home—his deep fond eye
Looks round him wistfully,
And when the whispering winds go by,
As if thy welcome step was nigh,
He crows exultingly.

In vain—he finds the welcome vain,
And turns his glance on mine,
So earnestly, that yet again
His form unto my heart I strain—
That glance is so like thine.

Thy task is done—we miss thee here;
Where'er thy footsteps roam,
No heart will spread such kindly cheer,
No beating heart, no listening ear,
Like these will wait thee home.

Aha! along the crisp walks fast
That well-known step doth come;
The bolt is drawn, the gate is past,
The babe is wild with joy at last—
A thousand welcomes home!

An Opium Factory.

From Dickens' "Household Worlds."

At Ghazeepore, one hot and windy day, I went down to the "opium go-downs", or stores. The atmosphere of a hot and windy day at Ghazeepore, if it should ever be thought suitable for invalids or others, may be inhaled in England by any one who will stand at the open door of an oven, and breathe a fog of fried sand cunningly blown therefrom. After a two miles drive through heat, and wind, and sand, and oderiferous bazar, we—I and two friends—found our way to a practicable breach or gateway in a high railing by which the storehouse is surrounded. A faint scent as of decaying vegetable matter assailed our noses as we entered the court of the go-down; as for the go-down itself, it was a group of long buildings fashioned in the common Indian style, Venetian doored, and having a great deal more door than wall. In and out and about these doors there was a movement of scantily clad coolies (porters) bearing on their heads large earthen vessels; these vessels, carefully sealed, contained opium fresh out of the poppy district. Poppy-headed—I mean red turbaned—accountants bustled about, while Burkunday (or policemen) whose brains appeared to be as full of drowsiness as any jar in the go-down, were lazily lounging about, with their swords beside them, or else fastened in sleep beside their swords.

The doorway was shown to us through which we should get at the "Sahib," or officer on duty. Entering the doorway, we pushed through a crowd of natives into an atmosphere drugged powerfully with the scent of opium. The members of the crowd were all carrying tin vessels; each vessel was half-full of opium, in the form of a black, sticky dough, and contained also a ticket showing the name of the grower, a specimen of whose opium was therein presented, with the names of the village and district in which it was grown.

The can-bearers, eager as cannibals, all crowded round a desk, at which their victim, the gentleman on duty, sat. Cans were flowing in from all sides. On the right hand of the Sahib, stood a native Mephistopheles, with sleeves tucked up, who darted his hand into the middle of each can as it came near, pawed the contents with a mysterious rapidity, extracted a bit of the black dough, carried it briskly to his nose, and instantly pronounced in English a number which the Sahib, who has faith in his familiar, inscribed at once in red ink on the ticket. As I approached, Mephistopheles was good enough to hold a dainty morsel to my nose, and call upon me to express the satisfaction of a gourmand. It was a lump of the finest, I was told. So readily can this native tell by the feel of opium whether a foreign substance has been added, and so readily can he distinguish by the smell its quality, that this test by Mephistopheles is rarely found to differ much in its result from the more elaborate tests presently to be described. The European official, who was working with the thermometer at a hundred, would be unable to remain longer than four hours at his desk; at the end of that time another would come to release him, and assume his place.

Out of each can, when it was presented for the first rough test, a small portion of the dough was taken, to be carried off into another room. Into this room we were introduced, and found the thermometer working its way up from 110 degrees to 120. On our left, as we entered, was a table, whereat about half-a-dozen natives sat, weighing out, in measured portions of one hundred grains, the specimens that had been just sent to them out of the chamber of cans. Each portion of a hundred grains was placed, as it was weighed, upon a small plate by itself, with its own proper ticket by its side. The plates were in the next place carried to another part of the chamber, fitted up with steam baths—not unlike tables in appearance—and about these baths or tables, boys were sitting, who, with spatulas, industriously spread the opium over each plate, as though the plate were bread, and the opium upon it were a piece of butter. This being done over the steam bath, caused the water to depart out of the drug, and left upon the plate the dry powder, which, being weighed, and found to be about twenty-three grains lighter by the loss of moisture, is called standard opium. If the hundred grains after evaporation leaves a residue of more than seventy-seven, the manufacturer is paid a higher price for his more valuable sample; if the water be found in excess, the price paid for the opium-dough is, of course, lower than the standard. I thought it a quaint sight when I watched the chattering young chemists, naked to the waist, at work over their heated tables, grinding vigorously with their blunt knife-blades over what appeared to be a very dirty set of cheese-plates. But the heat of this room was so great that we felt in our own bodies what was taking place about us, and before there had been time for the reduction of each hundred grains of our own flesh to the standard seventy-seven, we beat a retreat from the chamber of evaporation.

With the curiosity of Bluebeard's wives we proceeded to inspect the mysteries of the next chamber. It was full of vats, and in the vats was opium, and over the vats were ropes depending from the ceiling, and depending from the ropes were naked men—native—themselves somewhat opium colored, kicking and stamping lustily within the vats upon the opium; and each vat was in fact a mortar, and each man a living pestle, and in this room a quantity of opium—worth more lacs of rupees than I have ever had between my fingers—was being mixed and kneaded by the legs of men, preparatory to being made up into pills. From the chamber of pestles, with curiosity unsated, we went forward to peep into the chamber of the pills.

A rush of imps, in the tight brown dresses furnished to them gratuitously by their mother Nature, each imp carrying a bolus in his hand of about the size of a forty-two pound shot, encountered us, and almost laid us prostrate as we entered. This—the fourth—chamber was a long and narrow room quite full of busy natives, every tongue industriously talking, and every finger nimble over work. Around the walls of this room there are low stools placed at even distances, and upon each stool a workman rather squats than sits, having before him a brass cup, of which the interior would fit one half of a bolus. Before each man upon a stool there stands a man without a stool, and a boy with a saucer. The man without a stool has by his side a number of dried poppy leaves, of which he takes a few, and having moistened them in a dark gummy liquid, which is simply composed of the washings of the various vessels used in the establishment, he hands the moistened poppy leaves to the man upon the stool, who sits before the cup. The man upon the stool, who has been rubbing the same liquid gum with his fingers over the inner surface of the cup—as housekeepers, I suppose, butter their jelly molds—proceeds to fit in two or three leaves; then, with his fingers, spreads over them more gum; then, adds a few leaves more, and fits them neatly with his closed hand round the bottom of the cup, until he has made a good lining to it. His companion without the stool has, in the meantime, brought to his hand a fixed quantity of opium, a mass weighing two pounds, and this the genius of the stool puts into the cup; leaves are then added on the top of it, and by a series of those dexterous and inscrutably rapid twists of the hand with which all cunning workmen are familiar, he rapidly twists out of his cup a ball of opium, within a yellowish brown coat of leaves, resembling, as I have already said, a forty-two pound shot. He shoots it suddenly into the earthen saucer held out by the boy, and instantly the boy takes to his heels and scampers off with his big pill of opium, which is to be taken into the yard and there exposed to the air until it shall have dried. These pills are called cakes, but they belong, evidently, to the class of unwholesome confectionery. A workman of average dexterity makes seventy such cakes in a day. During the manufacturing season, this factory turns out daily from six thousand five hundred to seven thousand cakes; the number of cakes made in the same factory in one season being altogether about twenty-seven thousand. A large proportion of these cakes are made for the Chinese, but they do not at all agree with the Chinese digestion. The manufacture of the opium is not hurtful to the health of those who are engaged in the factory.

The key of a fifth chamber being in our power, we continued steadfast in our enterprise, and boldly looked into the chemical test-room of a small laboratory, of which the genius appeared before us suddenly with a benign expression on his countenance, and offered chairs. His clothes are greatly splashed, and he is busy among opium tins, of which the contents have been pronounced suspicious by the Mephistopheles in the first chamber. From the contents of one of these cans an assistant takes a portion, and having made with it a solution in a test tube, hands it to the chemist. The chemist, from bottles in which potent and mysterious spirits are locked up, selecting one, bids it, by the mysterious name of iodine, depart into the solution and declare whether he finds starch to be there. The iodine spirit does its bidding, goes among the opium, and promptly there flashes through the glass a change of color, the appointed signal, by which the magic spirit of the bottle telegraphs to the benign genius of the laboratory, that "the grower who sent this opium fraudulently added flour to it, in order to increase its weight." The fraud having been exposed, the adulterated drug has a little red ink mark made upon its ticket. The consequence of that mark will be confiscation, and great disappointment to the dealer who attempted a dishonest increase of his gain.

We have nothing more to see, but we have something more to hear, and the very kind chemist will be our informant. There are two opium agencies, one at Patna and one at Ghazeepore. I know nothing whatever about Patna. For the Ghazeepore agency, the opium is grown in a district lying between its head quarters, Ghazeepore, and Agra. Its cultivation gives employment to one hundred and twenty-seven thousand laborers. The final preparation of the ground takes place in the months of October and November. Under the most favorable circumstances of soil and season, twenty-four or twenty-six pounds weight of standard opium is got from one biggah of land; one biggah being a little more than three-fifths of an acre. Under unfavorable circumstances, the yield may be as little as six or eight pounds to the biggah, the average produce being from twelve pounds to sixteen.

To obtain the opium, as is well known, the capsule of the poppy is scored or cut; the scoring is effected with a peculiar tool that makes three or four (vertical and parallel) wounds at a single stroke. This wounding of the hearts of the poppies is commonly the work of women. The wounds having been made, the quantity of juice exuding seems to depend very much upon conditions of the atmosphere. Dews increase the flow, but while they make it more abundant, they cause it also to be darker and more liquid. East winds lessen the exudation. A moderate westerly wind with dews at night, is the condition most favorable to the opium harvest, both as regards quantity and quality.

The average per centage of morphia in this opium is from one and three-quarters to three and a-half; of narcotine, from three-quarters to three and a-half. These are the valuable principles of the drug. In some opium the percentage of the morphia runs up to ten and three-quar- ters per cent. of morphia, and six per cent. of narcotine. The income drawn from its opium by the East India Company amounts to some two and a-half crores of rupees—two and a-half millions of pounds sterling.

Commercial Life and Farming.—The following extract from Mr. Everett's speech at the Cattle Show in Northampton, conveys a truth too often overlooked:—

"Commercial life has been too often regarded by our young men as preferable to farming, and has tempted them from the country to town. I believe they make a mistake, even in reference to the acquisition of property. A very intelligent gentleman, not now living, (the late Mr. John Lowell,) told me many years ago, that he himself, or some friend, I forget which, made a list of twenty individuals who went from the country to town and engaged in trade, and of twenty others who staid on the farms where they were born. At the end of twenty-five years, the advantage was on the side of the farmers. More of them had prospered, and in the aggregate they had acquired more property. Such, however, has not been the general impression; and it has too often happened that some of our best young men have left farms on which they might have done well to engage in trade in which they have failed."

The Sugar-House Cure.

Dr. Cartwright, of New Orleans, communicated to the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal of the present week, an article of considerable interest to invalids, which is entitled, "The Sugar-House Cure for Bronchial, Dyspeptic, and Consumptive Complaints." It is stated that a residence in a sugar-house, during the rolling season, far surpasses any other known means of restoring flesh, strength and health, lost by chronic ailments of the chest, throat, or stomach. The rolling season is the harvest, when the canes are cut, and the juice expressed and converted into sugar. In Louisiana it commences about the middle of October, and ends at Christmas, but is sometimes protracted into January. Dr. Cartwright says:

Last December, having a severe and distressing cough, which, for some weeks, had resisted the usual remedies, I went into a sugar-house, drank a glass of hot cane-juice, and stood over the kettles, called clarifiers, for some hours, inhaling the vapor arising therefrom. The vapor was most agreeable and soothing to the lungs. The fragrant, saccharine aura seemed to penetrate into the inmost recesses of the obstructed lobules, opening its way into the intercellular passages and air-cells, without exciting cough, but removing the obstructions, the cause of the cough. There I stood over the clarifiers, enveloped, for five hours, in a dense cloud of vapor of an agreeable temperature and an aromatic odor; after which I retired to rest and had a refreshing sleep. In the morning the inhalation of the vapor was again resumed, when I returned home, through a cold, raw, windy atmosphere, some ten miles to the city, almost well without experiencing any inconvenience from the exposure to the cold; the cough and disagreeable sensations of chilliness, smothering, and febrile irritation, having disappeared almost entirely.

A tenuous vapor, of an agreeable, aromatic odor, hovers constantly over the heated juice of the clarifiers. It is demulcent, saccharine, and grateful to the respiratory organs; causing no oppression or feeling of constriction as other vapors and smokes so often do, but the lungs seem to expand and drink it in with avidity, as the roots of plants require the moisture of the earth, impregnated with azotized bodies after a shower. What humus is to vegetable substances, the elements contained in this vapor would seem to be to man.

"Duty" and "Glory."

The Home Journal thus felicitously depicts, with a few strokes of the pen, the character of the late Duke of Wellington, and the distinctive difference between his character and that of his great antagonist, Bonaparte:

"It has been said that the Duke of Wellington never wrote a dispatch, in which the word 'Duty' did not occur, and that Napoleon never wrote a dispatch to which the word 'Glory' was wanting. That is the difference between the two men, and the two countries to which they belonged. It was moral superiority that made Wellington the final victor. As a mere General the Duke of Wellington was immeasurably the inferior of Napoleon. Napoleon displayed more genius in any one campaign, than Wellington did in his whole life; but the dogged man of Duty triumphed at last over the brilliance of Glory. So it was in the beginning, is now, ever shall be. The Frenchman may laugh at the stolidity and stupidity of the Englishman. But so long as the one race is capable of believing in the august and commanding nature of Duty, and the other race is not, England's supremacy will be maintained. For every Napoleon produced by France, Britain will always be able to find a Wellington. The Duke was particularly fitted to command an English army, as much as his great antagonist to lead the soldiers of France. There was no flummery, clap-trap, or humbug about Wellington. Brief and plain in speech, vigorous in forcing obedience, doing equal justice to all ranks—a gentleman and a man of principle—his soldiers always knew what to expect from him, and could shape their conduct accordingly. Other generals have excited more enthusiasm in their men, but none was ever more respected and relied on than the Iron Duke."

Wild Rice.

In the shallow muddy places of some northern lakes, there grows a serial named wild rice, which is used by the Indians; and by those who have partaken of it, we have been informed that it was equally as palatable as the cultivated rice of the South. An acquaintance of ours was recently in Canada, and visited Rice Lake, a shallow body of fresh water, near Cobourg, where this edible grows in great luxuriance, and is claimed by the Indians there as their especial harvest property. It is about twice as long as common rice, and is of a very dark color. There is a sort of coarse bran like husk; the plants stand as closely together as oats in a well cultivated field. The squaws and Indians gather it in their canoes by holding the heads over their canoe and beating them with heavy round sticks. They kiln-dry it in their own way, and then thrash the grain out in a small hole in the ground, often lined with a deer skin. This is done by treading it with the feet or pounding it with an Indian pestle, just as they choose.

On the banks of the lake may be found a kind of grass which is not seen elsewhere, and which appears to be an imperfect kind of rice. The rice will grow in deep water, say twelve or fourteen feet, but does not there bring the grain to maturity. Flocks of ducks, in astonishing variety and number, frequent the lake in the autumn, and grow so fat that they can scarcely raise themselves from the water. But they are well aware of this misfortune, and manage to keep out of the way nearly as well as at other times.

Confession of a Slave-Trader.—The St. Louis Dispatch says: If it is true, according to an old maxim, that "an honest confession is good for the soul," a correspondent of a public journal must feel much conforted. He is giving a biography of his brother, and among other incidents mentions the following:

"During his sojourn here, Bowie mixed a little with society, and was very successful in securing a fair portion of the friendship of the better class of people. As the country improved and landed property became enhanced in value, he sold his land to the Bayou and used the means he thus obtained in speculating in the purchase of Africans from the notorious Lafitte, who brought them to Galveston, Texas, for sale. James, Resin and myself fitted out some small boats at the mouth of the Calcasieu, and went into the trade on shares. Our plan of operations was as follows: We first purchased forty negroes from Lafitte, at the rate of one dollar per pound, or an average of $140 for each negro; we brought them into the limits of the United States, delivered them to a custom-house officer, and became the informers ourselves; the law gave the informer half the value of the negroes, which were put up and sold by the United States Marshal, and we became the purchasers of the negroes, took the reward for informing, and obtained the Marshal's sale for the forty negroes, which entitled us to sell them within the United States. We continued to follow this business until we made $65,000, when we quit and soon spent all our earnings."

Education in Wisconsin.—The bounty of Congress has set apart the 16th section of every township in the State for the support and maintenance of common schools. From this source, nearly 1,000,000 acres will accrue to the State, the proceeds of the sales of which are to constitute a permanent fund, the income of which is to be annually devoted to the great purpose of the grant.

This magnificent foundation has been wisely enlarged by constitutional provisions, giving the same direction to the donation of 500-000 acres, under the act of 1841, and the five per cent. reserved on all sales of Government lands within the State. A still larger addition will accrue from the grant of the swamp and overflowed lands, which the settlement of the country, the lapse of time, and easy processes of reclamation, will convert into the best meadow land in the world, and a large portion, ultimately, into arable.

For the support of a State University, seventy-two sections of choice land, comprising 46,080 acres, have been already granted, and it is not improbable that this provision may be also enlarged by subsequent grants. If these trusts are administered with ordinary wisdom, the educational funds of Wisconsin cannot be less, ultimately, than $3,000,000 and may reach $5,000,000.

Value of a Library to a Poor Student.—One of the most interesting incidents in the early history of the famous men of our country, is related of Dr. Bowditch, the learned translator of La Place. During the Revolutionary war, a privateer from Salem captured a vessel and brought the prize into that port. A valuable private library was among the articles on board. These books were a rare prize for those days, and young Bowditch borrowed a number from the person having them in charge. The volumes were retained longer than was necessary for a simple perusal, and it was ascertained that the young student was so desirous of procuring the works, and his means were too slender for him to dare hope of purchasing them, and he actually copied 20 falio and quarto volumes of scientific works, which were of great service to him as books of reference in after years. These manuscript volumes are now in the possession of the sons of Dr. Bowditch, and are highly prized.

Punctuality.—Washington was a minute man. An accurate clock in the entry at Mount Vernon, controlled the movements of the family. At his dinner parties, he allowed five minutes for difference of watches, and then waited for no one. If members of Congress came at a late hour, his simple apology was, "Gentlemen, we are too punctual for you;" or, "Gentlemen, I have a cook who never asks whether the company has come, but whether the hour has come."

Nobody ever waited for General Washington. He was always five minutes before the time, and if the parties he had engaged to meet were not present at the time appointed, he considered the engagement canceled, and would leave the place and refuse to return.

Seven Fools.—The angry man—who sets his own house on fire, in order that he may burn his neighbor's. The envious man—who cannot enjoy life because others do. The robber—who, for the consideration of a few dollars, gives the world liberty to hang him. The hypochondriac—whose highest happiness consists in rendering himself miserable. The jealous man—who poisons his own banquet and then eats of it. The miser—who starves himself to death in order that his heir may feast. The slanderer—who tells tales for the sake of giving his enemy an opportunity of proving him a liar.

It is marvellous that educated people, scrupulously nice people, who would not drink out of another man's glass, nor eat off another man's plate, will respire without a thought, over and over again, the air from another man's lungs, which they ought to know—must know—has been entirely destroyed by the process, and not merely made useless, but rendered positively poisonous. By this blind and dangerous course, resulting from gross and wilful ignorance, the seeds of diseases are sown, which afterwards spring up, and, quietly growing, provide fruit for the graveyard.

The raising and fattening of snails has of late years very much increased in France, and, according to a recent calculation made at one of the Paris markets, the amount consumed annually in France is about six millions. The price averages from about 50 to 70 cents per 100, and one individual is stated to make over one thousand dollars per annum by his snail beds.

The Concord (N. H.) Independent Democrat, says: "We met, in Boston, last week, Mr. Beekman, a London publisher of 'Uncle Tom's Cabin,' who told us that the number of copies of that work publishod and sold in England already amounted to 400,000. Messrs. Jewitt & Co. have published 150,000 in this country.

"The World Owes me a Living."

No such a thing, Mr. Fold-up-your-hands, the world owes you not a single sou! You have done nothing these twenty years but consume the products earned by the sweat of other men's brows.

"You have ate and drunk and slept, what then?
Why ate and drunk and slept again."

And this is the sum total of your life. And the world "owes you a living?" For what? How came it indebted to you to that amount? What have you done for it? What family in distress have you befriended? What products have you created? What miseries have you alleviated? What errors have you removed? What arts have you perfected? The world owes you a living? Idle man! Never was there a more absurd idea! You have been a tax—a sponge upon the world ever since you came into it. It is your creditor to a vast amount. Your liabilities are immense, your assets are nothing, and yet you say the world is owing you. Go to! The amount in which you stand indebted to the world is greater than you will ever have the power to liquidate! You owe the world the labor of your two strong arms—and all the skill in work they might have gained;—you owe the world the labor of that brain of yours—the sympathies of that heart—the energies of your being;—you owe the world the whole moral and intellectual capabilities of a man! Awake, then, from that dreary, do-nothing state of slothfulness in which you live, and let us no longer hear the false assertion that the world is owing you, until you have done something to satisfy the just demands to which we have referred.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. MOTHERHEART.

BY WILLIAM M. FAHNESTOCK, M. D.

To avoid extending my paper on Motherlove to an extraordinary length, I deferred some remarks on Motherheart—Mutterherz—for a separate article, but which I originally designed to treat together, as they are so intimately related, although, indeed, they have a widely different bearing in a religious point of view—an important bearing on religious faith and religious interests.

Motherlove is the personal affection and solicitude that a mother bears for her own offspring; Motherheart is the tender sympathy of a mother towards any child, because it is the offspring of a mother; for which offspring she experiences an ardent out-going of soul, apart from identical maternity—a fellow-feeling with every mother—a community of heart in motherlife. Motherlife is the sympathetic chord which awakens this emotion, and which gives tone to a mother's office-work and a mother's mission on earth. This sympathetic response of bosom to bosom, for the offspring of woman, has been implanted in the hearts of mothers, by Infinite Wisdom, for the wisest and the best of purposes—to promote the comfort and the welfare of that suffering and self-sacrificing portion of our race; and can only be felt, or, at least, be properly appreciated, by mothers; and which intimate alliance can only be compared to the bells of the Jewish High Priest, which, when one of them is touched, they all vibrate in unison with each other.

Motherheart may, perhaps, be best exemplified by a short anecdote to the point. A woman was seen, one morning, running down a street, to succor or rescue a small child in danger or injured, and seizing the child, franticly, alarmed all the neighborhood by her screams of distress. A stranger passing along was attracted to the spot, and beholding the agony of the woman, and desiring to minister to her relief, but seeing the great disparity in the attire of the woman and the child, asked her: "Are you the mother of the child, Madam?" "Oh! no, sir," she replied, "but some woman is!"

That reply, better than a dozen pages of essay, will explain the meaning of Motherheart. The generous emotion of Motherheart might be illustrated in endless forms and phases—in the tenderest and most touching forms and phases—but as I design, simply, to trace its religious bearing, I have to pass by a great deal that is truly honorable to human nature, low as I estimate the natural dignity of man in an unregenerate, unsanctified state; and, for the same reason, I shall have to turn aside some of the most engaging investigations of some of the brightest intellects that have ever tabernacled in the flesh, in displaying the psychological relations of our species —geniuses whose labors are less regarded and less understood, because less known and less explored, than any other department of literature—the deep thoughts and laborious coinage of the Metaphysician, in developing the hidden emotions and the active tendencies of the human heart. It must, therefore, suffice to say, that there has always been a tendency in human nature, in the rudest ages as well as in civilized life, to give expression to the internal sense of beauty and good by some external manifestation; and the stronger the internal sense of beauty and good, the greater has been the effort to give expression to it, in words, in symbols, and still oftener in symbolic worship, attended by a corresponding pertinacity to perpetuate it in forms the most engaging, and in rites the most imposing and enduring.

Thus it is, that mankind have always sought to immortalize their own internal sense of beauty and good, and to incorporate those emotions with the religious rites of the country, so as to consecrate them for ages to come; and this in the most natural mode imaginable. Lamartine's response to the devotion of Motherlove, I alluded to in my article on that subject. For such a man as Lamartine to revere piously, devoutly, the memory of his departed mother, and for such a man as Lamartine, with his religious predilections, to ascribe spiritual presence with him after her translation to the regions of the blessed, is the natural result of his warm, poetic temperament. Bating his religious superstition, I highly appreciate the feeling, the sentiment, which prompted the allusion, in his Voyage en Orient, to the satisfaction that his pilgrimage to the Holy Land would afford to her departed spirit; and it is quite natural to think that that Motherlove, in its happy abode, would still continue to watch and guard her pious son. This, I say, is natural; and the more poetic the temperament, the more natural, where the heart is not imbued with pure, evangelical religion!

"To explain myself," says that charming writer, "how, at the close of my youth, at that epoch of life when man withdraws himself from the ideal world, to enter upon the world of material interests, I have left my lonely and peaceful life at St. Point, and all the domestic delights of an innocent fireside, which is blessed by a wife, and embellished by an only child, I said to myself: This pilgrimage, if not of a Christian, at least of a man and a poet, would have so pleased my mother! This journey of a son, whom she so tenderly loved, must please her in the celestial abodes, where I now see her. She will watch over us; she will place herself, like a second Providence, between us and all the storms of life—between us and the simoon, between us and the wild Arab of the Desert. She will protect from every danger a son, an adopted daughter, and her little grandchild, the visible angel of our destiny. * * * And if there be imprudence in this my enterprise, which we have so often contemplated together, she will procure pardon for me above, in virtue of the motives which urge me—Love, Poetry, and Religion."

Another writer, H. M. Milner, has given us an illustration, also, quite as interesting, if not quite so poetical throughout all its parts, in a French drama, entitled "Victorine." The drama is designed to exhibit Motherlove, not only in this life, but in the exalted state in the spirit-land. Victorine, an only child, a lovely and accomplished girl, in reduced circumstances, has an apartment in the sixth story of one of the numerous hives of human beings to which the unfortunate and desolate have to resort for a shelter in Paris, and other large cities. Victorine, at the death of her mother, was left destitute, but with laudable ambition devoted her time to working embroidery, to gain a livelihood. During her mother's life time, they became acquainted with a worthy, upright young man, named Michael, who was a journeyman upholsterer, and who proved particularly kind and attentive to Victorine during all her afflictions; and while Victorine felt attached to the young man, for his great consideration for her, yet by her education and her associations in life, was greatly his superior, and, therefore, naturally looked for a better alliance, in which she was encouraged by her intimate friends, and thus parried the consummation which Michael now so eagerly sought. Through an accidental circumstance, being caught in a shower one day while out, and taking shelter under an Arcade in Rue de Rivoli, she was thrown into contact with Julien De Roselle, the son of her landlord, who, for a long time, had sought an interview with her, for no honorable purposes, but which he had not yet betrayed. From the necessity of the case, she accepted a seat with him in his carriage, and was taken to her lodgings without encountering any improprieties from him, but profuse protestations of deep interest in her welfare. After this attention to her, De Roselle repeated his visits, frequently, much to the annoyance of her honest suitor, Michael, who had become acquainted with the new intimacy. Michael took an early opportunity, one evening, to apprize her, that his father had advanced money to him, to set up business, and that he had made an appointment at a Notary's, to be married the next day. Victorine was surprised, and remonstrated, but Michael persisted on to-morrow or never, and left her to deliberate on that ultimatum. After his departure, and when about to retire for the night, she kneels and commits the decision to the silent counsel of her sainted mother, in the following beautiful invocation—

>   Thy sacred counsel whisper mild;
> Yet let a mother's tender love,
>   Direct and guide her orphan child."

The next scene, much to our surprise, and much against our hopes, exhibits Victorine's elopement with De Roselle; who deserts her after a short-lived round of dissipation, treachery and infamy; and she next becomes the mistress of a Duke, under the assumed name of Madam St. Victor; and during this brief period of her varied life, she is unexpectedly thrown into a most humiliating interview with Michael, now in a prosperous business, notwithstanding having been swindled out of five hundred dollars of his hard earnings by the villain De Roselle. The Duke not being aware of the former intimacy between Victorine and Michael, sent for him, as a prominent business man, to re-furnish his splendid establishment throughout, when the thrilling scene, alluded to, ensued between Victorine and her former admirer, upon her beholding his honest manly bearing, and feeling her own degraded condition; and in deep abasement she entreats him to take her from her present position, surrounded as she was by all the showy prosperity of fashionable luxury, to his own humble domicil; which he peremptorily declines, and firmly resists.

Again, in the third Act of the Drama, we find her abandoned by the Duke, and now she appears as Madam St. Marc, at the head of a fashionable boarding house—a gambling den—from which she is ejected by the Police, for infamous misdoings; and she is next found wandering about the streets, in costume and appearance which bespeak the last stage of wretchedness. After thirty years of such vicissitudes, and innumerable cares, trials, and degradations, which I cannot pen, she is at last seized by the officers of Justice, charged with robbery, and carried away to prison. On the way thither she escapes from the grasp of the bailiffs, and precipitates herself headlong over a high bridge, and is in imminent danger of perishing below, but from which she is rescued by Michael, who happens to be passing at the moment in his carriage; for his success in business, now, enables him to keep a handsome establishment, and to drive a splendid equipage.

The last scene of the Drama changes to the last scene of the first Act, Victorine's former lonely chamber—precisely as she left it thirty years before, when she had parted with her good, faithful friend Michael—and a loud knocking is heard—Victorine awakens, and finds that it is Michael waiting for his answer. She rises from her bed, sinks on her knees, and exclaims: "Sainted spirit of my much-loved mother, receive my thanks—'tis at thy intercession Providence has breathed into my soul the sacred warning which shall snatch thy child from ruin." Victorine, overcome with joy to find that the spirit of her sainted mother had revealed to her, in her sleep, the horrible scenes of infamy and ruin into which she would be hurled by yielding to the disingenuous overtures of De Roselle, proceeds immediately to become the wife of honest Michael.

All this may be fiction, but it is equally true, that it is a fair transcript of daily life in such a city as Paris. It is a faint portraiture of much behind the scenes, which it will not do to parade in a newspaper of the character for which I am writing. True, it may be poetry—may be fiction—but it contains the germ of one or more of the greatest errors in the Christian Church; for, with all her faults, I cannot but regard the Roman Catholic Church, which has maintained no inconsiderable degree of sanctity, for so long a period, other than as belonging to the Christian family, though she be a wayward, a froward, and a dangerous member. Filial piety is not religion, nor is poetic allegory, or poetic illusion, religion, in however amiable a garb it may be clothed, or however honorable it may appear to human nature. Notwithstanding the beautiful imagery, or pure sentiment, with which they be invested, so far from claiming our confidence, they are the more dangerous to true and undefiled religion—so easy, so very easy is it, to slide from natural emotions into superstitious reverence for unholy and unworthy objects, soon to be followed by supreme worship.

Thus may Motherlove be magnified into a religious superstition, and Motherheart be exalted into a worship, to supersede the Sovereign of the Universe, and blot him out, almost entirely, from our affections. Motherlove yearns for the good, the comfort, the happiness, and the eternal welfare of her own offspring; but who is to yearn for the offspring of those out of the household of faith—out of an intercessor after the flesh? Who? None other, is the natural feeling and the natural inference, than the Motherheart of the mother of our Divine Saviour—she whose love gave terrestrial existence to Him who careth for our souls, and who gave himself to redeem us—she, she only is worthy to be our "Mother and Patroness"—"Mary, Holy Virgin, Mother of God," and, as a natural sequence, Mother of all the faithful.

Such is the theory of the Roman Catholic Church, if I apprehend it correctly, although it is an unwritten philosophy, yet, perhaps none the less true for that; and all the people of that communion cry, Amen!

I cannot occupy much space to sustain this position by collateral evidence, which is almost as abundant as the cranberries of our State, New Jersey, but must be satisfied to adduce a few Collects from the most authentative sources:—

> "O HOLY Virgin! Mother of God! my Mother and Patroness! I place myself under thy special protection, and cast myself with confidence into thy maternal bosom. O deign to be my refuge in my wants, my confidence in my sufferings, and my advocate with thy divine Son, this day and every day of my life, as well as at the awful hour of death" *
> "Holy mother of God, who hast worthily [illegible] to conceive Him whom the whole world could not [illegible], by thy pious intervention wash away our sins, that so, being redeemed by thee, we may be able to ascend to the seat of everlasting glory, where thou abidest with thy son forever." †
> "Let our voices first celebrate Mary, through whom the rewards of life are given unto us. O Queen, thou who art a mother, and yet a chaste virgin, pardon our sins through thy Son. May the holy assembly of the angels, and the illustrious troop of archangels, now blot out our sins, by granting to us the high glory of heaven." ‡

I shall not attempt a long disquisition to develop the philosophy of this position, as the legitimate result of the general tendency of human nature to give an external expression of our internal sense of beauty and good, upon which I conceive it to be predicated, as not within the limits of newspaper discussion; but shall content myself with stating, that it is this propensity of human nature that prepares us for prayers for the dead, reverence for relics, invocation of saints, and adoration of the Virgin Mary.

While I disapprove, in toto, of such supererogatory devotion—such senseless worship, when we have a clear revelation—an explicit line of duty from the Head of the Church; and while I can never yield to such a plea for adding or abstracting a jot or tittle, to or from the Counsel and the Commandments of the Almighty, I must acknowledge, that I can very readily see, how easy it would be—how very natural and how enticing it would be, to attach superhuman influence to, and confide in Motherlove and Motherheart, to find aid in our extremity; which has led that communion, virtually, to worship the Virgin Mary. It does not surprise me, I say, that they (under their many other delusions and superstitions,) should resort to this approach to the Mercy Seat. That this is really the foundation of their confidence, we have the strongest proof in the Collects just cited:—"O Holy Virgin! Mother of God! my Mother and Patroness." "O Queen, thou who art a mother," &c.

I have said a senseless worship, but as I do not wish to appear inimical or unfair to any branch of the Christian Church, I think it due to add, that the Scriptures require me, and all men, to "Love the Lord thy God, with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength," (Mark, 12: 30;) and that we are instructed that "this is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." John 17: 3. "For there is one God, and one mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus." 1 Tim. 2: 5. And we are further admonished, that "there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved," than the name of Christ Jesus; and therefore we regard any other service or worship, than in and through HIM, as senseless and worthless. The Roman Catholic Church proceeds in her philosophy, her policy, and her polity, on the principles of the wants of human nature, and her own inherent authority to "change laws and times," irrespective of Scriptural injunction, to carry out that consummation. When any church gives herself over to such license she is, unquestionably, at loose ends, and there can be no restraint to her innovations; yet there is one commendable thing, in this matter, about the Roman Catholic Church, which I greatly admire, and that is, she avows, unreservedly, this fundamental principle, and does not persist in quibbles and prevarications, against Scriptural evidence—she does not belie the Word of God, and put it to an open shame, by maintaining that that Word teaches their innovation, but boldly and manfully assumes the responsibility—a worthy ensample for many of the Protestant churches of the present day; for, unfortunately, it is not only the Roman Catholic Church that is tinctured with error from this source—the tendency of human nature to give expression to an internal sense of beauty and good by external manifestation—but a large portion of the Protestant Church—yea, the Evangelical Church—is obnoxious to a like imputation. While the Fathers of the Reformation knocked away much of the superstitious worship, which may be regarded as the bulwark, if not absolutely the Ægis of that hierarchy, the Protestant Church, save one denomination, has undertaken to plant herself under the panoply of an error, scarcely any the less exceptionable, or if somewhat so, which I am ready to admit, scarcely less fruitful of evil, of almost equal magnitude—an error founded on precisely the same principle, evolved by the same philosophy, and supported by the same reasoning of expediency, namely, "infant baptism." What else than this principle or emotion, Motherheart, could have succeeded in introducing and maintaining a rite in the Christian, the Protestant Church, at direct variance with the genius of the Institution, and in defiance of the express injunction of Holy Writ. Baptism, all churches regard as the initiatory rite into the Christian Church. The conditions or prerequisites to baptism, first announced by John the Baptist—the Forerunner of the Messiah—and confirmed by Christ himself, and his Apostles—were, undeniably, Faith and Repentance. How then can we account for the extension of this ordinance to infants—to unconscious babes, wholly incapable of exercising either faith or repentance? How else than to the same emotion, Motherheart, which has introduced the foregoing idolatrous worship and practices? What but blindly following the promptings of the human heart, and emulating the philosophy of that much-traduced church they so closely imitate in this matter? It is quite as easy to infringe upon the prerogative of deity on this particular rite, as by the other amiable though mistaken emotion. With John's requirement, repent and be baptized for the remission of sins, the blessed Saviour's injunction, to teach and baptize, and the Apostles' admonition, believe and be baptized, together with there being no mention of a single instance, in the Scriptures, of an infant—an unconscious babe—having been baptized, christened, or sprinkled, how can persons reconcile it, not to say justify themselves, in appending a superfluous, an uncalled for ordinance?—how dare they be wise above the [illegible] found in the sentiment of the human breast I have been exemplifying—Motherheart. Dr. Adam Clarke intimates as much, or, at least, concedes what is equivalent. "When," says that Commentator, "the Gentiles and Jews had received the faith and the blessings of the Gospel, it is natural enough to suppose that they would wish to get their children incorporated with the visible church of Christ." It is truly natural enough, and the emotion is prompted by Motherlove, or natural affection, to desire such a consummation; but we have no right to desire such a consummation, when it conflicts with God's wisdom and God's economy; nor have we a right to pervert one that approaches to it, which he, in his goodness, has given to gratify that desire, that natural desire of a regenerate heart, by instituting the touching rite of dedication of children; which we regard he has clearly done in Mark 10: 13, 16. The dedication, or blessing of children, after the pattern given unto us by the Redeemer, associates our children as closely with us, as the economy of the better Covenant deems fitting; and the Baptist Church, especially, lose their vantage ground over pœdo-baptists, by disregarding it—by disregarding, wholly, the natural impulses of the human heart, to have their offspring share the benign influences of the institutions of the Gospel, suited to their condition; to provide for which, the precious Redeemer, himself, introduced this delicate and endearing mode of union with the Lord. This is not mere poetry and superstition; it is the wisdom of God. It comports with our natural emotions and desires, while it does not overstep the restriction of the Most High. It affords a legitimate opportunity to give an outward expression of our sense of identity with our children's eternal welfare, after the prescription and the express formula of the Head of the Church. Dr. Clarke, although he commits a sad blunder in the application of the passage in his Note on Matt. 19: 13, yet justly says:—

> "It was a common custom among the Jews, to lay their hands on the heads of those whom they blessed, or for whom they prayed. This seems to have been done by way of dedication or consecration to God—the person being considered as the sacred property of God ever after. Often God added a testimony of his approbation, by communicating some extraordinary influence of the Holy Spirit. This rite has been long practiced by Christians when persons are appointed to any sacred office. But this consecration of children unto God seems to have grown out of use. It is no wonder that the great mass of children are so wicked, when so few are put under the care of Christ, by humble, praying, believing parents. * * * Whatever is solemnly consecrated to God, abides under his protection and blessing."

The error of Dr. Clarke (omitted above,) is the substitution of "baptism" (which he is generous enough to say, in another place—Mark 10: 16—may be performed, by sprinkling, washing, or immersion,) instead of the simple laying on of hands and prayer; but of that we need complain but little, as he has been candid enough to blink that that "baptism" is a "nominal dedication." Note on Mark 10: 16.

The passage in Mark 10: 13—16, has, perhaps, given rise to more error, and likewise to more omission of duty, than any other portion of the New Testament. Not that the error lies in the text, but rests with man in not taking God at his word—in perverting it, and foisting another mutilated ordinance in its stead—the most astounding blunder that the Christian Church ever perpetrated; and the more so, as she pertinaciously adheres to it, against light, reason, and revelation. It can have no interpretation—no apology—than in Motherheart—"the natural wish to get their children incorporated with them in the visible church of Christ;" but God's wisdom is surely the best and most deserving of our implicit regard; for, certainly, He would adapt the means to the end better than any frail, human genius. "Suffer little children to come unto me," &c., does not include, have them baptized, have them washed, or have them sprinkled. Far otherwise. The pattern given was, simply, to lay hands upon them and pray—bless them. Why is it not done so now, as then? I know of scarcely any denomination in Christendom that carries out this example of the Master, but the German Seventh-day Baptists of Pennsylvania, and perhaps a few others of kindred views. I repeat, that we lose much good, and deprive our children of special blessing, by disregarding this benign provision of the holy Jesus. It is a part of the parental, Christian heart, to desire their children to be associated with them in their eternal welfare, in their eternal destiny, and if that fitting opportunity is not afforded to them, man will seek out other inventions. The Roman Catholic Church recognized this want, and supplied a remedy, after their own fashion—by making one for the emergency; and Protestants, feeling the same emotion, blindly imitate the unwarrantable innovation. God has not left us without a witness in this matter—an external manifestation of our internal sense of good and propriety—but man perverts it—perverts it shamefully, wantonly. Parental concern for their offspring cannot be smothered—Motherlove and Motherheart must and will out in a matter of such moment; and the church that resists it, must suffer much damage, and incur a fearful responsibility.

If I have educed the correct philosophy—if I have analyzed correctly this sentiment of the human heart, then the whole matter reduces itself into two propositions. 1. It is the province of Motherlove to care for the temporal and the eternal welfare of individuals, in a limited sphere. 2. The Church—every respective church—represents the embodiment of Motherheart, and it becomes her duty to care for the masses, and carry out the provisions of the Head of the Church to this end. Therefore, if a Christian Church assumes a Motherheart, and yearns to bring all the unconscious sons and daughters of earth within consecrated association, let them not transcend their powers, (for no natural feeling, no philosophy, is to supersede or trans[illegible] prerogative of the Almighty,) but administer the rite, after the prescribed formula—bring the children to have them blessed, after the example, not with the sprinkling of water, but with the laying on of hands and prayer. This is legitimate—this is scriptural—this is true Motherheart; for no Motherlove, no Motherheart, is legitimate, is profitable, which comes short of or transcends the thus saith the Lord.

GIBBON AND THE APOCALYPSE.

Mr. Barnes, in his recently published work on the Revelation, states the very singular fact, that, to his own surprise, he found chiefly in Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, a series of events recorded, which seemed to correspond to a great extent with the series of symbols found in the Apocalypse. The language of Gibbon, he thinks, is such as he would have used on the supposition that he had designed to prepare a commentary on the symbols prepared by St. John. So useful has he found the naked historical facts faithfully recorded by this confessedly infidel historian, in the elucidation of prophecy, not a word of which he believed, that Mr. Barnes thinks he has been raised up by an overruling Providence, to make a record of those events which would ever afterwards be regarded as an impartial and unprejudiced statement of the evidences of the fulfillment of prophecy. To the splendid work of Gibbon, now long rendered classical by its elegance of diction and faithfulness of narrative, he awards the very highest praise, and thinks it, notwithstanding its philosophical speculations and its sneers at every thing connected with the divine inspiration of the Scriptures, the most candid and impartial history of the times succeeding the introduction of Christianity, ever written, and that it contains the best ecclesiastical history of those times to be found. It is most certain, that whatever use can be made of this famous history in expounding and confirming prophecy, must be regarded as fair and impartial, for this was a result which its author least of all men living contemplated, as may be seen from his elegant, positively infidel chapters on the Christian religion.

WHERE MUST A REVIVAL BEGIN?

We answer, that a permanent, healthy revival must commence in the hearts of God's people. It is vain to suppose that any considerable work of grace can be carried on while the church is in a cold, inactive state. All past experience teaches that ere the ungodly world can be shaken, the church must cast herself upon her knees, and wrestle with her God. He has so ordained it, and all our observation teaches that the Almighty uses his own children to overturn the purposes of Satan. The work, of course, is his—he only can convert the souls of men; but he will be inquired of, he will be prayed to, he will be plead with, to do these things for us.

Where, then, will lie the responsibility, if a gracious work of grace in progress should cease? Would it lie with God, with sinners, or at the door of the church? Most certainly with us, who believe in the power of prayer, faith and holiness.

THE CHILD'S PLAYHOUSE.

BY ANN PRESTON.

Who has not been a child, and made
  A playhouse 'neath the trees;
And who so old but groweth young
  When passing one of these?

I saw one in a cool, green nook,
  Anear a cottage wall,
Built cunningly, with many rooms,
  And stored with playthings small.

Prompt little hands had built stone walls,
  And swept the mossy floors;
And sticks, across the openings laid,
  Were gravely called "the doors."

On showy shelves, which oft would fall,
  Were treasures rare, I ween;
The broken China glistened there,
  In blue, and red, and green.

The golden light of childhood's morn,
  While gazing, round me stole,
And fragrance from its far sweet shores
  Swept, breeze-like, o'er my soul:

Once more I trod the green-mossed bank,
  Where, 'neath a school-house tree,
From tiny acorn cups we drank,
  And called it "taking tea."

We played our "meeting" o'er again,
  And I was preacher there,
And with mock gravity we wore
  Our serious Quaker air.

But thou who put on matron airs,
  And played the "mother" then;
The fairest one of all the school,
  Now walkest not with men.

Thou, too, whose dark eyes proudly beamed,
  The queenliest of that band,
'Mid summer toils hast gone away
  Unto the spirit land.

Those mosses still their little cheeks
  'Gainst sister mosses lay;
While of the three who leaned on them
  But I, the weakest, stay.

Oh! earth would be one funeral vale,
  And life a thing of pain,
If beauty did not live for aye,
  And God and love remain!

THE WIDOW'S SON AND HIS BIBLE.

There was a pious widow living in the Northern part of England, on whom, in consequence of the loss she had sustained, devolved the sole care of a numerous family, consisting of seven daughters and one son. It was her chief anxiety to train up her children in those virtuous and religious habits, which promote the present happiness and the immortal welfare of man. Her efforts were crowned with the best success, so far as the female branches of her family were concerned. But, alas! her boy proved ungrateful for her care, and became her scourge and her cross. He loved worldly company and pleasure; till, having impoverished his circumstances, it became necessary that he should go to sea. When his mother took her leave of him, she gave him a New Testament, inscribed with his name and her own; solemnly and tenderly entreating that he would keep the book, and [illegible] year after year elapsed without tidings of her boy. She occasionally visited parts of the island remote from her own residence, and particularly the metropolis; and in whatever company she was cast, she made it a point to inquire for the ship in which her son sailed, if perchance she might hear any tidings of the beloved object who was always uppermost in her thoughts. On one occasion, she accidentally met, in a party in London, a sea captain, of whom she made her accustomed inquiries. He informed her that he knew the vessel, and that she had been wrecked; that he also knew a youth of the name of Charles ——; and added, that he was so depraved and profligate a lad, that it were a good thing if he, and all like him, were at the bottom of the sea.

Pierced to her inmost soul, this unhappy mother withdrew from the house, and resolved in future upon strict retirement, in which she might at once indulge and hide her hopeless grief. "I shall go down to the grave," was her language, "mourning for my son." She fixed her residence at one of the seaports on the northern coast. After the lapse of some years, a half-naked sailor knocked at her door, to ask relief. The sight of a sailor was always interesting to her, and never failed to awaken recollections and emotions, better imagined than described. She heard his tale. He had seen great perils in the deep, had been several times wrecked, but said he had never been so dreadfully destitute as he was some years back, when himself and a fine young gentleman were the only individuals, of a whole ship's crew, that were saved. "We were cast upon a desert island, where, after seven days and nights, I closed his eyes. Poor fellow, I shall never forget it." And here the tears stole down his weather-beaten cheeks. "He read day and night in a little book, which he said his mother gave him, and which was the only thing he saved. It was his companion every moment; he wept for his sins, he prayed, he kissed the book; he talked of nothing but this book and his mother; and at the last he gave it to me, with many thanks for my poor services. 'There, Jack,' said he, 'take this book, and keep it, and read it, and may God bless you—it's all I've got.' And then he clasped my hands, and died in peace." "Is all this true?" said the trembling, astonished mother. "Yes, madam, every word of it." And then, drawing from his ragged jacket a little book, much battered and time-worn, he held it up, exclaiming, "And here's the very book, too." She seized the Testament, descried her own handwriting, and beheld the name of her son, coupled with her own, on the cover. She gazed, she read, she wept, she rejoiced. She seemed to hear a voice which said, "Behold, thy son liveth." Amidst her conflicting emotions, she was ready to exclaim, "Now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." "Will you part with that book, my honest fellow?" said the mother, anxious now to possess the precious relic. "No, madam," was the answer, "not for any money, not for the world. He gave it me with his dying hand. I have more than once lost my all since I got it, without losing this treasure, the value of which I hope I have learned for myself; and I will never part with it, till I part with the breath out of my body."

PALESTINE MISSION.

It is with great reluctance that we give the subjoined communication a place in the Recorder. Though the writer avers that he is not prompted by a "wish to draw out any remarks in explanation or extenuation, and has not wished to provoke any," we are so well persuaded that the effect of his communication, if placed before the public without note or comment, will be any thing but salutary upon the very cause he so warmly espouses, that we cannot allow it to pass unnoticed. A few words we must offer.

As it respects our personal feelings towards the proposed Palestine Mission, we had rather supposed that they were in process of transition from doubt to something like a settled conviction of its expediency. The misgivings which we had felt, but of which we had never made any public expression, were beginning to yield, and the fire of the heart was beginning to burn somewhat in behalf of the enterprise which kindles so glowingly the ardor of our correspondent. It was in this state of mind that we penned the article which has given him such uneasiness, never dreaming that it was liable to the construction which he has given it. But we confess, that the communication he has sent us is a little like water to the flame; and a few more such from different sources might have upon others, whose hitherto indifferent feelings are also in a state of transition, the same effect. Such at least is our fear.

It is due to the occasion to say, that while, in the article entitled "Mission to Canada," we endeavored to express as nearly as possible the mind of the Board, the Board itself is in no manner responsible for the sentiments it sets forth. The article is our own, and nobody else need bear any censure on account of it. If we have misrepresented facts, the Board may temporarily suffer in the estimation of our readers, but the blame will eventually rest where it belongs.

Having indicated by figures the parts of our correspondent's communication to which we would call the attention of our readers, our strictures will be found below. We could enlarge them still more; for we think that in several other respects besides those indicated, our article has not been fairly dealt by. But truth, not controversy, is our object. Our first impulse was to return the communication to the writer, with a private lettter; but upon second thought it occurred to us that there might be others who would take the same view that he did, and who, by complaining in their respective circles, would stir up a jealousy of the Board, that "the advocates of the [Palestine] measure have but little to hope from the Society for that mission"—a jealousy that ought to be allayed at once—and so we resolved to publish it with our appended remarks.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

It appears by an article in the Recorder of Nov. 18th, that the Board of Missions have determined to send a missionary to Lower Canada; and that, after weighing all the advantages and prospects with the Mission to Palestine, they had come to the conclusion, to adopt that field for a missionary effort. No friend of God can have any objection to the Gospel being sent to the Canadians; for, as a community, their happiness and salvation are as important to them as to any other; and although hundreds of missionary fields might equally claim our labors, and if occupied might be as advantageously occupied, yet in all probability the means at present available will only enable us to enter upon one. All that I have to regret with respect to it is, that in adopting the Canada field, it has been placed in opposition to the Palestine field, and facts and arguments compared.(1.) I am sorry that so few of our brethren had communicated, through some general medium, their arguments and facts for a Mission to Palestine, which have induced them to manifest or to feel any measure of "enthusiasm," as they might have had some effect on the minds of those whose duty it was to decide on the claims of the fields before them; as it has been evident, for a long time, that they have not appreciated the facts and arguments that have inspired this enthusiasm, while it is also a matter of equal regret, that as the reasons for adopting the Canada field have from time to time developed themselves to the advocates of that measure, they have not set them forth, that others interested might have participated in those reasons and facts. It is possible that I am, however, the principally deficient one, and alone responsible.(2.)

It appears to me, on the persual of the article referred to, that the paragraph presenting the reasons for deciding against the Palestine mission,(3.) is rather extraordinary, and must satisfy the advocates of that measure, that they have but little to hope from the Society for that mission; and if it would not be considered supercilious, I would remark on a few things in that paragraph which produce that conviction.

The Board rejoice at the ardor that is kindled in reference to Palestine, as it affords evidence of a "growing missionary spirit among us," as though this spirit could be converted to the use of any other field. As far as I am informed, the ardor and enthusiasm enkindled for Palestine, are for that people and that field exclusively.(4.) They say, in continuance, "That a mission to Palestine may be creditably and successfully prosecuted, something more than enthusiasm in our churches is necessary." May not this be said in reference to any other mission? But it is said, that "we need a man of rare qualifications;" and after saying what those qualifications are, I admit they are rarely found combined in the same individual; and should any person offer himself for the mission, in expectation of being accepted, after such a notice, I should (without intimate knowledge of him) suspect him of being either presumptuous or egotistic; and it seems to me, that the confidence expressed, that the Lord "will raise him up," is based on the significant "if," which regards the enthusiasm expressed of a suspicious or doubtful origin; as if we should have said, The Lord will work a miracle, if your faith is genuine, and as strong as your profession. "If it is an enthusiasm enkindled by the love of Christ, and by a longing after the salvation of them that crucified him," it is said, "and if it shall continue to give evidence of its genuineness, in great conflicts of prayer, that God will furnish the needed laborers, the enterprise will not long be delayed." This sentence seems to throw suspicion over the whole subject, and doubt over all the professors of the "enthusiasm" alluded to. Why, it may be asked, is this ordeal proposed for the friends of this mission more than the one adopted? and why has not the same full and conclusive proof of genuineness been required of its advocates? Have all their prayers and tears been forgotten?

After the advocates of the Palestine Mission are thrown back to review their motives and impulses, and give proof of their profession, and the genuineness of their ardor, it is said, "Let there be no needless uneasiness about the Palestine Mission; it will be undertaken as soon as Providence shall make the way clear!" I am impressed that the great difficulty of this mission is in a false conception of the necessary qualifications. I believe that good common sense qualification, (if ardent piety and devotion to God, and to the promulgation of his gospel, be included,) will be as available with this as with any other people; for the Gospel will not be made to stand on the wisdom of men, but the power of God, as much now as in primitive times.(5.) And while we are waiting for men of rare qualifications to present themselves, we shall suffer our opportunity to pass, and we shall have the mortification to know, that God has chosen the foolish things of this world to confound the wise, and the weak things of the world to confound the things that are mighty, and "base things, that are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and things that are not, to bring to nought things that are." And for what cause? "That no flesh should glory in his presence."

And now I must say, that I am almost discouraged in regard to any prospect that we will be made instrumental in any good to that people. I have for a score of years been persuaded, that God had a mission for Seventh-day Baptists to the Jews, and that we had been preserved from mixing with the masses of Protestant Christians, to be used in carrying successfully the Gospel to that people. I have been persuaded, for nearly that length of time, that we live on the verge of an important era, especially for that people—that the time of their dispersion was drawing to a close—and have for that period of time been, in my feeble manner, suggesting to my brethren the propriety of studying their duty on this subject. Fifteen years ago they awoke to the subject, and consecrated themselves to the work of carrying the Gospel to the Jews, and Palestine was the field principally had in view; but, by what has proved an ill-advised preliminary effort, the whole scheme was abandoned. Hope has revived, from time to time, and been again dashed; and now, it appears, it has struggled again for life, and received a go-by; not that the Canada field has been adopted, but that the Board have not in possession light and sympathy or courage and hope, sufficient to recommend a mission to Palestine, notwithstanding all that is promised in God's word, and the signs of the times, which indicate that the summer is nigh, even at the door, and that even now it may be too late for us to enter into the field to advantage. And the article we referred to, gives not the slightest promise, or directly encourages the hope, that the obstacles which now hinder our commencing will ever be removed, (6.)

I have not submitted the foregoing with any wish to draw out remarks in explanation or extenuation; I have not wished to provoke any; and I am not surprised that prayer goes up to God for the success of the few Sabbath-keepers now engaged in what is doubtless considered the "forlorn hope" in that field, or that the funds of our people will also be directed from the ordinary channel of the denomination, to the support of efforts less promising to us as a people.

To the friends of the mission I would say, in conclusion, Let not your prayers be hindered, or your efforts diverted. The Bible is full of encouragement to you. Glorious things are spoken of Zion; and if you labor faithfully, and believe confidingly, and go down to your graves without seeing your wishes gratified, you have the consolation to believe that your prayers will be found in the vials with odors, which will be brought out when the new song shall be sung, saying, "Thou art worthy," &c. And may not your prayers be withheld, that this people, so well adapted to go to the Jews successfully may, not by constraint, but willingly, throw their whole efforts to a work so full of promise.

Remarks.

(1.) The Canada field was not "placed in opposition to the Palestine field." The decision the Board came to was not the result of a comparison of all the advantages and prospects of the one field, with those of the other. The question was not, Shall we adopt the Canada field, and abandon the other? It was not, Is Canada the most important of the two? It was not, Shall we turn our attention to only one country, and that country Canada, to the exclusion of Palestine and every other? No such question has been agitated by the Board. The question was simply, Is it expedient to take hold of the Canada Mission? If we have any understanding of the action of the Board at all, the Palestine Mission has not received "the go-by," nor has any action been taken which even squints at a repudiation of it. It will necessarily come up for consideration at our next quarterly meeting, and will probably be debated at successive meetings, till a final decision shall be made.

(2.) It is some two years since the Canada Mission was first talked of. It began in the withdrawal of Bro. Jones from the Haytien field. Bro. J.'s heart was in the missionary work, and he had prepared himself to preach in the French language. He felt himself under some sort of obligation to make his knowledge of that language available to the promulgation of the Gospel among those who used it; and we, in turn, looked upon this as something like a call of Providence upon us to make use of him in this capacity. The question then arose, Whither shall we send him? Among other fields, Canada was suggested. It was never much discussed in the Recorder, it is true, because it was thought best that the field should be explored, before any action should be taken to establish a permanent mission there. But the Board had it under discussion, and contributions were even sent in to forward the object. It was near falling through altogether, and had not Bro. J. felt himself somewhat pressed in spirit to go on an exploring tour at all hazards, it probably would have been abandoned. But Bro. J. went; he has returned; the account of his visit has been placed before the denomination; it was important to Bro. J. that the question, so far as it related to himself, should be finally disposed of; and in view of the whole; the Board has made the decision. If others do not see wisdom in the action of the Board, we cannot help it; but we know that the decision was not arrived at without much anxiety and carefulness. We think that "the reasons for adopting the Canada field" have been set forth.

(3.) "Against the Palestine Mission!" There has been no such decision. The paragraph referred to makes no attempt to offer "reasons for deciding against the Palestine Mission." All that it pretends to do, is to show the reasons why the Palestine Mission was not entered upon first. We knew that the desire for this mission was very strong with some of our people, and that some thought it ought to be undertaken immediately, before any other enterprise was thought of; and all that we aimed to do, was to justify the Board in what might seem to those who were not intimately conversant with its deliberations a disregard of the wishes of those who were looking so earnestly towards Palestine.

(4.) Heretofore, we have had our fears that the enthusiasm in regard to Palestine was just what our correspondent represents it to be, "for that people and that field exclusively." And in this originated our hesitancy as to the undertaking at all. We had no question that there was enthusiasm enough to start the enterprise, and that, taking advantage of it, hundreds of dollars could be secured from those who had never looked with favor upon our China Mission, nor upon any thing else of foreign undertaking. But what dependence can be placed upon such? People who never give their aid to other enterprises, will soon weary of the Palestine effort, the novelty of it having once passed. And then, who will sustain it? Why, the very ones who have borne the burden of the China Mission, and of every other benevolent work which the denomination has undertaken. And as far as we are personally concerned, we would say, that our willingness to throw in what strength we can exert in behalf of the proposed Palestine Mission, is based more upon the benevolence of those who have always shown themselves ready for every good work, than upon any sudden enthusiasm of those who would labor "for that people and that field exclusively." All that we ask, all that we have ever asked, is that we may have a sufficient guaranty that the work once entered upon shall not be suffered to fail for want of steady, vigorous, healthy prosecution. It would be a disgrace that we could not easily wipe off, if we were to begin to build and not be able to finish.

(5.) We believe all this, as well as our correspondent; and though we have urged the importance of putting the Palestine Mission under the charge of a man of "rare qualifications," we would not be understood as throwing any discouragement in the way of modest men, nor as casting any invidious reflections upon the talent already embraced in the denomination. Among our young men not yet instated in the ministry, there may be, for aught we know, the germs of the very qualifications which we regard as important; and time and proper training will bring them out. Or, it may be that God will yet send us a man, suitably qualified, from another denomination. But it is a prevailing conviction in our mind, that we have not any, among the present ministry, who can be sent on this work. They either lack the necessary mental discipline, or they are too old, or they cannot be spared from the important posts they are now occupying.

(6.) In the article referred to occurs this sentence: "Till a man suitable for the undertaking, in the judgment of the Board, shall be found, nothing more can be done than to take those preliminary steps which are even now in progress, and which may result in all that the fondest wishes of our people can anticipate." The Palestine Mission is not abandoned; it has not received the "go-by;" it is still the subject of anxious and prayerful consideration.

Jewish Missions.—The N. Y. Times gives a synopsis of the Annual Report of the American Society for Meliorating the Condition of the Jews, recently published. It states the number of missionaries in the employ of the Society, and engaged in Christianizing the Jews, to be 7; colporteurs 6, and students in training 4—all of whom are converted Jews. It has mission stations at New York, Albany, Syracuse, Rochester, Boston, New Haven, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Charleston, Columbia, and a few other places. The number of Jews who have professed the Christian faith since May last, is 6, among whom are two Rabbis; the number [illegible] within two years, 20; the number of Jews in the United States more than one 100,000; of whom, it is estimated, that 150 are converts. The number of Jews in the world the Report estimates at fourteen millions—of whom some 10,060 are openly professing Christianity. The whole number of Christian missionaries to the Jews is estimated at 150. The Secretary, Mr. McGregor, thinks the Jews in the United States more accessible than in any other part of the world.

JEWISH MISSION IN AMSTERDAM.

We have already chronicled the circumstance, that a Mrs. Zielt, a Christian lady of Amsterdam, Holland, has presented a church edifice and endowment to the Jewish Mission of the Free Church of Scotland. The following account of the church, and of a service in it, we find in one of our exchanges:—

"The buildings presented by Mrs. Zielt consist of an excellent church, in a central and pleasant part of Amsterdam, exceedingly neat and becoming, and internally commodious and comfortable, together with five class-rooms, under the same roof, some of them spacious, and all of them suitable. The whole structure in its present form is new, fitted up in a simple and tasteful manner, and altogether accordant with Dutch cleanliness and comfort. This property has been legally transferred, and vested in the Free Church of Scotland, together with an endowment of $400 a year. The acceptance of her munificent gift, and the visit of the deputation, afforded most evident and lively satisfaction to the benevolent donor—a satisfaction which entire ignorance of each other's tongues fettered, but could not conceal; while her beautiful mansion presented a remarkable union of Christian simplicity combined with the amplest hospitality.

"The first opportunity I had of visiting the church which is now our own, was immediately on arriving at Amsterdam, on the evening of Friday, the commencement of the Hebrew Sabbath, when Mr. Schwartz gives a weekly lecture to the Jews in Dutch. After traveling all day, a lecture in an unknown tongue might have been little else than a trial of patience; but, on the contrary, both the scene and the service were full of attraction, and not without instruction. The part of the church in front of the pulpit was covered with chairs for females, the rest was fitted up with pews for men—a distinction generally observed, with the exception that the Jewesses, not proselytes, were seated toward the back of the church, as unwilling to identify themselves with the Christians, while the Jews stood near the door, with their hats on, as in their own synagogues. The proselytes were mingled with the congregation—most of the converts from Judaism, whether converted through our mission or not, preferring to attend Mr. Schwartz's ministry. The interest of the whole congregation was remarkable throughout the service. Every now and then a man was seen starting up from his seat, and standing, sometimes evidently from eagerness in listening, at other times apparently for the purpose of sustaining attention, till more than thirty were hearing in that attitude. The congregation was supposed to exceed two hundred, although the attendance, owing to the season of the year, was considered small. Very few of our ministers could maintain throughout the year a weekly religious meeting so well attended, and especially with so large a proportion of men. We understood that the Jews, not proselytes, might be about thirty, their number being very variable—large on particular occasions, and again very limited. The character of the meeting was purely religious, but not devotional, except [illegible] might join, or rather, perhaps, might witness without scruple. The other worship consisted in the singing of Psalms at the commencement and at the close, when the loud burst of song from the whole congregation was such as is rarely heard in Scotland—the sound of the organ, which is universal in Holland, being effectually drowned."

THANKSGIVING AMONG THE POOR.

That most filthy and repulsive section of New York, known as the Five Points, is now the field of two vigorous missions. One is conducted by Rev. Mr. Luckey, under the direction of the Ladies Home Missionary Society. The other is under the charge of Rev. L. M. Pease, who connects with his mission a house for supplying work to the poor. Both of these missions are in the habit of furnishing the poor around them with a Thanksgiving Dinner; and this year the season seems to have been one of more than usual interest. We abridge from the daily papers the following account of it.

During the forenoon of Fifth-day, Nov. 25th, there was great preparation going on in the mission room of the Old Brewery, and in the Tent in the Square, by the Ladies of the Home Missionary Society, Rev. Mr. Luckey, their Missionary, and a number of their gentlemen friends, who were kindly aiding them. Provisions came in freely, and in such abundance that every thing requisite was supplied. Four or five long tables were erected in the Tent, and covered with luxuries in the form of good food, well prepared, such as many of the recipients seldom if ever partook of. Evergreens sent by Mr. Harding, the proprietor of Metropolitan Hall, adorned the tables and tent; statuary was furnished by Mr. Gibson, for ornamenting the tables; Taylor, of Broadway, sent pyramids to assist in the decoration of the tables; and others aided in completing the arrangements, and making the occasion delightful.

During the early part of the day, the office of the Missionary in the Old Brewery was thronged by children, who were receiving the clothing which had been sent in for distribution to them. A number of the active ladies of the Society were present to superintend the distribution of the various articles; and they washed the faces of a large number of those who were to partake of the dinner. From 200 to 300 children were furnished with about 1,000 articles of clothing, according to their various necessities, and made ready to partake of the refreshments. As evening came on, the Old Brewery was brilliantly illuminated from cellar to attic, and presented a most novel appearance. There were throngs in the street, and around the Tent, of children, and men, and women, who belong in the neighborhood, and many from other parts of the city, attracted thither by the novelty of the scene. Within the Tent the scene was pleasing. Four long tables were loaded richly, and [illegible] beautifully decorated. There were 50 or 60 turkeys, an abundance of ham, bread, biscuit, cake, fruits, &c. Ladies were present to superintend the tables. Hundreds of persons from various parts of the City visited the spot towards evening, and the entire space in the Tent was occupied by visitors during the feast.

As near as could be estimated or counted, 1,000 children participated in the feast. After eating, the little girls marched in order around the table, and were presented with a doll each, which had been furnished by a lady for the purpose. When the boys had been fed, they also marched around the table, and were furnished with a toy each, which had been supplied by Smith & Torrey for the purpose. Boys and girls were supplied with a package of candies, furnished by Mr. Wild of Broadway and Messrs. Stuart of Greenwich-st. Boxes of oranges were also supplied for distribution, and cakes and fruit were given them to take home.

Altogether, it was an occasion exceedingly happy, and probably beneficial to those who gave and officiated, highly gratifying to the large number of visitors who were spectators, and those who had been instrumental in getting up the affair, and furnishing the materials, realized that it is more blessed to give than to to receive.

In the House of Industry, under the management of Rev. L. M. Pease, there was also a happy time, and much said above would apply to the scene within the premises under his charge. Tables were spread, on which appeared an abundance of good things. Turkeys were carved by the dozen, ham and bread and fruit were served, and from 300 to 400 children were fed. Candies and other luxuries were supplied by Messrs. Stuart and others, and all of the hotels from Canal-st. down, except perhaps one or two, contributed for the occasion. In this house many were made happy by the events of the day, and upon their minds was made an impression which will long keep in remembrance Thanksgiving Day of 1852.

A CHANCE FOR THE BENEVOLENT.

The Slave Case recently decided in New York, has given occasion for a show of benevolence on the part of our citizens, both pro-slavery and anti-slavery.

No sooner was it decided that the slaves of Mr. Lemmon were entitled to their freedom, than sympathy began to be expressed, by the pro-slavery newspapers and the cotton merchants, for the poor slaveholder whose chattels had been by law changed to human beings. This sympathy soon took a tangible form, and $5,240 was raised by subscription among the merchants, to compensate Mr. Lemmon for his two boys, two women, and four infants. As this sum considerably exceeds the market value of the slaves, their former owner has no reason to complain of his lot, while the contributing merchants probably expect to get their money all back in the increase of their Southern business.

Seeing how well this subscription worked, and desirous of doing something in a better cause, the editor of the N. Y. Tribune proposed, in his paper of Third-day morning, Nov. 23d, to get up a subscription for the benefit of the freed slaves, and headed it with $20. In the course of that and the following day, $748 was paid in for the purpose of making them a Thanksgiving Donation on the 25th. The money has been placed in the hands of three Trustees, (John Jay, E. D. Culver, and Lewis Tappan,) to be used in the way best calculated to benefit the enfranchised. Probably this, with what had been previously collected, and what will hereafter be sent in, will place them in comfortable circumstances, and enable them to take care of themselves.

—Since the foregoing was written, another case deserving of sympathy has come to our notice. In 1849, Paul Kauffman, of Cumberland County, Pa., was prosecuted on a charge of harboring certain slaves belonging to a Mrs. Oliver, of Williamsport, Md. The case was first tried before Judge Hepburn, and decided against Kauffman. Afterwards it came before the Supreme Court of the State, where the first decision was reversed. Finally, it came before the U. S. District Court, where a decision against Mr. K. was obtained. In the trial before the State Courts, it was shown that a negro named Cole had piloted the slaves from Chambersburg to Mr. Kauffman's premises, and concealed them in his barn, without Mr. K.'s knowledge or consent! After he had secreted the slaves, he informed Mr. Kauffman of what he had done, and Mr. K. promptly objected, stating that the negroes might be readily found, and thereby involve him in serious difficulty. Cole, however, refused to remove them, and left immediately for home. Mr. Kauffman then fed the slaves, which is the whole sum and substance of his crime. The slaves were removed during the night; but it was clearly proved on the trial, that he had no hand in the removal, and that his horses and wagon were not used for the purpose. When the case was brought before the U. S. District Court, two of Mr. Kauffman's essential witnesses were arraigned as parties; and although they were acquitted, their testimony was rendered unavailable; hence the decision against Mr. K. The correspondent of the Tribune—from whose communication the above facts were obtained—closes as follows:

"Of Mr. Kauffman I would just say, that he is one of the most exemplary men in Cumberland County. He never has enticed a slave from his master; and, beyond the simple act of giving the hungry fugitive bread, he has never aided either directly or indirectly in his escape. He is a brother of the late Mr. Kauffman, M. C., from Texas, and has a wife, and one daughter, about ten years old. He owns a farm containing about fifty acres of prime land, and was nearly, if not quite, clear of debt when this suit was first tried. As before stated, the two suits in the State Courts cost him $1,100; and the last suit in the U. S. District Court, where he had to attend either three or four times with his witnesses before it was tried, cost him $1,100 also; and the verdict against him of $2,500, making about $5,000 in all, leave him not only without a home or property, but absolutely $1,000 in debt above all his means in the world. It seems that he is even deprived of the benefit of our $300 law, and must surrender every thing, personal and real, as the price of giving bread to the hungry slave! His friends are now making an effort, by subscription, to buy his farm and deed it to his wife, and it is to be hoped that it will be crowned with success. It will require probably $4,000, of which a liberal portion will be raised in this and Cumberland Counties. If any of your readers feel like contributing to this purpose, all moneys remitted to James Lesley, Esq., Cashier of the Bank at Chambersburg, will be promptly applied as above-named."

Mormon Missionaries.—The Mormon Elders held a Special Conference at Salt Lake City, August 28, and made extensive Missionary arrangements, considering their numbers and means. England seems to be their great field of labor—no less than thirty-seven Elders being appointed Missionaries to that benighted country. To Ireland they send two; Wales two; France one; Germany four; Berlin three; Norway two; Denmark one; Gibralter two; Hindostan nine; Siam two; China three; Cape of Good Hope three; British North American Provinces four; West Indies four; British Guiana two; Texas three; New Orleans one; St. Louis one; Washington City one; Iowa one; Australia nine, and the Sandwich Islands nine. The appointments were confirmed by the unanimous vote of the congregation.

Colporteur Convention.—Several of the Officers, Agents and Colporteurs of the American Tract Society, and Delegates from the Branch Societies at Boston and Baltimore, met in Convention at Richmond, Va., Nov. 10th, and continued their sessions six days. About forty-five members were present, of eight different communions, from seven different States. John Tappan, Esq., of Boston, presided, assisted by the pastors of the Churches of various denominations in Richmond. Rev. Dr. Stow, of Boston, preached the opening sermon. Personal narratives, sketches of fields explored, and the manner and results of Colporteur labor, with discussions of the principles and bearings of the Tract enterprise, and the practical duties of those connected with it, constituted the principal exercises of the occasion.

Yale College.—The catalogue of Yale College for the present academic year exhibits the aggregate of students at that Institution as follows: Theological Students, 37; Law Students, 39; Medical Students, 35; Students in Philosophy and the Arts, 46; Seniors, 108; Juniors, 102; Sophomores, 117; Freshmen, 120. Under-graduates, 447. Deduct deceased, (senior class,) 1. Total, 603. The following may be considered as a near estimate of the necessary expenses, without including apparel, pocket money, traveling and board in vacations: Treasurer's bill, $60; board, 40 weeks, from $70 to $100; fuel and light, from $6 to $15; use of books recited, and stationery, from $5 to $15; use of furniture, bed and bedding, from $5 to $15; washing, from $12 to $18; taxes in the Societies, &c., from $6 to $8. Total, $164 to $231.

The Lack of Ministers.—The papers of nearly every denomination represent the churches as suffering from a lack of Ministers. It was recently stated, that some ten or twelve of the large Congregational Churches in New Hampshire are vacant, as at Concord, Exeter, Boscawen, Nashua, &c. The Presbyterian Herald, of Louisville, Ky., notices a number of Old School Churches in South Illinois vacant, as Galena, Nashville, Edwardsville, &c.; and in Missouri the Churches in Hannibal, St. Joseph's, Richmond, St. Francisville, Liberty, Potosi, and Savannah, all flourishing cities and villages. In Western New York, it is stated that a large number of New School Presbyterian Churches are vacant. Similar complaints are made by the Baptists and other denominations.

A New Hymn Book.—A volume of German and English Hymns, prepared by a Committee of the German Seventh-day Baptists, lies before us. It is very well printed, and contains 238 hymns in German, and 343 in English. The English hymns, so far as we have read them, are strikingly devotional and evangelical in their character, and many of them are favorites with all denominations. A few of them, however, might be improved by a discreet use of the literary pruning-knife, and by modifying some expressions which, however true and significant in themselves, seem rather out of place in the worship of One "fearful in praises." As a whole, the work is creditable.

The Bible in Schools.—They have had a discussion in the School Board of Cincinnati respecting the use of the Bible in Schools. The following resolve (moved by a Catholic) was finally adopted by a vote of 15 to 10:

Resolved, That the pupils in the Common Schools have permission to read such versions of the Sacred Scriptures as their parents may prefer, provided that such preference to any version, except the one now in use, be communicated by the parents to the Principal Teachers, and that no notes or marginal readings be read in schools, or comments made by the teachers on the text of any version that is or may hereafter be introduced.

The Independent Church at Adams.—A letter from Eld. Wm. Green, of Hounsfield, N. Y., dated Nov. 12, 1852, says: "The Independent Seventh-day Baptist Church at Adams has received some healthy additions of late. Last Sabbath nine were added, six being by baptism. Twenty-eight have been added since the meeting of the Association. The present number is about eighty. Our prayer is, that the crown be on the head of the Redeemer, to whom be the glory."

The Transactions of the New York State Agricultural Society, for 1851, have been laid on our table. They fill a large volume of nearly one thousand pages—175 pages being occupied with Mr. Johnson's Report to his excellency Gov. Hunt, on the Great Exhibition in London. The volume contains matter of great value, especially to the farmer and mechanic.

IMPERFECT IN ORIGINAL

Accounts from Rev. Albert Barnes, now in Europe, are again discouraging. Eminent occulists in Berlin advise him to return immediately to this country and rest a year at least. Mr. Barnes ruined his eyesight by night labor. He was a very industrious man, as his works show. His celebrated "Notes" were written in the morning before the great multitudes of his city had begun their tasks. He had a study in his church, away from the reach of men; and unless he chose to be seen, no one could get access to him. He would lock his iron gate in front of his church, lock the doors to the main entrance, traverse a back vestibule, and then lock his study door, and be as quiet as he chose.

It is said that soon after his settlement in Philadelphia, he was found by the watch, about 3 o'clock in the morning, about to enter the church. They arrested him, and were about to take him to the watch-house. His account of himself was far from being satisfactory. He said he was the clergyman of the church, and was about to enter his study. But the sturdy guardians of the night gave him to understand that the clergymen of Philadelphia had better customs than to be prowling about churches at 3 o'clock of a winter's morning. But in doing thus the doctor violated the laws of nature, and has probably ruined his eyesight forever.

Death of O-ga-na-ya.—This Christian Cherokee, an excellent Baptist minister, who will be remembered as one of the Indians present with Rev. Evan Jones at the meeting of the Missionary Union at Pittsburgh, departed this life at Jefferson City, Mo., Sept. 6. "O-ga-na-ya," says a correspondent of The New York Recorder, "held a high position as a man of character and influence among his countrymen. He has discharged the duties of several important offices of trust and honor, with credit to himself and satisfaction to his people. He had efficiently filled a seat in their national councils, represented their interests before the General Government at Washington, and set as judge in their courts of justice; but, more than all, and that in which he gloried most of all, for years he had been a faithful minister of Jesus, zealous for the truth—eminently successful in winning souls to God. He was the honored and beloved pastor of a church numbering between two and three hundred members."

Well Dosed.—Under this head the Richmond Republican has the following paragraph, which we copy in order that our readers may see what is regraded at the South as good dosing:—

"The free negro, Nokiah Lisander, that made fight with officer Tyler on Monday last, when about to arrest him, was brought before the Mayor yesterday morning, and ordered thirty-nine lashes for remaining in the Commonwealth contrary to law. The Mayor directed the officers of police to bring this fellow in and have him dosed every day until he left the State. Lisander is, we believe, originally from New Jersey, and has been frequently ordered to return to his native State, but rather than do so he hangs on to the good old Commonwealth, occasionally undergoing a severe castigation for thus violating the law. Pity that he could not be disposed of to a good master, and thereby rendered happy."

Harper's Magazine.—The December Number of this work—the giant among the monthlies—commences its sixth volume. It has already reached a monthly issue of more than 100,000 copies, and is still steadily and rapidly increasing. The publishers have endeavored, by a well-directed use of the abundant resources at their command, to render it the most attractive and most useful Magazine for popular reading in the world; and the fact that its circulation is greater than that of any similar periodical ever issued, indicates the extent to which their efforts have been successful. It is generally admitted, that no other Magazine presents so much reading matter of so good a quality, in so elegant a style, and at so cheap a rate. Terms, three dollars a year, or twenty-five cents a number.

The December Number contains a Sketch of Washington City, by Anne C. Lynch, with seventeen illustrations; Australia and its Gold, by Alfred H. Guernsey, with twelve illustrations; Napoleon Bonaparte, by John S. C. Abbott, with six illustrations; Daniel Webster, with six illustrations; Monthly Record of Current Events; Literary Notices; Fashions for December; and a great variety of articles, for the titles of which we have not room.

Madame Sontag's Concerts.—After giving several Concerts in Philadelphia and Boston, Madame Sontag commenced a Second Series at Metropolitan Hall, New York, on Monday Evening, Nov. 29th. The Rehearsal for that Concert was thrown open to the clergymen of New York, Brooklyn, Williamsburgh, Jersey City, &c., and was attended by a very large number of them. In the course of the proceedings, the Rev. Samuel Hanson Cox, D.D., of Brooklyn, addressed Madame Sontag, the Countess de Rossi, in the name of the assembled clergy, and in very handsome terms thanked her for the kind invitation, and the great delight she had given them, and tendered her and her associates, in return, a free ticket to hear sermons in the various Churches.

Carson on the Inspiration of the Scriptures.—Edward H Fletcher, New York, has published a volume of 420 pages 12 mo. entitled, "The Inspiration of the Scriptures: a Review of the Theories of the Rev. Daniel Wilson, Rev. Dr. Pye Smith, and Rev. Dr. Dick, and other Treatises." By Alexander Carson, D. D. The volume contains many valuable suggestions.

Over ninety-three millions of letters passed through the Post-Offices of the United States during the last fiscal year. The revenue under the reduced rates of postage has fallen off nearly a million of dollars.

European News.

One week later news from Europe has been received, of which we give a summary.

The British Parliament met Nov. 11. The Queen delivered her speech in person. The speech opened with a tribute to the memory of Wellington, and gave a brief space to the chief topics of national interest. The Fishery disputes with the United States are commented upon in a moderate tone. The kingdom has received assurance of friendly feeling from the foreign powers, and is internally tranquil. The efforts of the Brazilian Government for the suppression of the Slave Trade, having been made quite effectual, the British cruisers have been withdrawn. The East India Company's Charter is recommended as a proper subject for revision. In regard to manufacturing industry, the speech hints towards Protection, and commends the case of Ireland to the favorable consideration of Parliament.

The news of the week, however, turns upon the course of events in France. The Empire in France is finally re-established, and the Prince-President assumes the title of Napoleon III. The Senate met on the 4th inst., in accordance with the summons of the President, when a Message was received from Louis Napoleon, announcing the approaching change in the Government, and declaring the reasons, founded in the alledged wishes of the French people, which have induced the action. On the 8th, a Committee of the Senate submitted a long report, accompanied by a Senatus Consultum, consisting of eight articles, which was adopted by a vote of 86 to 1. The programme is as follows: 1. Louis Napoleon is named Emperor, under the title of Napoleon III. 2. The Imperial dignity is made hereditary in the line of Louis Napoleon, the privilege extending only to the male heirs. 3. Louis Napoleon failing of issue, the legitimate children and descendants in the male line of the brothers of the Emperor Napoleon I. are to continue the succession. 4. Louis Napoleon is to designate the succession by will. 5. A Senatus Consultum is to provide for the succession in default of a legitimate or adoptive heir. 6. The members of the family of the new Emperor form part of the Imperial family, and cannot marry without the Imperial authorization. 7. The Constitution of January 15, 1852, is maintained in all provisions not conflicting with the proclamation of the Empire. 8. The proposition is to be submitted to the acceptance of the French People. In presenting this document to the President, M. Mesnard, First Vice-President of the Senate, expressed the sentiments of that body, and Louis Napoleon signified his acceptance of their proposition. Jerome Bonaparte, the President of the Senate, subsequently had an interview with Louis Napoleon, and upbraided him for the exclusion of his family from the succession, an act which Jerome deems an insult to himself and his son. The President employed soothing language, but could not induce the ex-King to abate his complaints. Jerome has accordingly resigned the Presidency of the Senate and the office of Governor of the Invalides, and declares that he will hold no station but that of Marshal of France. The question of the ratification of the Empire was to be submitted to the people on the 21st and 22d Nov. On the 25th the Senate was to meet to declare the result.

A most extraordinarily violent hurricane of wind and rain recently passed over Athens, doing a very great deal of damage. One of the three single columns of the Temple of Jupiter, which date from the time of Adrian, was blown completely over, as well as the three half columns on the west side of the Erechtheum. The old cypress tree near the Temple of the Druids was torn up by the roots, as well as many other trees; and a part of the roof of the English Church was blown far down the neighboring street.

Dispatches from Prague announce that the ex-Emperor of Austria has been struck with epileptic appoplexy, and that he has received the last sacraments.

From Russia, we have intelligence of the death of Prince Lenchtenberg, son-in-law to the Emperor Nicholas.

A severe earthquake had taken place at Liverpool, Manchester, and several other towns in the vicinity. No great damage was done, but the circumstance is the subject of much comment.

The departure is announced of the First Brigade of the advance force from Rangoon for Prome, which was shortly to be followed by the Second Division. It was confidently expected that upon the troops reaching Prome the country would yield and be annexed, and the Burman war be immediately brought to a conclusion.

Advices from China state that the insurrection was extending.

California News.

Three steamers with California news—the Prometheus from San Juan, and the Northern Light and Georgia from Aspinwall—arrived at New York Nov. 28th. The Prometheus brought 206 passengers, the Northern Light 240, and the Georgia 250 passengers, over two and a half million dollars in gold dust, and the California mails to Nov. 1st.

The news by this arrival is not of special importance, as will be seen by the following summary of it.

On the evening of Nov. 8th, a theft was committed on part of the British specie train, crossing the Isthmus a few miles this side of Cruces, near a rancho known as Quemado. In going through one of the narrow rocky passages near the place designated, the load of one or two of the mules of the train became deranged, and it was found necessary to repack them. While this was being done, other of the mules under charge of the particular muleteer who had to stop and make the necessary change, got some distance ahead. Without guard or guide, they were thus jogging on, when one of them, loaded with boxes containing Peruvian dollars, was stopped and stripped of its load in a very short time. The robbers—it is said there were several of them—repaired to a spot some two hundred yards off from the road, and breaking open the boxes, proceeded to put their ill-gotten wealth into a more portable shape. One of them took off his breeches, and having tied the bottom of each leg of them, was occupied in emptying the boxes, when the guards were heard approaching, and the robbers found it necessary to leave in haste. Several shots were fired, but nobody was hit. The only box broken open contained something less than five hundred dollars, all of which, together with the other boxes, were recovered by the guards.

A serious misunderstanding has occurred between the Consul of Peru at Panama, and the Governor, occasioned by an alleged insult received by the Consul from a Police officer.

The Chinese residents of San Francisco had a grand festival recently, in which hundreds joined, attired in rich costume. A long procession of carriages and a cavalcade of horsemen marched out to the Yerba Buena Cemetery, to visit the burial-place of their deceased brethren. They ate, drank and enjoyed themselves until a late hour in the day.

The Tong Hong Tock Dramatic Celestial Company lately arrived from China, and consisting of 123 performers with their own music, has given a few entertainments at the American Theater. A Company of Chinese Jugglers also gave a few performances prior to their departure for Mexico.

A number of gentlemen in San Francisco have formed an association, under the name of the American Russian Commercial Company, with the view of furnishing ice from Sitka, for the various ports on this coast and throughout the Pacific Ocean.

The friends and advocates of introducing the Maine Liquor Law into California, have held a large meeting for the purpose of promoting the cause.

A Spaniard named José Forni has been convicted of the murder of a Mexican in Happy Valley, and sentenced to be hung. This is the first sentence of death legally passed in San Francisco. The case is one of aggravated nature.

The San Francisco Herald says: We have reason to believe that there is a gang of incendiaries about, who are endeavoring to destroy the city by fire. Mr. Hossefross, the able Chief of the Fire Department, reports that on the night before last, no less than three attempts were made to fire the city.

The Perry Wing Dam Company, at Parks's Bar, took out of their claim, on Wednesday and Thursday of this week, 86 pounds of gold, or at $16 per ounce the immense sum of $16,512. A few days before it was supposed they would not be able to get into their claim this season on account of high water, and shares were sold at a low price. Quite a change.

Messrs. Warren & Co., of Sacramento, have completed the following statistics of emigration across the plains. It includes those parties who had left the Missouri River prior to June 6; Men, 16,362; Women, 3,342; Children, 4,266; Wagons, 5,325; Horses, 6,538; Mules, 4,686; Hog, 1; Cattle, 58,392; Sheep, 10,523; Turkeys, 150. These were on the south side, and do not include those that went to Council Bluff.

From Oregon.

We have Oregon papers up to Oct. 23, being two weeks later intelligence.

The Statesman learns that about five hundred wagons of the immigration are still beyond the Dalles, and some are as far back as the Blue Mountains, and even beyond them. Much sickness and suffering prevailed along the whole line, and also at the Dalles. The deaths at the latter place averaged one per day. Provisions are not yet plenty, though there were enough at the Dalles, and some distance beyond, in the hands of the travelers. The prices asked are very exorbitant, and many persons destitute of means are dependent entirely upon charity. It is said that abuses have been practiced by those sent out to the assistance of the immigration. In one case 100 lbs. of flour was sold for $55. A number of those who came down Snake River encountered many unnecessary delays, dangers and hardships. The river was very high, and many lost their entire property, while some lost their lives. The number of this years' immigration is set down at ten thousand, and the proportion of women and families is much larger than in any previous year. The citizens of Oregon City and Milwaukee together have raised about $1,000, to be expended in the purchase and forwarding of supplies for the immigration.

The Rogue River mines are yielding well in some places. A lump of gold of the value of $523 was taken out near Jacksonville, in the southern part of the Territory.

The Columbian says that a party are now engaged in the survey of a railway, from the Sheokum Chuck coal mines to Puget's Sound.

A party of persons were attacked by the Indians on Malhear River, in the early part of October, and two of them wounded. Four of the Indians were killed. The whites were obliged to flee for their lives.

Purchasing Cuba.—A collection of public documents relating to the efforts of the United States to purchase the island of Cuba from Spain, found way into the papers last week. It seems that this subject has engaged the attention of our Government at intervals for the last thirty years; and that among the official papers recently transmitted to Congress upon the subject, are letters from Mr. Clay, Mr. Webster, and other distinguished men. During the administration of Pres. Polk, Mr. Buchanan instructed Mr. Saunders, then our minister at Madrid, to open negociations, directly but cautiously, with the Spanish government, for the transfer of Cuba to the United States; he was authorized to give the most positive assurances that the United States would never permit the transfer of the island to England, or any other European power; and the sum of $100,000,000 was further tendered to Spain in exchange for Cuba. The Spanish government not only declined to listen to the proposition, but declared that it would sooner see Cuba sunk in the ocean than consent to its transfer to any other power.

Revolution in Buenos Ayres.—The news of a revolution in Buenos Ayres, which was briefly announced some days ago, from a report of a master of a vessel arriving in Boston, is fully confirmed by later advices. Gen. Urquiza has been deposed by the Buenos Ayrean party, and, unwilling to cause the effusion of blood, has retired from the Province. He still retains the direction of the Confederation, and professes to regard the outbreak at Buenos Ayres as of no importance. The revolution was headed by Generals Piran and Madariaga. General Pinto has been declared Governor of the Provinces, and Piran Minister of War. The Chamber of Representatives has issued a manifesto to the other Provinces of the Argentine Confederation, explaining the causes of the revolution, and charging Urquiza with the violation of his guarantees to the Buenos Ayrean people, and the adoption of a cruel and oppressive policy. The Provincial Government has resolved to confirm the measures of General Urquiza in regard to the free navigation of the Parana.

SUMMARY.

The will of the late Judge De Veaux was proved in the Surrogate's Court of Niagara County, N. Y., last week, and Elijah Ford, Esq., has been appointed financial agent of the estate by the Trustees. The estate is valued at from one hundred and twenty thousand to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, the whole income of which, after the erection of suitable buildings, is to be applied to the education of orphans and children of the destitute.

In April last, three Misses Hunt, of Ripley County, Ind., accompanied by eight male relatives, started for California across the Plains. By the time they arrived at Salt Lake, every male member of the family had fallen a victim to the cholera, and the ladies, being thus left without their natural protectors, determined to return home, which they did, arriving at St. Louis a few days since.

Two woolen factories were sold at Little Falls, in this State, Nov. 16th. A large stone mill, known as the Wool Growers' Mill, with all its machinery, was struck off for $27,000, to Mr. Loomis, for a house in Philadelphia. The Saxony Mill and machinery were sold at $15,000. Both mills and their machinery are in good condition, and it is expected that one or both of them will be set in operation this winter.

A dispatch dated Worcester, Mass., Nov. 22, says: The County Prison was partially destroyed by fire between 12 and 1 o'clock this morning. Besides several prisoners, the building contained fifteen insane persons, four of whom were smothered to death. Their names are, Wm. O'Keith, aged 17; Thomas Downes, of Worcester, aged 40; B. J. Busbee of Rhode Island, aged 47, and another, name not ascertained.

We learn from the Chicago Journal, that the Galena Railroad Company are sinking an Artesian well near their machine shop in that city. They have already reached the depth of 220 feet. They progress at about the rate of two feet per day. They are now passing through a stratum of soft white marble, intermingled with which is a considerable quantity of iron. Strong hopes are entertained that they will soon strike a vein of water.

California contains four hundred thousand square miles. This would give eight States as large as New York State, fifty as large as New Jersey, and fifty-seven as large as Massachusetts. With a population equal per square mile to that of New Jersey, California would support eighteen millions of inhabitants; if equal to New York, twenty millions, and if equal to Massachusetts, forty millions—or fifteen millions more than the present population of the entire United States.

At Plymouth, Marshall County, Indiana, on the 2d ult., Mrs. Fall was accidentally shot by her oldest son, a lad 15 or 16 years of age; he was in the yard before the door, loading a gun; the cap was rather small, and in the act of forcing the cap on the tube, the powder exploded, and the ball struck Mrs. Fall in the back. She died in an hour, leaving six or seven children. The husband and father is insane, and has been some time at the hospital.

A terrible affair occurred near Vicksburg, Miss. It commenced between Judge James and Thomas Carmeal, Jr., and the former was fatally wounded by the latter with a bowie-knife. A son of Judge James thereupon shot Carmeal dead. Sheriff Yerger and Mr. Robards, a magistrate, were also badly wounded by Carmeal, while endeavoring to stop the affray. Young James had surrendered himself to the authorities.

A few miles from Boston, on Friday, a curious sight was seen, being a drove of turkeys, not driven, but led or coaxed by a man with a basket of corn. He occasionally threw out a handful, and the turkeys marched after, not reflecting on the many hungry appetites they were destined to satisfy on Thanksgiving. There were 750 in the drove, and they came in that novel manner all the way from the northern part of Vermont, where live turkeys are worth from 8 to 10 cents per pound.

On Sabbath (Saturday) afternoon, Nov. 20th, a serious accident occurred at Bethlehem, Pa. Preparations were making for a Democratic supper and torchlight procession, to take place in the evening, and several men were firing cannon, when a premature explosion took place, and two men were shockingly injured; one of them, named John Roth, had both his arms shot away, and died next morning; the other, named Wm. Bush, lost one arm.

Franklin Pierce is the youngest man who has ever been elected President of the United States. He is 48 years of age. Washington, John Adams, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, John Quincy Adams, and Van Buren, were each 58; Jackson, 62; Harrison, 68; Taylor, 66; and Polk, 50.

Henry P. Knight and William Debon of Boston, Receivers of the Pawtucket Bank, have given notice that, in pursuance of a decree of the Supreme Judicial Court, all claims against that Bank must be presented for payment on or before January 1, 1853, or they will be forever barred.

We see in the Brattleboro (Vt.) Eagle, that A. H. Bull, Esq., of Hartford, Conn., a summer resident in Brattleboro, has guaranteed to give, for the purpose of establishing a library in that village, the sum of $100 per annum for 20 years, provided the inhabitants of the place will first raise $500 for the same purpose.

Hon. John Andrew Shultz, ex-Governor of Pennsylvania, died in the City of Lancaster, Nov. 19th. Mr. Shultz had probably arrived at nearly eighty years of age. He was bred to the pulpit, but was obliged to give up preaching at an early day in consequence of some physical affection.

A son of Mr. Betts, of Wayne, Erie Co., Pa., was heating a kettle of spirits of turpentine on a stove, with four younger brothers and sisters about him; the father was absent; the mother in an adjoining room; when on the young man putting some rosin in the kettle, it exploded or boiled over on the stove, filling the whole room with flame and gas, and striking every person present blind and helpless. Mrs. Betts was found strangled by the neighbors, and all her children so burned that three of them died that night, and the two remaining were not expected to survive when heard from.

Letters containing money having frequently miscarried of late between Richmond and Baltimore, Mr. McGuire, special agent of the Post Office Department, on Friday mailed a decoy letter in Virginia, addressed to a banking house in Baltimore. It contained worthless bank-bills and a marked quarter dollar. The agent on Saturday traced possession of the coin to Henry C. Weightman, a clerk in the Washington Post-Office.

MARRIED,

Nov. 16th, by Eld. Leman Andrus, Mr. Hosea W. Palmer to Miss Mary Jane Kenyon, both of Wirt, Allegany Co., N. Y.

In Verona, N. Y., on the 21st of November, 1852, by Samuel P. Marsh, Esq., Henry Armstrong to Malvina M. Morse, both of Verona.

In Hopkinton, R. I., Nov. 21, by Eld. Daniel Coon, Mr. Jacob Schwerdtle, of Stonington, Ct., to Miss Darrothea Jaeger, of Hopkinton, both late from Europe.

DIED,

In Hopkinton, R. I., Nov. 20, 1852, Polly Pecham, aged 74 years. She was a member of the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton. She was one of the afflicted saints; for more than twenty-five years she has labored under a pulmonary disease, which often has been very distressing; yet she did not murmur against God. She has gone to rest.

In Lima, Rock Co., Wisconsin, of inflammation on the lungs, terminating in consumption, Laura, youngest daughter of John and Maria Truman, aged two years and four months.

In Albion, Wis., Oct. 16th, of croup, Julina, daughter of Daniel R. and Sarah Burdick, aged three years and five months.

In Woonsocket, R. I., Nov. 9, Mr. Amos Ellis, aged 65 years. He was formerly a resident of Western New York.

On the 6th ult., Rev. S. S. Burdette, in the 49th year of his age.

The deceased had long been a faithful watchman on the walls of Zion. The sublime truths of the Christian Faith had often been the theme of his eloquence, and always the light of his life. His genial influence was cast abroad as the rays of a luminary in a benighted world, irradiating many a heart, and brightening the pathway of many a pilgrim in this vale of tears. From the labors of the church militant, he has gone to the reward of the church triumphant—from the cares and turmoils of life, to the endless felicity of eternity.

His duty to God rendered him faithful and useful to his fellow-men. Constant as a friend, energetic as a man of business, and scrupulous in the performance of every trust, he was honored by his fellow-citizens, and elevated to responsible stations in the civil as well as the ecclesiastical state. He occupied a seat in the City Council of Lafayette during the last year of its existence as a distinct corporation. He was a distinguished member of the Temperance, Odd Fellow, and Masonic Orders; all of which honored him in life, and officiated at his burial. In all these various relations, he was ever true to duty and his God.

He was a husband and a father. A cloud has come over the domestic hearth; the shadows of darkness have shrouded a happy home; but above the cloud, the light of heaven is gleaming, and through the veil of night the star of hope is beaming from the skies. The bereaved widow and the fatherless are consoled by the reflection that their loss is his eternal gain. They know him to have been devoted in life and resigned in death to the will of Him who doeth all things well. They know that he often expressed his willingness to "depart and be with Christ." They know that his spirit now rests in Abraham's bosom. Such reflections should calm the commotions of the troubled breast. Such blessed consolation should lull the billows of the spirit-ocean to peace and silent submission. With the poet, the bereaved should say:

> "Earth to its narrow place beneath,
> Soul to her home on high;
> They who have seen thee sleep in death,
> No more should fear to die."

Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

Wm. Henry Fry's Lectures on Music.

THIS COURSE OF TEN LECTURES will be given on successive TUESDAY EVENINGS, commencing on TUESDAY, the 30th inst., at

METROPOLITAN HALL.

The aim of these Lectures will be to present, in a condensed but clear form, an illustrated history of the rise, progress, and present state of all departments of instrumental and vocal music; whether sacred, dramatic, symphonic, classic, romantic or national, or of those various kinds which it would be difficult to class specifically. The manner in which the subject will be treated will enable the hearer to understand the structure of various musical compositions, to form more correct opinions of the performance of vocal and instrumental artists, and to comprehend more clearly the proper terms of musical criticism. In short, the effort of the Lecturer will be to give, as minutely and thoroughly as such a course of musical lectures can, a view of the literature, an analysis of the philosophy, and an explanation of the technicalities of music, both as a science and an art. A residence of several years in Europe has enabled the Lecturer to collect a large amount of rare materials for the practical illustration of the historical and critical text.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS

of these Lectures will form one of their principal attractions, and will be so copious and particular as to leave no Historical or Critical passage of the text misunderstood by any hearer who can distinguish the difference between varying sounds. The present state, as well as the origin and progress of the

OPERA, THE ORATORIO, AND THE BALLAD,

will be illustrated by the performance (by Artists of Distinction, an ample Chorus and a grand Orchestra) of the most popular and characteristic passages in the works of

THE GREATEST MODERN COMPOSERS,

whose Overtures, Solos, Concerted Pieces, and Choruses, will all be made to contribute to the Lecturer's text. And as a condensed history of the Art from the remotest ages, and in all countries, will be given, and every statement sustained and explained by the performance of a musical composition in the style remarked upon, a copious but carefully made selection of

will be produced. The Lecturer has made researches in the great Libraries of Europe, and has obtained an unbroken sequence of musical compositions commencing at a period more than a hundred years distant, and which forms a complete exponent of the development of the art from the time of Charlemagne.

Paintings of antique and barbaric instruments, and copies of the Illuminated Music Books of the early ages of the Catholic Church, will be exhibited. In the course of the lectures there will be an analysis of Greek poetry in its musical relations; likewise an extended view of the application of English poetry to music, indicating the resources of the language and the reforms required. Among the curious music to be performed, are—"The Chinese Hymn," sung in presence of the Emperor at the Annual Thanksgiving, and supposed to be the oldest piece of music in existence; Various national and sentimental airs of the same people; The chief religious and secular airs of the East Indians, exhibiting their early efforts in the production of melody; Egyptian music collected during Napoleon's Expedition into that country; Two Ancient Greek Hymns rendered into modern notation after Meibomius and Barette: Ode of Boece of the 9th century; Song of the battle of Fontanet, of the same era; Song of Erie, Duke of Frioul; Complaint on the death of Charlemagne; "Ut queant laxis"—the origin of the modern system of solfeggi—from the original; Chorus sung anciently in Venice at the ceremony of the marriage of the Doge with the Adriatic; Song of Blondel the troubadour who accompanied Richard Cœur de Lion; Song of the French Armies in the year 1400; Chants of the Sainte Chapelle, 13th century; Extracts from Hugbald on Harmony of the 9th century, the earliest writer known on the subject; the most ancient piece of music in parts, handed down in England; Selections from the Music Book used by Queen Elizabeth: Palestrina's Original Mass: Gluck's "Orpheus" and "Euridyce:" Extracts from the Works of the Founders and Subsequent Masters of the Chief Schools of Europe.

The Illustrations having shown the progress of the art thus far, the number of Solos, Duetts, Trios, Quartettes, Choruses, Overtures, and other vocal and instrumental pieces from the works of the greatest

Modern Italian, French, and German Composers,

which will be given, are entirely too numerous for particular mention in a general advertisement. Among them, however, will be extracts from LeSeur's opera, LaCaverna, Spontini's Vestale, Felicien David's Christopher Columbus, and Meyerbeer's Prophete. And it may be remarked that some of the Lectures will embrace

GRAND CONCERTS

of Classical and Dramatic Music, with Explanatory and Historical Comments; and that for the proper attainment of this object, the Musical Illustrations will be given by over

TWO HUNDRED PERFORMERS,

including a corps of Principal Operatic and Concert Singers of the first grade, an Orchestra of eighty, and a

CHORUS OF ONE HUNDRED.

The design of these Lectures being not only different from, but wider in scope and more elaborate in detail than any which have ever been presented to the public of either Europe or America.

A Prospectus for gratuitous distribution, may be had at all the Music Stores, setting forth the plan of each Lecture, which cannot be embraced within the limits of an advertisement.

SINGLE TICKET FOR THE COURSE $5

Payment to be made on delivery of the tickets, at WM. HALL & SON'S, No. 239 Broadway, on and after Monday, Nov. 22.

Seats secured to subscribers.

Upward of one thousand subscribers have already signed the lists, which may be seen, with the prospectus at the Music Stores generally.

To non-subscribers, the price of tickets will be one dollar to each Lecture.

Miscellaneous.

The Census of 1850.

The "Abstract" of the Census contains some important information in a very compact form.

In respect to territory, it appears that during the last ten years, we have extended the area of the United States from 2,055,153 to 3,230,572 square miles, without including the great lakes, or the sea-bays.

The population gained by these accessions is 172,000. No full returns have as yet come in from California, but assuming its population, partly by estimate, at 165,000, the whole population of the Union is 23,263,488. Absolute increase from 1840, 6,194,035; increase per cent., 36.28; or deducting that from addition of territory, and the relative increase, is 35.27 per cent.

The number of whites is 19,630,738, and the relative increase the last ten years, is 38.28 per cent.

The slaves amount to 3,204,089, relative increase, 28.81 per cent.

The number of free colored is 428,661; relative increase since 1840, 10.96 per cent.

If we refer to the data of previous tables, it appears that the increase of the whites in the Union every decade since 1790, has been very equal; being lowest from 1820 to 1830, (33.95 per cent.;) and highest in the last, (38 28 per cent.) With the slaves, the greatest increase was from 1820 to 1830, (30.61 per cent.,) and the least, from 1830 to 1840, 23.8 per cent.) The average increase of the free colored, on the other hand, has regularly diminished since 1790; being 82.2 per cent. in the first decade, 25.25 in the third, and rising a little in the fourth, it falls in this last to 10.96 per cent. A fact worth considering as respects the probable destiny of this race.

In the most favored country of Europe, the Report states, the decimal increase is less than 1½ per cent. per annum, while in the United States, it is 3½ per cent. In 40 years, with the present rate of increase on both continents, the population of the Union will exceed that of England, France, Spain, Portugal, Sweden and Switzerland combined.

As respects the rate of increase in the different New England States, during the last ten years, it is greatest in Rhode Island, (35.57,) and least in Vermont (7.59)—which is also the least in the whole Union.

What is somewhat remarkable, the rate of increase in the great States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Maryland, is less than in either Rhode Island or Massachusetts.

In the whole Union, Wisconsin shows the greatest ratio (896.48;) next, Iowa (345.84;) then Arkansas (114.85;) and Michigan (87.33)

In regard to the number of immigrants, the Report goes into an extended examination. The conclusion is, that there are now, of immigrants and their descendants, since 1790, in the Union, 4,350,934. Of these, 1,542,860 arrived during the last ten years, or about double the number of the previous decade.

Tables are given for the density of population of the States. Massachusetts and Rhode Island are the two most populated—the former having 127.49 inhabitants to the square mile; the latter, 112.97. The least are Texas, (0.89 to the square mile,) and Florida, (1.47.) Taking the 31 States, the average number is 15.54 to the square mile; with the whole area, it is 7.2.

The number of slaves manumitted and escaped during the year ending June, 1850, is given. The latter amount in all, to 1,011; the former to 1,467. Maryland loses the most (279), then Kentucky (96), and then Louisiana (90). Of the manumitted, Maryland claims 493; Delaware, 277; and Virginia, 218.

Of the slaves in the respective States, Virginia has the largest number—472,528; the next, South Carolina, 384,934; and the smallest, Florida, (39,309); and Delaware, (2,289.)

The free colored are most numerous in Maryland—74,077; and in Virginia, 53,829; Pennsylvania has also 53,323. The least numbers are in Iowa, 335; and Texas, 331.

A table of the number of deaths and their ratio to the living in each State, has been also made. From this it appears, that the two States where the number of deaths is greatest, in proportion to the living, are Massachusetts and Louisiana! The ratio in the former being one to every 51.23, and in the latter, one to 42.85. Wisconsin, Vermont, Iowa and Florida are apparently the healthiest; the average of the first being one to every 105.82; of the second, to 100.29; of the third and fourth, to 94.06 and 93.67. The average of New York, if one considers the terrible mortality among our immigrant population, speaks well for the climate—being 69.85.

The diseases which are the especial cause of this great mortality in the two extremes of our Union, are probably Consumption in the Northern States, and Yellow Fever in the Southern. It appears, too, that the cold equable climate of Vermont and Wisconsin, and the mild equable climate of Iowa, Georgia, and Florida, are the most favorable to health.

As regards the Press, the result of the Census speaks well for the intelligence of our people. The whole number of papers and periodicals in the United States June 1, 1850, was 2,800; circulation, 5,000,000, and the number of copies printed annually, 422,600,000.

The entire capital invested in manufactures in the United States is estimated in round numbers at	$530,000,000

Value of raw material	550,000,000
Amount paid for labor	240,000,000
Value of manufactured articles	1,020,300,000
Number of persons employed	1,050,000,000

In the manufacture of Cotton Goods, Massachusetts stands first; New Hampshire second, and Rhode Island third—Pennsylvania following next.

In Woollen Goods, Massachusetts first; New York second; Connecticut third, and Pennsylvania fourth.

In the manufacture of Pig Iron Pennsylvania produces (in value) about half the whole production of the Union. Ohio stands second and Maryland third.

In castings, New York produces the greatest value; then Pennsylvania, followed by Ohio and Massachusetts.

Of wrought iron, Pennsylvania works rather more than half the product of the whole Union; followed by New York, Virginia and Ohio.

In the production of malt and spirituous liquors, New York has the greatest capital invested; the next, Pennsylvania; and the next, Ohio.

In agricultural productions, Pennsylvania produces the greatest number of bushels of wheat; Ohio, and then New York, and then Virginia, closely follow.

The first wool-producing State is Ohio, and next, New York.

Of live stock, New York has the greatest value; next, Ohio; and next, Pennsylvania.

Ohio produces the most wine, followed by Pennsylvania, and then Illinois.

In hemp, Kentucky leads; followed by Missouri.

Of maple sugar, New York shows the greatest production, and Vermont the next.

In cane sugar, Louisiana produces nearly three quarters of the production of the whole Union; Florida is second. [N. Y. Times.

Ill Health of American Women.

The correspondent of the Independent, who has been entertaining the readers of that paper with the notes of his pedestrian tour in Europe, has returned home, and gives in his last communication some of the "first impressions" which home made upon his mind, after so long a sojourn in foreign countries. Above all, the want of national health, and particularly the almost universal ill health of American ladies, struck him most forcibly. On this subject he says:—

"I sat down with a lady lately, and out of a wide circle of acquaintances, in every part of the country, we attempted to reckon the healthy, and we could not think of more than three really healthy women. What is the rule in Europe, seems the exception here; the ladies come before one here as more fine, more delicate—yes, generally with more of a certain graceful beauty, than in England or Germany, but with far less robust health. There are so few full, healthy complexions, or vigorous forms. Those who are well, are so plainly weak, with constitutions which the first rude shock of pain or exposure will shatter. And this does not seem confined to one class. Indeed, it is even more true of the village than the city. The pale worn looks of the mechanics' wives, or the sickly faces which you see in so many a farmer's household show it sadly enough. It is very seldom indeed one passes through a village here where the ruddy complexion, the bright glances of health, the full developed form meet the eye, as they do so invariably in the European villages."

This subject is of such vast importance, that we extract two or three other passages from the same article. With reference to the cause of the general decay of health, the author observes:—

"There is no country of Europe, I believe where women take so little air as they do in this. In England, on many a day, when no lady here would soil her shoes out of doors, I have walked with ladies miles and miles through mud or snow, or heavy mist. In Berlin there was never a bright winter's afternoon in which we did not make up a skating party on the meadows, where indeed, all the belles of the city were collected. In Hungary, a horseback scamper over the plains, or a walk in the gardens with the ladies, was as common as the meals. And throughout southern Germany, Italy, France, even where there are no more vigorous exercises, an afternoon's promenade in the parks or on the bastions, has come to be almost a necessary of life. It seems as if the people of those countries delighted in the sunlight much more than we.

"The ladies read, sew, eat in the open air, in arbors and gardens, far more than is ever the custom here. Then in the lower classes the women are obliged to work much in the fields, in some respects, a thing not to be approved, yet on the whole, by no means so degrading a custom as we often think in America. It brings as one happy result at least, the full cheerful health which God designed to be the natural accompaniment of life. There is an unnatural delicacy among all our women about exposures. If people would only learn that rain and frost and snow are not half such poisons as the closely vitiated air which steams all day within heated walls. An English lady with her stout boots and shortened skirts makes no more of a mud or snow walk than of the pleasantest ramble. The walk becomes as much a necessity as dinner, and there is soon a real pleasure in breasting the rough weather."

A Story of Slavery.

Rev. J. W. Higginson, in a call for funds to set a family of slaves at liberty, gives the following touching history. We find it in The Worcester (Mass.) Spy:—

About thirty years since, a certain man emigrated from a town in this State to Augusta, Georgia. Like many New England men, he soon became a slaveholder; like many, he took for his mistress one of his slaves. He built a house for her, and visited her frequently. She was an intelligent woman, was well acquainted with his business affairs, and had a good deal of influence over him.

They had four children—three daughters and a son. He supported them, and treated them as his children; the son was educatd for a gunsmith, and became quite skillful. These facts were generally known in the community where they lived, and these statements, in fact, came from that quarter. It was commonly supposed, however, by those who knew the father, that he had made a will emancipating his children and their mother, and leaving his property to them. The family declared that he intended coming North very soon, to live here with them. But he died suddenly, (like St. Clair in Uncle Tom.) No will was found!

So far, it is no uncommon series of events, under the peculiar institution. But now comes the startling point. The children and their mother became, of course, the property of the heirs of the father—four distant relatives, residing in Massachusetts and New Hampshire. The Southern neighbors were touched by the circumstances of the case, and represented them to the Northern heirs. The children were at their mercy. What said those heirs? They sold the mother and children, separately, at auction, and divided the proceeds.

Let me, however, be just to them. Three of the heirs once signed a paper liberating the family. The fourth, who held his share in right of his wife, promised, by his wife's death bed, to sign the paper. His wife died, and he then refused. The other heirs yielded, made no attempt to redeem the family, and took their share of the money.

I have seen that man whose avarice thus sentenced to bondage and wretchedness the children of the individual whose property fell thus strangely into his hands. He bore the outward aspect of a man, but God had written a terrible retribution upon his shameful lips and down-cast eye. I visited him eighteen months ago, in company with that slave mother, and I never saw anything more pathetic than the way that base man cowered before the just indignation of that wronged woman. It seemed the foreshadowing of some terrible Day of Judgment, when the black race shall rise up before the Anglo-Saxon, and point the finger of eternal reproach, and say, "Thou art the man!"

Fortunately for this wretched family, they were all bought at auction by one benevolent man; he bought them in hopes that the heirs might redeem them; or rather, he bought the woman; another man paid $1,250 for the son. Since then, by the noble efforts of the mother and daughters, (aided by one heir, who advanced $500,) the son has been liberated, and is now in California. But that mother and those daughters are still in slavery.

An effort is at last being made for the release of these women. Of the four heirs, one is poor, and can pay nothing; another (the guiltiest) refuses to do anything; another promises $200; the fourth died some years since, leaving $100 in the hands of a trustee, who is now poor, and utterly unable to pay it—though it may possibly be recovered from a bondsman. The family have been allowed by their master to accumulate $650 toward their freedom. And there has been subscribed in the neighborhood where the father of these children originated, about $260. This leaves $290 to be raised in addition, before the whole sum of $1,400 can be paid; unless (which is improbable) the above bequests be recovered.

The Tank on Tiptree Farm.

Near the farm buildings is the great tank, to the mouth of which we mount up the side of a rough mound. A couple of trap-doors being opened, we look down into a gloomy vault of the size of a small cottage, wherein there sleep, in a dull heavy way, the remains of a great many things. Every atom of manure upon the farm, all offal, every dead dog or sheep, is buried here. Cattle dead of disease are skinned, cut into quarters, and thrown down this trap-door. What is the density of this mass, Mr. Mechi? If we were all to jump in, it would float us all, and an elephant or two into the bargain. This is a country supply of Mechi's Magic Paste, intended to improve the blades of grass and corn. Any gruel so thick and slab never was yet concocted in a witch's cauldron; a frog would be a ridiculous drop to throw into such a bucket; and the farm laborers who "round about this cauldron go," if they read Shakspeare, must think him far from having attained sublimity in his idea of a filthy mess. This is the filth collected on a single farm, every grain of which, the seed upon the farm, fulfilling its appointed office in the scheme of nature, is ready to convert into corn, cabbage, clover, and the like, which will again pass into flesh. This pool is not a Slough of Despond, but a true Bethesda to the sickly land about it. Over this pool we may well think how large a tank would be required to hold the filth of London, and of many another city. Such filth lies partly stagnant under towns, and partly pours into their rivers; it ripens crops for undertakers in the city and yields crops for butchers and for bakers in the field. If we look down into the tank, we shall perceive, now that the pool is stirred, no solid wheel could move in the thick mass to mix it properly; what iron could not manage is done by the impalpable substance of the air. Powerful streams of air are forced in from below by the adjoining engine; these make their way upward, and slowly the huge mass stirs, the scum breaks upon the surface, and strange shapes of corruption rise to the top, slowly pass aside, and sink again. Water drained from the farm—the water that once puffed the land up as a diseased excrescence, a bog tumor—flows into the tank, is mixed with the more solid matter, and, having thinned it to the due consistence, passes with it, in the form of liquid manure, through a pipe that lies under the strong thumb of a steam engine. Through a pipe five inches in diameter, the steam-engine forces the fertilizing stream into a series of tubes, which run under the brown skin of the soil as arteries run under our own skins, charged with nourishment. * * Whatever rots in the tank to-day will probably be growing in the field to-morrow; there is no waste of matter, and there is no waste of time. The manure heap might be transformed twice over into growing vegetables, and be back in the shape of a double quantity of manure, instead of lying idle for a twelvemonth, as it does occasionally in the old-fashioned farm-yard. Nothing lies idle at Tiptree. The tank is the great stomach of the farm, into which all refuse goes as food, and forms the chyle that is to pass as the farm's blood through pipes under the whole surface of the land.

Clothing in Cincinnati.

We gather some statistics of the clothing business in Cincinnati from an article in the Gazette of that city.

The number of dealers in ready-made clothing is between four and five hundred, of whom one hundred sell by wholesale, the rest by retail. A large number carry on the business both ways, in different departments in the same store. Dividing the dealers into four classes, according to the capital employed, the Gazette finds that ten of the heaviest firms employ a capital of $200,000 each, a hundred of the second class $50,000 each, another hundred of the third class $20,000 each, and about two hundred and forty retail establishments average a capital of some $8,000—thus making an aggregate of $10,920,000.

The number of persons employed in the business is estimated thus: I. The principals, numbering over 500; II. Tailors, earning from four to ten dollars weekly, 2,500; III. Seamstresses living in Cincinnati and its suburbs, Covington and Newport, 6,000—they have employment most of the year, and earn from two to three and four dollars a week; IV. Clerks and Salesmen, with salaries from $300 to $1,200 per annum, 900—an aggregate of over 10,000 persons.

The markets for the goods manufactured comprize the whole of Kentucky, Indiana, the greater portion of Ohio, Illinois, Missouri, the Mississippi towns above St. Louis, and portions of Tennessee. Large quantities find their way into the lumber districts of Michigan and Wisconsin, the mineral region of Lake Superior, and to trading points in Arkansas and Texas.

A Cur's Toilette.—An amusing circumstance occurs every morning in Bridge-street Row, close by the entrance to the Chronicle office. When the servant is employed polishing the external brasses of Mr. Davies' (the chemist) shop, the spaniel belonging to the latter makes a point of taking up his station on the stall to watch the operation, and as soon it is finished, offers his neck to the man for the purpose of having his brass collar burnished up in a manner suitable to a dog of his pretensions. Sometimes the servant pretends to forget this mark of attention, when Don takes care to remind him of his neglect by a very significant bark. The process of adornment invariably concludes by the presentation of his paw as an acknowledgment to his valet de chien. [Chester (Eng.) Chronicle.

"Can't Afford It."

A subscriber, living not a hundred miles from this place, (says the Vermont Christian Repository,) recently called at our office and requested his paper to be stopped on the plea that he could not afford to pay for it. His wife and children, he said, were very anxious to take it, and he liked the paper himself; but then, he was too poor to take it, and we, of course, erased his name.

From what we know of this individual, we shall venture to guess that it costs him, at least, 12½ cents per day for his liquor. This will amount to forty-five dollars and sixty-two and a half cents per annum. What a sum expended for that which is worse than useless! No wonder he could not afford to pay two dollars per year for a newspaper which his wife and children were so anxious to read! But the companion of his life must be denied her favorite paper and his children grow up in ignorance and disgrace because he chooses to expend all for rum. Take what it costs him for alcohol, and he could afford to buy for his family $10 worth of books, three weekly newspapers, five barrels of flour, and two hundred lbs. of sugar for their support, happiness, and intelligence. Just "cipher" for yourself. He that buys only one glass per week at six cents pays out more money, yea almost as much again as for a weekly newspaper. Oh, how it sickens our heart to see men refusing to take a newspaper on the plea that they "can't afford it," when they are expending for that which ruins their constitutions, makes a wreck of their intellects, benumbs their moral sense and degrades their families, enough, every week, to pay for a usefel newspaper.

The Fowl Fever.

It would seem by the following paragraph, which we extract from the New England Cultivator, that the fowl fever has by no means abated in that quarter:—

"At the late Boston Fowl exhibition, (in September, 1852,) three Cochin Chinas were sold at $100. A pair of gray Chittagongs at $50. Two Canton Chinese fowls, at $80. Three Gray Shanghae Chicks, at $75. Three White Shanghaes at $65. Six White Shanghae Chickens, $40 to $45, &c., and these prices, for similar samples, could now be obtained, again and again.

Within three months, extra samples of two-year old fowls, of the large Chinese varieties, have been sold in Massachusetts at $100 the pair. Several pairs within our own knowledge have commanded $50 a pair, within the past six months. Last week, we saw a trio of white Shanghaes sold in Boston for $45. And the best specimens of Shanghae and Cochin China fowls now bring $20 and $25 a pair, readily, to purchasers at the South and West.

These prices do not equal, however, the sums which have been recently obtained in England for fancy fowls. The Cottage Gardener says:—

"Within the last few weeks, a gentleman near London has sold a pair of Cochin China fowls for 30 guineas, ($150,) and another pair at 32 guineas, ($160.) He has been offered £20 for a single hen; has sold numerous eggs at 1 guinea, ($5) each, and has been paid down for chickens just hatched, 12 guineas ($60) the half dozen, to be delivered a month old. One amateur alone has paid upwards of £400 for stock birds.

The Pantograph.

Among the wonderful discoveries or inventions ending in "graph," the Pantograph seems destined to take no second place. It is a cutting and carving machine, which works with amazing celerity, great precision and finish, and is applicable to innumerable purposes of ornament and use. This remarkable invention has been patented by Mr. Searby. Acting on the principle of the slide-rest, or floating bed, and directed by the Pantograph, the machine is moved with such facility and exactness in all the directions of the cube, under a fixed tool or tools, that it is capable of producing, in cutting, carving, or engraving, a fac-simile of almost anything presented to its operation. The enumeration of all the purposes to which this strange piece of mechanism is applicable would exhaust imagination. The hardest substances offer no impediment to its powers. In stone or marble, in ivory or wood, in pearl or metal, it can turn out copies of any shape you please; and, by a principle of easy adjustment, on a scale as much larger or smaller than the original as may be desired. It will engrave seals to any pattern; turn out an exact copy of the Medicean Venus, or the Greek Slave; furnish blocks to the calico-printer, the floor-cloth manufacturer, the paper stainer, and the letter-press printer; execute monumental tablets and architectural ornaments; form saw-handles; cut names and sign-boards; or do anything else which requires any sort of shape or impression to be given to the hardest materials, performing that which appears the most difficult, or delicate feat, with as much dispatch, exactness, and finish as the easiest and least pretending. The utility of the machine may be inferred from its applicability in the single department of saw-handles. The saw-handle manufacture of Sheffield alone employs four hundred hands, who make, on an average, fifteen handles each a day, or 36,000 a week, which, at one penny per handle, would return £7,800 per annum. Now, one of the company's machines, managed by a man and a boy, will produce 300 handles a day from one cutter; but, as each machine may have three cutters or more, it is obvious that the entire trade might be supplied by a few machines. It remains only to mention, that the machine is cheap, and may be wrought with ease by any description of power from hand to steam. [Patriot.

A respectable tradesman, with a large family, having sustained a serious loss of property by the failure of some relations for whom he had become security, was asked by a friend (after he had pulled through his liabilities) what means he had adopted to surmount difficulties which would have crushed the spirit and and damped the energies of ninety-nine out of a hundred. "By two very simple expedients," was the reply; "one was to sell my horse and gig, and the other to buy two new aprons."

Flax Culture.

One thing is certain, whether the Chevalier Claussen's Cotton machine is a humbug or not, flax is a good crop, and our farmers have found it out.

In Trumbull County, Ohio, they have increased the cultivation of flax wonderfully within five years. It leaves the ground in a good state for wheat, the seed is always a cash article, and the straw or stalk is generally worth $5 or $6 per tun even now.

The Claussen process, if successful, makes the straw worth $8 to $10 per tun. His works are now in operation at Stepney, in England.

The English consume the flax grown on 700,000 acres of ground, but they raise in Great Britian only 150,000 acres. The English sow 2½ bushels to the acre, and obtain 20¼ bushels to the acre.

They raise the same crop on the same ground every year in succession, by their system of high farming.

A farmer in Preble County, Ohio, raised 22½ bushels to the acre, and our soil generally, with the attention and expense bestowed upon it in England, will produce more to the acre.

We do not intimate that the Chevalier Claussen's patent is not what he expects of it: we know nothing about its practical operation; but if he can, as he says, clean it for $12 per tun, the results to the United States will be immense. [Cleveland Herald.

Action Essential to Happiness.—It is said of Count de Caylus, a wealthy French nobleman, that he devoted himself to the art of engraving, and acquired no mean degree of skill therein. 'Why,' inquired one of his noble friends one day, 'do you, a gentleman of so princely a fortune and of such noble blood, confine yourself like a poor artist to the graver's tool and bench?'

'I engrave that I may not hang myself,' replied the industrious Count.

This odd reply, says Zion's Herald, contains a great practical truth. It teaches that action is essential to happiness; that a man without some regular, congenial employment, is a pray for ennui, despondency, despair to feed upon and destroy. Here is an important lesson for the young.

VARIETY.

Many years ago there graduated at Harvard University a man by the name of Rawson, who settled in the ministy at Yarmouth, on Cape Cod. He used to preach very pointed sermons. Having heard that some of his parishioners were in the habit of making him the subject of their mirth at a grog-shop, he one Sabbath preached a discourse from the text—"And I was the song of the drunkard." His remarks were of a moving character, as many of his hearers rose and left the house. A short time afterwards he delivered a discourse still more pointed: "And they being convicted by their own consciences, went out one by one." On this occasion, no one ventured to retire from the assembly, but the guilty ones listened in silence to the lash of their pastor.

It is said of the Marquis of Townsend, that when young, and engaged in battle, he saw a drummer at his side killed by a cannon ball, which scattered his brains in every direction. His eyes were at once fixed on the ghastly object, which seemed to engross his thoughts. A superior officer observing him, supposed he was intimidated at the sight, and adressed him in a manner to cheer his spirits. 'Oh,' said the young Marquis, with calmness but severity, 'I am not frightened—I am puzzled to make out how any man with such a quantity of brains ever came to be here.'

We learn from the Scientific American that instantaneous portraits can now be taken on collodion by a very ingenious French invention. The person whose portrait is to be taken is placed at some distance off, in front of the lens, and the operator, while conversing with him, pulls a trigger. By so doing a newly invented cap (obturateur) turns on its own axis, and in its rotary movement allows the light and the image of the sitter to pass through a hole twice the diameter of the lens. The portrait is obtained in the fraction of a second, and for quickness can only be compared to electricity.

Mr. Webster's personal appearance or exterior was such, his presence so majestic and dignified, that probably no one ever looked at him without being struck (if one may so speak) with the impressive grandeur of his aspect—so remarkably in unison with the gigantic intellect of the man. When he was in England, thirteen years since, the people of all classes, as they looked upon his majestic form, seemed to regard him altogether as a man the most god-like and wonderful in his mien they had ever set their eyes upon. "Heavens!" exclaimed Sidney Smith, "why, he looks like a small cathedral!"

The habit of eating fast and carelessly is supposed to have paralyzed Napoleon on two of the most critical occasions of his life—the battles of Borodino and Leipsic. On each of those occasions he is known to have been suffering from indigestion. On the third day at Dresden, too, (as the German novelist, Hoffman, who was in the town, asserts,) the Emperor's energies were impaired by the effects of a shoulder of mutton stuffed with onions. There can be no doubt that Napoleon's irregularity as to meals injured his health and shortened his life.

A singular and fatal accident occurred on the Railroad between Utica and Syracuse last Sunday morning. The boiler of the locomotive Achilles exploded, instantly killing Israel Morgan, the engineer, and seriously injuring William Canton, the fireman.

The name "Jerusalem Artichoke," arises from a corruption of the Italian words "Girasolo Articiocco," signifying sun-flower artichoke.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells, so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also, which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. TIME OF COMMENCING THE SABBATH.

Synopsis of a Lecture delivered before the Bible Class of the Shiloh Church.

In our endeavors to propagate the truth of the Bible Sabbath, and extend the kingdom of our Saviour, any important discrepancy of views and practices among us, is greatly detrimental to the progress of our cause. Our opponents, instead of regarding our church as a "city compactly built together," and us as a people firmly united in brotherly love, meet our advances with these reproaches: "Why do you entreat us to embrace your views, when you cannot agree among yourselves in the time of observing the Seventh-day Sabbath? In accordance with your own sentiments, one or the other portion of your people must be in error, as much as you consider that we are. Be consistent yourselves before you labor with us."

It is lamentable, that wholesome discipline, enforcing the true observance of the Sabbath, is greatly lost upon the young and vacillating portion of our society, while they see the professed Sabbath-keepers at variance in their practices of commencing and ending the Sabbath, a part of them engaged in sacred worship, when the other is employed in secular labor. Induced by this, there exists also among us a deplorable want of unity in action and sympathy in the religious and reformatory enterprises of the church of God. This error is a cancer in our vitals, not only debilitating our energy and resources, but fearfully consuming our spiritual existence. Who does not believe, that were we as a denomination completely united in our opinions and efforts, and wholly consecrated to the service of our Redeemer, with Divine assistance, we should become a mighty and irresistible host, marshaled in the defense and propagation of truth?

In the investigation of this subject, we shall confine ourselves principally to the teachings of the Bible; yet no one will oppose the use of all collateral evidence, adduced from accredited history, and the opinions of those scholars whose extensive learning entitle them to the highest respect. Should any one deny us this privilege, he will throw himself into the dilemma of attempting vainly to prove from the internal evidence of the Bible, aside from all external testimony, that it contains truly the revealed will of God. May the Holy Spirit bless us with that sagacity, which will seize upon the whole truth, and fill our hearts with that love for his law, which will constrain us to adopt all its dictates.

I. The length of a natural day is twenty-four hours. It consists in the whole time or period of one revolution of the earth on its axis. The civil day, in both ancient and modern times, as far as we are informed, has always been measured by a diurnal revolution of the earth. But the length of an artificial day is the space of time between the rising and setting of the sun. These points are so universally acknowledged to be true, that there is no necessity of citing proof. The Bible contains both uses of the term day.

1. Gen. 1: 5—"The light he called day," "And the evening and morning were the first day." The former comprises the artificial, the latter the natural day. But it should be observed, that in the original, the term for day occurs but once, and then is applied to light; and that the expression for the latter paragraph, and the five others similar to it, is, "Evening and morning, one," "Evening and morning, second," &c.; that is, the first evening and morning constituted the first period of measured time, what we call a day; and thus with the second, and the others. In this order the seventh must embrace evening and morning. Now, because we have in our language no two words to express the difference between the natural and artificial day, some have been led to believe that the "evening and morning, first," only occupied the day-time; and therefore virtually advocate the absurdity, that night is not reckoned in time. Let it be noticed here, that in the ancient usage of language, particularly in the Hebrew, as the best scholars inform us, the beginning is often employed for the whole, as in this case—the evening for the night, and the morning for the day-time. This becomes evident, as it requires a night and day for the earth to perform one complete revolution on its axis—to form a natural day.

2. The artificial day is alluded to in John 11: 9—"Are there not twelve hours in a day;" in John 9: 4—"I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day."

3. In proof that night was reckoned with day-time, to constitute a civil or natural day, see Ex. 12: 41, 42, and Deut. 16: 6. The Israelites departed from Egypt in the night, yet it is often called the "day when thou camest forth out of the land of Egypt." That the night comprised a part of a natural day, in the time of our Saviour, may be inferred from his conversation with Peter, on the night of his betrayal, when he told him, "This day, even this night," &c. Also, consult Mark 15: 42—"And now, when the even was come, because it was the preparation, that is, the day before the Sabbath," &c.

Thus we arrive at the conclusion, that the term day, as used in the Bible, unless so described as plainly to signify the artificial day, or some great period of time, embraces twenty-four hours.

II. The natural day of the Bible commences at sunset. In this proposition lies principally the subject of controversy between us. We shall endeavor to prove that God's reckoning of a day, as indicated in his Holy Book, embraces the night before the day-time. Different nations commence their civil day at different times. Webster says, "The Babylonians began their day at sunrising; the Jews at sunsetting; the Egyptians at midnight; as do several modern nations, the British, French, Spanish, Americans," &c. The Bible Dictionary informs us, that "the Jewish day was reckoned from evening to evening. Their Sabbath, or seventh, began on what we call Friday, at sunset, and ended on what we call Saturday, at sunset." It is not known that the views of any theologian or biblical scholar can be adduced, which contradict either of the propositions, that the natural day of the Bible is twenty-four hours long, or that it commences at sunset.

But let us introduce the evidence found in the Bible on this subject.

1. Night preceded day-time in the order of creation. In the account of the beginning of creation, darkness is declared to be primarily upon the face of the deep, after which light is introduced and separated from the darkness; and this succession of darkness and light, night and day, evening and morning, was the first day. Two views are held in opposition to this interpretation. First, it is maintained that the dawning of light was the first thing God created; hence, that time began at that moment; and if we reckon the darkness which was previous to that light, and must have been of unlimited duration, with the first day, we shall be including eternity with time. Is this so? We are informed, in Job 38: 9, Ps. 104: 20, Is. 45: 7, that God created darkness; and therefore light could not have been the first object created. If it be affirmed that this primitive darkness occupied an unmeasured portion of eternity, can not the light which followed also as consistently be proved to have occupied an unmeasured duration of eternity? Not until the fourth day did the sun and moon appear in the heavens, "to divide the day from the night," and "for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and years." But the more probable opinion is, that the day-time was twelve hours long; and hence, by analogy, we should be led to believe that the first night was only as long. Second, some asssume, that there can be no evening until there has been light, and consequently the evening mentioned in Gen. 1: 5, must have followed the light of the day, and the order of succession should be changed from evening and morning to morning and evening. The reconciliation of this view with the scripture account, must lie between them and their God. For through his inspired penman, he has definitely told us, that darkness was first, and light succeeded it, and that evening and morning, equivalent to night and day, were the first day. Whether God, after he had launched this world out into space, clothed it in dark and dense clouds, hiding it from the light of heaven, and caused alternate darkness and light to appear from the action of the elements in their efforts of combination, until the fourth day, when the firmament was sufficiently cleared of mist and clouds, so that the sun could shine upon the earth, is a theory not at all at variance with the Mosaic account of creation.

2. But in conformity to this order, many passages may be cited, where the succession, in alluding to a day, is evening and morning, to reverse some of which would make absolute nonsense. Consult Ex. 12: 6—10, Lev. 7: 15, Num. 9: 11, 12, &c. By adhering to this interpretation, the narrative would read, that the remains of the sacrifices were destroyed in the morning, while the preparations for them were not made until the evening following.

3. Let us notice those passages which embrace a day from sunset to sunset. God commanded the Israelites to observe their Passover Sabbath from the evening of the fourteenth day of the first mouth, "until the one and twentieth day of the first month at even." Ex. 12: 18. No chance has been left for any one to doubt when the evening began, for we find in Deut. 16: 6, the instruction is, "There thou shalt sacrifice the passover at even, at the going down of the sun." In the time of our Saviour, the Passover Sabbath began at evening. Proved by Mark 15: 42, 43, and John 19: 31. The body of our Saviour was taken down on the evening of the day of his crucifixion, and not permitted "to remain upon the cross on the Sabbath, for that Sabbath was an high day;" as it was not lawful for the bodies of criminals or malefactors to hang upon the cross during the Sabbath, nor "remain all night upon the tree, but thou shalt in any wise bury him that day." See Deut. 21: 22, 23, and Joshua 8: 29, and 10: 26, 27.

4. We are farther confirmed in this belief, that the Bible account of a natural day includes the night before the day, by the practices of the Jews, "who had the best opportunity of knowing the mind of God in this matter, through Moses and the other succeeding prophets, and who began both their common and sacred days with the evening."

III. The Bible Sabbath is from evening to evening. The only opportunity left for cavil, in the minds of our brethren opposing these views, is that the Sabbath is twelve instead of twenty-four hours long. Let us see how this agrees with facts.

1. "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." Ex. 20: 10. What is the Seventh day? Does it not always imply the seventh of a succession of natural days, in all common parlance, and in all profane or sacred history? If, as we have tried to prove, the six days of creation were each a natural day, was not also the seventh, and therefore the Sabbath, being twenty-four hours long, from evening to evening? This fact is conclusive of itself, yet let us notice how the subsequent allusions to the Sabbath agree with this.

2. For forty years the Jews were weekly taught when the Sabbath commenced and ended, by the falling of the manna. Ex. 16: 4. 5, and 14, 15, 21. This manna, which fell in the evening with the dew, made not its appearance on the morning of the Sabbath, hence had not fallen in the evening previous; but it must have fallen in the evening after the Sabbath, as we infer from the command, "Six days ye shall gather it," that they found it on first day morning."

3. The Festival Sabbaths were instituted in the Jewish worship, as commemorative of some important event, as the weekly Sabbath is commemorative of the creation. Like the original Sabbath, they became seasons of holy convocation, and were observed with the same regulations as the weekly Sabbath, in regard to their commencement and close. For, had they not, there would have been confusion in the times of observing their Sabbaths, and they would not have imitated the original Sabbath in the manner of observance. Of the Sabbath of Atonement, which must be kept as strictly as the weekly Sabbath, the Jews were commanded, in Lev. 23: 32, "at even, from even unto even, shall ye celebrate your Sabbath."

4. The Sabbath from evening to evening was observed by the Jewish Rulers. Neh. 13: 16—19. The gates of Jerusalem were closed "as it began to be dark," to keep out the fish-sellers and persons bearing burdens into the city during the Sabbath.

5. The "thus saith the Lord" is demand. Ez. 46: 1, 2—"Thus saith the Lord God, The gate of the inner court, that looketh toward the east, shall be shut the six working days; but on the Sabbath it shall be opened," "but the gate shall not be shut until the evening." We are here plainly taught, that the Sabbath closes at evening, and that the working days begin at that time.

6. The Sabbath, while our Saviour was upon the earth, closed at sunset. Mark 1: 21—32, and Luke 4: 40. "And at even, when the sun did set, they brought unto him all that were diseased," &c. It will be remembered, that our Saviour, "on the Sabbath day, entered into the synagogue, and taught,"... and that he rebuked "a man with an unclean spirit," and it came out of him. On the same day, the common people, out of fear of the rulers of the synagogue, did not bring those sick with divers diseases to be healed, but waited till evening, when the Sabbath had closed.

7. But it is universally admitted, that the Jews have ever, in observing the seventh day as the Sabbath, regarded the night before the day as much sacred time as the day-time following. Yet some depreciate this evidence, on the plea that they were as a people sometimes much estranged from the love of God, and therefore might have changed or lost the time for observing his statutes. If any confidence can be placed in this plea, then our Bible has passed through too dangerous hands to be trusted. But we fear not, for Israel has always included true men, who feared God, and walked faith fully in his commandments; and God would not have permitted his chosen people to have committed so great an error as to change the time of observing the Sabbath, especially when "to them were committed the oracles of God."

Thus far have we pursued our argument, and fervently hope that we have not been unsuccessful in clearly and candidly presenting the reasons for our faith, that the Bible Sabbath is from evening to evening of the seventh day.

Two passages are quoted, which are thought to militate against this view of the Sabbath. First, Matt. 28: 1—"At the close of the Sabbath, as is began to draw toward the first day of the week," &c. It will be sufficient to notice, that this passage is incorrectly translated. The original, Opse de Sabbaton, signifies, "After the Sabbath," as nearly all commentators are agreed, and as some versions express it. Moreover, the particle opse has the peculiar signification, which conveys the idea of not immediately after, but some time after, late after, as may be seen by reference to any Greek Lexicon, or to those authors by whom it is used. Second, John 20: 19—"Then the same day at evening," which was the first after the resurrection of our Saviour, he appeared in the midst of the disciples, where they were assembled for fear of the Jews." Now, knowing as we do, that the Jews never reckoned the evening or the night after the day-time with their civil or sacred days, we must reconcile this supposed discrepancy, as all commentators do, as we have ascertained, by referring it to the first evening, which is believed to have commenced at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and closed at the beginning of the second, which was at the "going down of the sun." For both uses of the term evening, see Matt. 14: 15—23. "And when it was evening, his disciples came to him," &c. Mark says, "And when the day was now far spent, his disciples came unto him," &c. Luke "And when the day began to wear away," &c. By these passages we see that evening here includes the after part of the day-time. But after he had fed the multitude, and constrained the disciples to depart in a ship, "and when he had sent the multitude away, he went up into a mountain apart to pray; and when evening was come, he was there alone." This evidently means the second evening.

Other valuable considerations might be presented in favor of keeping the night before the day. By laying aside all labor Sixth-day, at sunset, we prepare ourselves, during the evening, by rest and sacred contemplation, to enjoy better the exercises of the "holy convocation" of the Sabbath. Our Saviour was a Jew, and therefore must have observed the Sabbath at the same time that the other Jews did, or he would have been reprimanded by the haughty Pharisees, or the rulers of the synagogues.

SUMMER.

The following lines are above all praise. They are surpassingly beautiful:

The spring of life is past,
With its budding hopes and tears,
And the autumn time is coming,
With its weight of weary years—
Our joyousness is fading,
Our hearts are dimmed with care,
And youth's fresh dreams of gladness
All perish darkly there.

While bliss was blooming near us,
In the heart's first burst of spring,
While many hopes could cheer us,
Life seemed a glorious thing!
Like the foam upon a river,
When the breeze goes rippling o'er,
These hopes have fled forever
To come to us no more!

'T is sad—yet sweet—to listen
To the soft wind's gentle swell,
And think we hear the music
Our childhood knew so well:
To gaze out on the even,
And the boundless fields of air,
And feel again our boyhood's wish
To roam, like angels, there!

There are many dreams of gladness
That cling around the past—
And from that tomb of feeling
Old thoughts come thronging fast—
The forms we loved so dearly
In the happy days now gone,
The beautiful and lovely,
So fair to look upon.

And yet—the thought is saddening
To muse on such as they—
And feel that all the beautiful
Are passing fast away!
For we know that winter s coming,
With his cold and stormy sky—
And the glorious beauty round us
Is budding but to die!

BOARDMAN'S MOTHER.

It was the happy lot of the writer, a short time since, to spend a few hours at the residence of Mrs. Boardman. I trust that by penning down some of the recollections of that brief call, it may serve to awaken in the minds of your readers some of the interest that I myself felt, and also start in their minds a profitable train of reflection.

If I recollect right, she spent her youthful days in the State of Connecticut; but early in life, with her husband, removed to Livermore, Me. She was reared under the preaching and instruction of the Old School Congregationalists. The great evangelical truths of the gospel, such as regeneration, repentance, and faith, were to her unknown. After she had resided in Livermore a time, she learned that a sect termed "New Lights" held meetings in that vicinity, which, among the inhabitants, were the source of much interest and discussion. She, with her husband, more from curiosity than any other motive, determined to attend. During the evening, a lady with whom she had been formerly acquainted arose and related to the audience the state of her feelings. Mrs. Boardman was interested and surprised; she felt that she never had nor did now possess such feelings, and if this was religion, she surely had it not. She continued her attendance, and became more and more interested, until both she and her companion were convinced that the doctrine they there heard was much in accordance with the teachings of primitive Christianity; and more, each felt that they had become personal participants in the Spirit's regenerating power, had repented and believed, and were brought from nature's darkness into the more perfect light and love of the glorious gospel. Mr. Boardman for a time improved his gifts among his brethren, but afterwards was "set apart" as a preacher of the gospel of the Baptist persuasion. After preaching a time amongst those who first called him to the work, he removed to New Sharon. Here Mr. and Mrs. Boardman lived and labored. Here a prosperous church under their faithful labors was built up, which, we are grieved to say, since his death (some fifteen years) has sadly declined, though yet in existence. Here was reared the frail, but faithful, successful, and lamented missionary to the Karens, George Dana Boardman.

Mrs. Boardman is now eighty-four years of age. Although we had been informed that the vigor of her body and mind had been much impaired, as the effect of a severe injury she had received from a fall some two years since, yet we found her remarkably vigorous and energetic, considering her late injury and advanced age. I shall never forget how her eye sparkled, and her countenance glowed with renewed animation, as the name of her son was mentioned. She told me of his early desires for an education; the difficulties he manfully overcame in securing a collegiate course of instruction; her feelings when she learned, and her method of learning the fact that he had earnest desires to engage in the missionary work. The relation of the circumstances connected with the ascertaining of these desires, was deeply interesting to my own mind. After his conversion, which took place during his stay in college, his mother thought much on what would be his future course in life. She thought of the profession of teaching, of the Christian ministry; and and though the subject had been but little time discussed of the missionary work, she thought of the latter more than all, though she had passed not a word with her son, respecting the calling he should pursue.

On one occasion, having nearly finished his course of study, his mother took him to a lonely spot, and questioned him in respect to what were his intentions in the future.

"I have been offered," remarked he, "a tutorship in college."

"That will suit you finely," said the interested mother.

"But I think I shall not accept it," was the heroic reply.

"You will then enter the ministry," continued the mother, with still deeper feeling.

"I think not," was the calm response.

"Ah, then you are going to be a missionary, are you, George?"

"Why, mother, what made you think of that? You have saved me the painful duty of mentioning the subject first. I have thought of becoming a missionary."

How remarkable, thought we, are the leadings of Providence! The same Spirit that was impressing the mind of Boardman with the idea of becoming a missionary, was drawing his fond parent to a state of willingness to give him up to that service.

Mrs. Boardman cherishes, with fondest recollection and deepest interest, any mementoes of him who lies buried in a far distant land. Among these, one is held peculiarly sacred. It is some leaves gathered by the hand of her grandson (now a student at Newton) on the spot where the turf was removed to sink the grave where now moulder his last remains. But his name is not only embalmed in a fond mother's affection, but is cherished in the bosom of the Christian church, and become a household word among numbers of increasing Karen converts.

We took leave with the saddened thought, that the mothers in Israel are passing away, and instituting the inquiry, Who will fill their places? [N. Y. Recorder.

INTERESTING INCIDENT.

On a beautiful Sunday morning, Zion's pilgrims were wending their way to the sanctuary of God. The gathering multitude had filled the spacious temple, where a number of willing converts were about to follow their despised Lord through the liquid grave. In order to obtain a better seat for beholding the beautiful ordinance, M. had secured a place in the gallery. The pastor had opened the service, as usual, with a hymn of praise; the Scriptures were read, and prayer was offered. While reading the second hymn, the pastor felt the ill effects of a previous cold; an increasing hoarseness rendered it impossible for him to deliver the sermon. Under those trying circumstances, he spied a brother minister in the house. A deacon was requested to invite the brother into the desk. Upon entering the pulpit, he was told by the pastor that he must preach. There was no time for preparation; the last verse of the hymn was being sung. The perplexity of the brother was increased by the fact that, although a text came into his mind, he could not at that moment turn to it. In that confused state, he arose and told the audience that his text he could repeat, but he could not tell them where to find it. The novelty of the circumstance interested the mind of M.; she listened attentively, while he repeated as follows: "There remaineth a rest for the people of God." The words sank as lead into her heart; she felt in her inmost soul that she did not possess that rest. After a sleepless night, she sent for the brother from whose lips the words proceeded. After he had conversed with her, he left for her perusal a book entitled, "Come and Wel come," written by Bunyan. The title encouraged her to go to the Saviour; she found peace in him, was baptized, and united with the church. She then knew by experience the meaning of the passage which reads thus: "We which have believed do enter into rest."

MEMORY AND ITS CAPRICES.

There is no faculty so inexplicable as memory. It is not merely that its powers vary so much in different individuals, but that every one has found their own liable to the most unaccountable changes and chances.

It is not uncommon to find the memory retentive on some subjects, yet extremely defective on others. The remarkable powers of some are limited to dates and names. A lady with whom we were acquainted could tell the number of stairs contained on each flight in the houses of all her acquaintance, but her memory was not particularly retentive in any thing else. In the notice of the death of Miss Addison, daughter of the celebrated Addison, which took place in 1797, it is stated, that "she inherited her father's memory, but none of the discriminating powers of his understanding; with the retentive faculties of Jedediah Buxton, she was a perfect imbecile. She could go on in any part of her father's works, and repeat the whole, but was incapable of speaking or writing an intelligible sentence."

Cases of occasional forgetfulness on matters of interest to the mind are among the strange caprices of memory. When Dr. Priestley was preparing the dissertation prefixed to his "Harmony of the Gospel," he had taken great pains to inform himself on the subject which had been under discussion, relative to the Jewish Passover. He transcribed the result of his researches, and laid the paper aside. His attention being called to something else, a fortnight elapsed before the subject again occurred to his mind. The same pains were taken which he had bestowed on it before. The fruits of his labor were again written out. So completely had he forgotten that he had before copied out exactly the same paragraphs and reflections, that it was only when he found the papers on which he had transcribed them that it was recalled to his recollection. At times he has read his own published writings without recognizing them.

John Hunter's memory once failed him. When he was in the house of a friend, he totally forgot where he was, in whose house, in what room, or in what street, or where he lived himself. He was conscious of this failure, and tried to restore his recollection by looking out of the window to ascertain where he was, but to no purpose.

By a fall from his horse, a gentleman, who was an admirable scholar, received a severe hurt on the head. He recovered, but his learning was gone, and he had actually to commence his education again by the very first step, the learning of the alphabet. A less unfortunate scholar, meeting with a similar accident, lost none of his acquirements but his Greek; but it was irrevocably lost. A strange caprice of memory is recorded in the case of Dr. Broussannet. An accident which befel him brought on an attack of apoplexy. When he recovered, he had utterly lost the power of pronouncing or writing proper names, or any substantive, while his memory supplied adjectives in profusion, by the application of which he distinguished whatever he wished to mention. In speaking of any one, he would designate him by calling him after the shape or color for which he was remarkable. If his hair was red, he would called him "red;" if above the usual height, he named him "tall;" if he wanted his hat, he asked for his "black;" if his "blue" or "brown" was required, it was a coat of the color that he called for.

ANECDOTE OF DR. BALDWIN.

An aged gentleman, who well knew the late Dr. Baldwin, of Canaan, N. H., a short time since related to us an anecdote which is worth recording. During his ministry at Canaan, on a certain year, there was such a failure of the crop in the town, that the inhabitants were obliged to go to the neighboring towns for a supply. A benevolent individual in Enfield, a short distance from Canaan, had a large quantity on hand, which he resolved to sell to the poor, who had no horses, and therefore could not well go so far as Lebanon, where there was an abundance, which those who had horses could easily obtain. One of the most thrifty inhabitants of Canaan went on his horse and applied for corn, which, for the reason stated, was firmly refused. Reterning home in high exasperation, he passed Elder Baldwin, employed on the roadside at his secular vocation as a carpenter. Reining up and addressing the Elder, he declared that he wished he was a devil, that he might have the pleasure of tormenting in hell the man who refused to sell him the corn. "Stop! stop!" exclaimed the Elder, "you only want the right kind of foot to be one already;" and, brandishing his broad-axe, added, "Put it up here on the block, and I will make you one in a minute"—a cloven one. The man spurred up his horse without replying, and was out of sight as soon as possible. [Cong. Jour.

BISHOP ROBERTS AND THE LAWYER.

Bishop Roberts was a man of great sweetness of disposition, perfectly child-like and simple in his manners. You felt very soon that you could approach him as a father. He had no affected stateliness of manner, but looked for all the world like some plain, respectable farmer. This was, perhaps, one cause of the many curious and sometimes laughable incidents in his history, in which his person and character were entirely mistaken. We give one of these incidents as reported to us. Bishop Roberts was in a steamer, on the Mississippi river, and was sitting off by himself, on the hurricane deck, when a gentleman, an eminent lawyer, residing in the south-west, approached him and entered into conversation with him. Supposing from his appearance that he was a religious man, he began to converse with him in reference to a number of preachers with whom the lawyer was acquainted, with several of whom the old gentleman seemed to be acquainted; finally, the lawyer concluded to question him in reference to the Bishops. "Sir," said he, "I have heard Bishop Soule of the Methodist church, and think him a very able man; do you know him?"

"Yes," said the old man, "I have known him a good many years, and agree with you fully as to his talents as a preacher."

"Then," said the lawyer, "there is a small man who visited our town some time since, I think they called him Dr. Emory; I did not hear him, but heard him highly spoken of as a preacher."

Here, again, his old friend knew the little Dr., and endorsed all the good that had been said of him. "And," continued the lawyer, "there was another, an old man, who preached not long since in our place; I think they called him Bishop Roberts; they say he is a most excellent man, but no great preacher; do you know him?'

"Yes," said the old gentleman, "I have been acquainted with him for a good many years; I believe the old man is honest, and tries to do the best he can, but he's not much of a preacher."

Shortly after, the lawyer descended to the cabin, and going up to his wife, "My dear," said he, "I have just had a long talk with a very interesting old gentleman on deck; I think he must be a Methodist preacher."

"Why, husband," said she, "don't you know that old gentleman?—that is Bishop Roberts, and he baptized me!"

"O," said the lawyer, (who was reported to be a very modest man,) "I'm ruined."

He hastened back to his old friend on deck. "Sir," said he, "I owe you an apology for my rudeness; my wife says you are Bishop Roberts;" and he went on to apologize, but the good old man seemed to enjoy the joke finely; told him no apology was needed, and to the last insisted that he believed Bishop Roberts was an honest, good meaning man, but could not preach much. HARD TO PLEASE.

An agent of the society in one of our States, recently formed an auxiliary, and with the committee began to collect funds. They called on a religious professor who had much money, but did not like to part with it. He told one of the collectors to "look out for that agent, and not pay him money; he would no doubt run off with it; they would never hear from him again." The agent received some forty dollars from the society, and promised to forward the amount in books from New York.

In the course of three weeks the books came on, all in good order. The cautious prophet was called in to see them and the failure of his prediction. As he was beaten here, he next attacked the society for making such extravagant books for the poor. Holding in his hand an embossed duodecimo, "See," says he, "what a costly book this is to give away; why could they not make a plain, cheap one?" He was asked what he supposed the price to be. He said, "It must have cost a dollar, if not, a dollar and a quarter—a waste of money!" He was told that the price was but twenty-five cents, the cost price. "Now," says he, "I know there is something wrong in this business; it never was made for that money, and there must be cheating somewhere." So he would not be convinced, and kept his money. THE ORDER OF PUBLIC WORSHIP.

We do not think that a scrupulous adherence to forms is a necessary part of our religion, but for decency's sake, and that our worship may have somewhat of that reverential character which is due from those who gather themselves before the great and terrible God, some generally understood order should be observed.

In itself, it is a matter of very little importance whether the exercises are begun with singing, or with prayer, or with reading the Scriptures. That God's Word ought always to be read at some point of the exercises, is not to be disputed; for the principal object of coming together is to "hear what God the Lord will speak." Indeed, we should feel that a meeting on the Sabbath, or even a common prayer-meeting, lacked one very important requisite, if a portion of Scripture were not read. The sermons of men are not always profitable, but God's words always do good to them that walk uprightly. Mic. 2 : 7.

Some ministers are very particular to read a chapter at the beginning of the meeting; and were it not that there is almost always a set of irreverent creatures loitering about the door, who never enter the sanctuary till they can hear some sounds indicating that the exercises are actually begun, we should approve of this plan. But we do feel some scrupulousness of making the Word of God like the tinkling of a bell—a mere signal to gather the congregation together. The opening of doors just as the minister begins to read, the rushing in of a dozen or more people, their heavy tread as they walk through the aisles, and the unavoidable noise they make in reaching their seats, are a species of irreverence which we long to see corrected. But the evil exists; and, notwithstanding all that can be said against it, we fear it will continue to exist. On this account, we always prefer to introduce public worship with a hymn. By the time that is sung, silence is generally obtained, so that the Word of God may be read without disturbance.

There was a beautiful custom which obtained among the Jews of the Restoration, and which we have often wished to see introduced in Christian churches. It was that of standing up when the Book of the Law was read. "And Ezra opened the book in the sight of all the people; and when he opened it, ALL THE PEOPLE STOOD UP." Neh. 8 : 5. There is something so appropriate, so reverential, in this attitude, that we could wish it were more generally assumed when God's Word is read. We sometimes stand up to sing; but, of the two, we think it much more seemly to stand when the message of God is announced to us. When the assassin of Eglon said to him, "I have a message from God unto thee," Eglon, though a king, rose up from his seat to hear it. Judges 3: 20. When the Sovereign of England addresses Parliament with a speech, the Lords and Commons, and all the hearers, stand: and generally, when sovereigns address their subjects, a standing posture is considered a necessary mark of respect. Shall mortals have less reverence for the King of kings?

But the custom which, least of all, enlists our favor, is the lazy one of sitting in time of prayer. The unpleasant sensations which took possession of us the first time we ever witnessed the custom, and which remained with us during the time spent in the exercise, to the almost utter annihilation of every good feeling, are still vividly present to our mind. We have become inured to it, in a measure, and can tolerate it, very well, provided a reverential bowing of the head gives token of something like a worshiping spirit on the part of the people. But how often there is an entire lack of this accompaniment! The minister rising to lead the assembly in prayer, sees one of his leading members braced back in the corner of his pew, with one arm thrown over the back of it, and the other across the pew door, his head thrown back, and his whole position indicating a sovereign regard for his own ease; and though the words 'Let us pray,' are an invitation to the whole audience to join in the devotions, not a hair's breadth does he move. The same lazy, lounging, irreverent posture, is maintained to the end; and as soon as the minister says 'Amen,' and opens his eyes, there sits his leading brother, propped, braced and supported, as at the beginning. Yes, not only the leading brother, but dozens of others in the same careless posture. Inwardly sighing, the minister resumes his seat, and says within himself, How can I preach to this people? I have been asking God's blessing on the exercises; I have been imploring him to render the word powerful to my hearers this day; I thought my people united with me in the request; but lo! they appear more as if they had been sleeping than praying. I cannot preach; I have no heart to do it, when it is so evident that my people care not whether any good is done or no? Then, struggling with his feeling, he rises again, takes his text, and does as well as he can under the chilling circumstances. This is no fancy sketch; every minister knows it to be the truth.

We have no doubt that the most suitable posture for sinners, when seeking the mercy of God, is that of kneeling. It is the posture which above all others has the sanction of Scripture, and we wish it could be universally adopted. But whether it be or not, we do most solemnly protest against that irreverence of manner exhibited by those who refuse even the slightest inclination of the head in time of prayer. "The people BOWED THE HEAD, and worshiped." Exod. 12 : 27. See also 1 Chron. 29: 20, Neh. 8 : 6, Gen. 24 : 26.

A word or two about singing. O how delightfully solemn is this branch of public worship, when performed as it ought to be! Our God is "fearful in praises." The choirs of most of our churches, however, manage their trust as if the principal object was to get praise for themselves as good skillful performers. To praise God would seem to be the least part of their design. Hence, they are perpetually introducing new tunes, rendering it impossible for the congregation to join in the exercise, and thus defeating one principal design of it. The organ, too, if there is one, must interlude every verse with scraps of horrid symphony, enough to make one forget, for the time, that it is the house of God; and when all is over, and the benediction has been pronounced, immediately comes such a deluge of sounds—music we will not call it—as sweeps away the last remnants of devotional feeling which the other exercises have inspired. We cannot bring our heart into any unison with such things. We do not object to choirs, nor to organs; nor have we such a partiality for old tunes that we cannot receive anything new; but most sincerely do we object to the too common abuses of such things.

"Rehearse his praise with awe profound;
Let knowledge lead the song;
Nor mock him with a solemn sound,
Upon a thoughtless tongue." T. B. B.

THE SUNDAY IN NEW YORK.

What is popularly called "Sabbath Desecration"—meaning labor or pleasure-seeking on Sunday—is manifestly on the increase in and around New York. The railroad and steamboat lines connecting the city with distant places, have added greatly to the facilities formerly enjoyed for Sunday travel; while the city railroads, which are rapidly taking the place of omnibuses, are all chartered to run on Sunday, and find that the most profitable day of the week. Two years ago the cars of the Harlem Railroad furnished almost the only public conveyance between the lower and upper parts of the city on Sunday; but now we have not only the Harlem Railroad, but the Sixth and Eighth Avenue Railroads, each running all their city cars on Sunday, and are soon to have the great Broadway Railroad, chartered on the same plan. No wonder that the people who assume to be the guardians of what they falsely call "the Sabbath," are alarmed at the prospect before them. We only wish that their alarm might lead them to consider the subject in the light of Scripture, and to base their sabbatic efforts on a scriptural foundation. The Word of God says, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work." But the members of the Christian church generally say that the first day of the week is the Sabbath, and are making no small effort to induce men to rest from labor upon it. All their efforts, however, seem unavailing. Indeed, the more they agitate the subject, the more rapid are the strides of Sunday "desecration." And so it will continue to be, until they adjust their efforts to God's plan, and take a position from which they can enforce their appeals by a "Thus saith the Lord."

—But we took up our pen simply to introduce the proceedings of an organization called "The New York Young Men's Christian Association," which held a special meeting, one evening last week, "for the purpose of considering the claims of the Sabbath, and the means by which its present and prospective fearful desecration may be prevented." After the usual introductory exercises of reading the Scriptures and prayer, the call of the meeting was read by the Secretary, and then Mr. P. Carter presented the following preamble, resolutions, and petition to the Board of Aldermen:—

"The subject of Sabbath-breaking is one which may well awaken anxiety in the breast of every Christian. This great evil, and grievous sin in the sight of God, is increasing at a ratio hitherto unparalleled. 'Sacred Concerts' on the Sabbath evening, (the 'sacred' being added to attract to them those who are not yet so hardened as to seek more open violation of the Lord's day,) Exhibitions, Panoramas, Literary Entertainments, &c., which are now so numerous, were a few years ago unknown in our city. It is but a brief period since the establishment of the first Sunday Newspaper, and now their name is legion, and some of them have a very large circulation. Numerous other modes of Sabbath desecration, such as the sale of liquors and refreshments, might be mentioned, for Satan suits his devices to every taste, but our limits will allow us to mention only one more. We refer to the City Railways, the cars of which are allowed to run on the Sabbath. This new mode of Sabbath-breaking is producing the most fearful results, and seems likely to destroy the sanctity of that blessed day, by turning into a holiday what was intended by its great founder to be a day of rest. Upon the question of the utility of these roads we do not enter, but against their use on the Lord's day, we, as members of the Young Men's Christian Association of this City, feel it our duty to protest. We therefore submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Secretary of this Association be desired respectfully to request the clergymen of the various evangelical denominations of this city to present the subject of the Sabbath, its importance, authority, necessity and sanctity, to their respective congregations, in order to awaken a new interest in it through the whole Christian community; and to further suggest the propriety of setting apart the second Sabbath in January next for this purpose.

Resolved, That we, as a Society, petition the Common Council of this city to prohibit the running of cars on the Sabbath on the [illegible] henceforth to be laid down, and city railroa[illegible] to pass an ordinance prohibiting the same on the roads already constructed.

PETITION TO THE BOARD OF ALDERMEN.

We, the undersigned, members of the Young Men's Christian Association of the City of New York, believing that the running of cars on the Sabbath is a direct violation of the fourth commandment, and tends greatly to a demoralization of the people, would respectfully petition the honorable Common Council to annul that section of the charter of the proposed Broadway Railroad, which allows the Company to run their cars on the Sabbath day. That a section be introduced prohibiting them from doing so.

And they would further respectfully request that a similar ordinance be passed prohibiting all the city railroads now in operation or hereafter to be constructed, from running their cars on the Sabbath."

Mr. Scott moved that the preamble and resolutions be laid on the table. He said, action upon this subject should not be premature; they should discuss the expediency of carrying out this subject, in a proper manner, and therefore he would wish to have a committee appointed, to whom the whole matter should be referred. After considerable discussion, the preamble, resolutions, and petition, were laid upon the table.

Mr. Dyer then offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That a Committee of Seven be appointed by the Chair to take into consideration the subject of the desecration of the Sabbath, and to report at the next meeting.

The following gentlemen were appointed by the Chairman: Mr. Howard Crosby, Chairman of Committee; Messrs. O. P. Woodford, Peter Carter, W. G. West, E. Anthony, H. A. Bogart, H. D. King.

—Since the foregoing was prepared, the following article has appeared in the editorial columns of the N. Y. Tribune, which hints at one of the many grounds of objection to the movement of the "Christian Association."

A Case of Conscience.

The "Young Men's Christian Association" of our city have the following before them for careful consideration:

2. Resolved, That we, as a society, petition the Common Council of this city to prohibit the running of cars on the Sabbath on the city railroads henceforth to be laid down, and to pass an ordinance prohibiting the same on the roads already constructed.

On this resolve we would respectfully offer the following suggestions:

We happen to live (like a great many others) pretty well up town, while the church we prefer to attend is located decidedly down town, so that we have a considerable distance to travel, going thither and returning, every Sunday, and we usually—in fact, almost always—patronize the Harlem cars on these religious journeys. Our neighbors on either side have carriages and horses, as we happen not to have, which they order out every Sunday to accelerate and facilitate their churchward journey. Well; it may be wrong in us to patronize the cars—nay, it is wrong if it is wrong for the cars to run—and we have nothing to say as to the abstract question of stopping their Sunday trips. This, however, we do say, that if it is wrong for these cars to run, and for us to ride in them, then it is clearly as wrong for our neighbors (who are quite as able as we to go afoot) to order up their carriages and go to church therein, at a far greater outlay per head of Sunday labor. If the Common Council meddles with the matter at all, we insist that it shall serve us all alike.

Sunday Sanctification in Glasgow.

GLASGOW, November 19, 1852

A determined effort was made last week to revive the old laws in favor of Sunday sanctification, which probably may issue in a very different result. The statute book of this country, it is well known, contains a series of enactments against Sunday traffic, mingled up with others enforcing attendance at the parish church, and other observances, which it would be impossible at present to enforce. On this account, probably, there has been more reluctance to bring the question of the legality of Sunday traffic to a decision. The evident growth of this is, however, very alarming to those who look upon the loss of the idol as the loss of God, and an attempt was made to bring to bear the obsolete laws for the punishment of the offenders. A person named Jennings, a provision dealer, in Salt Market-st., Glasgow, was summoned before the Police Court for selling bread, butter, snuff, and candles, on the preceding Sunday. He was convicted and sentenced by Baillie Gourlay to be find in a guinea or ten days imprisonment. The dealer resisted payment, and was taken to Bridewell. He, however, brought his case for review before the High Court of Justiciary at Edinburgh, and has been liberated, meanwhile, because of the difficulties of the case. Mr. Deas, Jenning's counsel, urged for him that the Police Court was not one fitted to deal with it. He cited the old acts, reminding the Court that they not only ordained fining but the stocks for absenting from the parish church on Sunday—so that the most respectable person, having been at the Free Church or any other Dissenting Chapel, might yet be dragged before Court. Besides the offense of railway traveling or employing a coachman, a man that bought a loaf or a drop of milk, was equally liable to punishment, and he doubted if even their lordships had not all incurred penalties under these old acts. He was proceeding to show what might be done by zealous individuals or Societies under statutes which had been dormant for a century and a half, when the Lord Justice Clerk, having consulted with the other judges, said it was very inconvenient to be obliged to hear and decide upon questions of so important a character, when brought up for summary judgment, without having time to consider their bearing and effect. The Court, therefore, without expressing an opinion on what had been stated, continued the case, ordering Jennings to be meanwhile set at liberty.

A MISSION SCHOOL

For the Honan Jews and the Chinese.

That a people in the interior of China, and especially Jews, should travel nine hundred miles, and then, in a great city, search out Seventh-day Baptist Missionaries, saying, "Sirs, we would see Jesus," is not only an extraordinary event, but a remarkably affecting incident in the history of modern missions—a precious item of news to be recorded upon the tablets of our future history! Brethren and sisters, let us remember it. Read again the articles in the Recorder of Nov. 25th, relating to the Jews of Honan and the China Mission. It will be well for you to keep posted up in all particulars of the China Mission; and let each proposal of the Board, and the calls from abroad, be remembered by you in your closets, around your family altars, and in the sanctuary. Not long since, Bro. Brown urged upon us the necessity of praying more than we do—praying for more success in the missionary cause. In the Jews of Honan, we have an evidence of the necessity of more prayer and of a more general interest in Missions.

But to come to what is wanted. It seems that Bro. Carpenter needs a school, and that that school must be supported by us. Five or six hundred dollars will supply this demand for the first year, and after that a less sum will do for the school; yet, as we may reasonably expect God's blessing upon the school, and upon a more extended acquaintance with Honan Jews, a further sum will be wanted to send some Chinese or American missionary into that far country.

That our missionaries need a school, both primary and select, must be obvious to every one interested in and acquainted with the work of missions. Mission schools have been too much overlooked by us, as well as by others. Education has, in all ages, been the great means of blessing a people sitting in darkness, and of perpetuating sound doctrine. The work of preaching the Gospel, in my opinion, includes special labor in instructing the youth, and other persons, in a thorough knowledge of God and his works. To deny Bro. Carpenter the means of supporting such a school as he proposes, will be to hinder his usefulness, and discourage his heart.

Although I have no verbal guaranty of aid from my church, yet such is my confidence in their interest in any movement of ours among the Jews, that the subject will in brief be laid before them next Sabbath. If all the pastors will lay the matter before their churches at the earliest opportunity, and keep it before them for a few Sabbaths, I have no doubt that five hundred dollars, as an extra gift, will be sent to our Treasurer.

We have pledged our missionaries that we will sustain them. Their labors have been blessed; they have labored hard; success comes slowly; the heathen and the Jews are moved by the good Spirit of God to go to them, and ask salvation at their hands; they go home, and then return; they perform 2,700 miles of travel for the sake of the education of their children at a Christian school, and a Seventh-day Baptist School at that.

Brethren, I regard the news in Bro. Carpenter's letter as the voice of God, saying, "Go up and possess the land." Let us lend a helping hand. Let us lengthen the cords and strengthen the stakes of the China Mission.

THE CANADA MISSION.

The Board of our Missionary Society have resolved to commence a mission in Lower Canada. The subject of a mission to that country has been considered by them at nearly every quarterly meeting for the last two years. No one acquainted with the men and the facts in the case, will suspect them of a hasty conclusion. They are unanimous in their decision, and feel "that the providence of God calls them to the work."

As I have opportunity, I shall give the readers of the Recorder an account of the field, its wants, incidents, and results of labor, &c., all of which I hope to do in a plain and truthful manner.

The proposed missionary field extends over about five degrees of latitude, and nearly fourteen of longitude, and is chiefly situated in the valley of the St. Lawrence. It has a population of nearly a million inhabitants, who are principally of French origin, speaking the French language, and professing the Roman Catholic religion. Many Indians are found in different sections, who also profess the Roman faith.

The very mention of their religion is sufficient to indicate their need of missionaries. The priests are very active in keeping light from the people; but, in spite of their efforts, and of the prejudices of their parishioners, some are seeking light, inquiring after truth, and thirsting for that religion in which they can find a "hope that is as an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast."

Wherever the Christian missionary goes, he will find enough to do, either in making work, or in attending to that already prepared to his hand. He may expect trials, but he must sow in hope, looking for God's blessing upon his labors. The superstitions and prejudices of the Catholic, should be overcome with that kindness and gentleness which the gospel teaches us to exercise towards those who are in their sins.

But will success attend the mission? Other things being equal, I think it will. Those who go to the work, as well as those who send them, need to exercise strong faith in God. Much prayer should be offered to the Lord of missions, that His "word may have free course and be glorified." If we lack faith, let us pray, "Lord, increase our faith." Why not? What formidable obstacle is there in the way, that has not been overcome by faith and works? Elijah prayed, and was answered from heaven. "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much." Prayer has been offered, and God has answered it. The China Mission has been blessed. Our labors in Hayti were not in vain. A small cluster of grapes has been gathered in Canada, and still there are indications that others are ripening. The work should be followed up, the seed should be sown abundantly, and faith should be exercised in God's promises, for they never fail.

But some have an idea that Catholics are unconvertable. True, there are difficulties, and there will be opposition, stern and trying, but not unconquerable. If met in the name of the Lord of Hosts, they can be overcome. For centuries, Catholics have been coming out of Rome. Some of the most eminent ministers of Christ were once zealous advocates of the Roman Church. Not a year passes without hundreds of conversions among Catholics. And is the truth by which we are distinguished so obnoxious that the Catholic will not receive it at our hands? Away with such incredulity. God is jealous for the universal acknowledgment of His Sabbath, His Law, and His Son; then "be not faithless, but believing."

We must not only pray, but we must use the means. Funds are needed; laborers are wanted; some must give themselves, and some must give of their property; the missionaries must be fed and clothed, and the ignorant taught the way of life. The success of the enterprise depends, in a great measure, upon the manner in which the denomination do their duty. We have resolved upon a great work, and it is highly important that every member of our beloved Zion should have "a mind to work." The Board must have evidence of the cooperation of the people, or they can not go forward. Brethren, suffer the word of exhortation. Now is the time to collect moneys, and send them to our Treasurer. Winter is coming, and will soon be gone. If you delay giving, the work must be delayed. But if a liberal response be made this winter, the Board will then be prepared to carry out their plans the coming spring. "Remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive."

ARRIVAL OF TWO MISSIONARIES IN PALESTINE.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The following extract from a letter received by the father of Philip Dickson, who, with his wife, embarked at Boston for Palestine in July last, announces their safe arrival at Artas. The letter is from Jaffa to the 1st of November.

J. L. BOYD, Agent.

"Our passage from Boston to Smyrna was remarkably mild and pleasant, without a storm or a gale. Such a passage, the Captain, who had followed the seas for seventeen years, said he had never before had, or ever expected to have again. During the eight weeks' passage to Smyrna, they reefed not one sail until they cast anchor in its harbor. There we remained, boarding in the ship, some twelve days, until we re-shipped on board a French steamer, and in ten days more we landed at Jaffa. From thence, on the third day from landing, we reached the Holy City, treading upon the Lord's holy ground. There we remained one night. The next day, at three o'clock P. M., we started for Bethlehem and Artas; but our guide not being very familiar with the way, we lost it when we were not more than a few minutes ride from Artas. Darkness came on, and we were compelled to return to the town of Bethlehem, and stop over night. The next morning we took an early start, and were soon in the midst of that beloved band already there, who received us with outspread arms and warm hearts. They were expecting us, as they had been apprised by their agent in Philadelphia, (J. L. Boyd.) Sister Minor had also written to the the American (Arab) Consul at Jaffa, in relation to us. We have made arrangements with the brethren and Meshullam to stop in their family until Spring."

LOUIS NAPOLEON AND THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.—The following paragraph from the Catholic Standard, a paper published in London, shows the estimation in which Louis Napoleon's services are held by members of the Catholic Church:—

"France is the protectress of the rights and liberties of the Catholic Church in the East; and it is the glory of Louis Napoleon that he has shown more zeal, more energy, more determination and more courage in thwarting the intrigues of the Greek schism and of multiform Protestantism at Constantinople and in Syria, than most of his predecessors in the Government of France. In fact, he is emphatically the 'Defender of the Faith' in three-quarters of the globe at this moment. He it was who extirpated the blood-stained robbers and anarchists from the capital of the Christian world, and restored the Sovereign Pontiff in honor and full power to the Vatican, when the Whig Government of this country was using every means, however profligate, to establish the atrocious rule of an infamous incendiary upon the ruins of the Papal power. Avoiding the errors of his uncle's Italian policy—but, like him, seeing clearly that religion is the only foundation of authority—Louis Napoleon's career has been marked throughout by a warm zeal for religion, a determined hostility to its foes—the Socialist Republicans—and a cordial respect to its ministers."

WESLEYAN MISSIONARIES.—During the month of September, four Wesleyan missionaries sailed from England for the West Indies, two for Newfoundland, and one for Australia; and two more were to leave for the latter country in a few days.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

A public meeting was held on Tuesday evening, 16th ult., in the Synod Hall of the United Presbyterian church, Edinburgh, for the purpose of designating Rev. H. H. Garnet as a missionary for Jamaica. Mr. Garnet, who is of African descent, is the first negro missionary sent out and employed by the United Presbyterian church as an ordained minister of the Gospel. Mr. G. is an American clergyman, formerly pastor of a church at Troy.

At the last quarterly meeting of the American Education Society, forty-nine new candidates applied for aid, and forty-six were admitted upon the roll of the society, three having been set aside, in consequence of informality. This is a very unusual number of applications; at the corresponding meeting last fall, it was twenty-six, while the whole number for the year was sixty-one.

Some days previous to the late Thanksgiving Anniversary, the editors of the Boston Traveler suggested the contribution of a fund for distribution among the poor on the occasion of that annual festival. The idea met with a generous response. Nearly $300 were contributed, and in the course of two days and nights the editors of the Traveler caused to be distributed 2,678 pounds of poultry among 432 families and persons, extending over a large portion of the city.

Mr. Happer, of the Presbyterian mission at Canton, mentions the case of an old man, an attendant on the dispensary, who "professes to renounce his idols and to worship and trust in Jesus alone." At Ningpo, Mr. Rankin speaks of a woman under the instruction of his wife, of whom it was hoped that she knew "the grace of Christ."

Dr. Sehon, Missionary Secretary of the Church South, lately, on his way to St. Louis, made a missionary collection on board of a steamboat; and then, to improve the affair, some miscreant robbed the Doctor's trunk of all the funds. The passengers matched this exploit by a generous collection.

Mr. Oncken writes from Germany, under date of Elberfeld, Oct. 25, that he had baptized twelve persons at that place, had constituted a church there, and was expecting further accessions. All the prospects were encouraging in that part of the field.

That venerable and useful servant of God, the Rev. John McIntyre, rested from his labors on the 17th ult., at the residence of his son-in-law, Mr. Alexander Purcell, in Robinson, North Carolina, in the one hundred and third year of his age.

One hundred families of Methodist Protestants are preparing to go to Oregon next spring, taking with them the elements of two new churches. They are wealthy, and will do a good work for the wilderness.

A letter of Mr. Preston, dated Gaboon, West Africa, July 30, contains sorrowful tidings. Mr. and Mrs. Porter have both finished their earthly labors, the former having died on the 6th of July, and the latter on the 16th.

A Roman Catholic Ragged School has recently been opened by the Fathers of the Oratory, at No. 154 High Holborn, under the patronage of the Earl of Arundel and Surrey, and Cardinal Wiseman.

The legislature of Pennsylvania has appropriated two thousand dollars per annum to facilitate the emigration of the free people of color within the state to the republic of Liberia.

Logan, the colored preacher, who was indicted for aiding in the Jerry rescue, has surrendered himself to the marshal, and given bail for his appearance at court in January next.

Over twenty students connected with Emory and Henry College, Va., have united with the church since the commencement of the college last August.

Rev. Jacob Knapp is announced to labor in a protracted meeting in Zanesville, Ohio, during the present month.

JEWISH NEGROES.—Rev. Dr. Phillip, missionary in North Africa, says, on the authority of a German traveler, that near the kingdom of Bambara is a large number of Jewish negroes. Nearly every family among them possesses the Law of Moses written upon parchment. Although they speak of the prophets, they have not their writings.

RELIGIOUS NEWSPAPERS.—People sometimes complain that the papers are not interesting, &c. But let a single number of the paper miss its direction, and how disappointed are these very people! How anxious to get a peep at it! Does not this show that the paper fills a vacuum that they are very unwilling to have empty?

"THE INDEPENDENT," the Congregational paper of this city, has been published four years, and during that time has attained a circulation of over ten thousand copies, having two thousand clergymen on its list of subscribers. It is conducted by Pastors of Congregational Churches, and has in addition stated contributions from Revs. R. S. Storrs, Geo. B. Cheever, and Henry Ward Beecher, and Mrs. Harriett E. Beecher Stowe. With such editional arrangements, it could hardly fail of being, what it certainly is, one of the best religious papers of the day. Published at 24 Beekman-st., New York, at $2 per annum, when paid strictly in advance.

"THE TRUE WESLEYAN," a weekly religious and literary journal—Lucius C. Matlack, Editor—for more than eight years published at No. 9 Spruce-street, New York, is to be removed to the City of Syracuse, January 1, 1853. Thenceforward it will be issued every Thursday, beginning with January 6th, or the first Thursday of the new year, at No. 60 South Salina-street.

THE LECTURES ON MUSIC, which Mr. Fry is delivering on successive Tuesday evenings at Metropolitan Hall, are exceedingly interesting. His introductory lecture, delivered on Tuesday evening of last week, was listened to by a large audience, who were instructed by his exposition of the principles of musical composition, and amused by his many curious illustrations.

General Intelligence.

Congress—President's Message.

The 32d Congress of the United States assembled at Washington, Dec. 6th, to complete its labors. As it had no officers to elect, of course it was ready at once to receive the President's Message, which was delivered on the day of opening.

The Message begins with a reference to the quiet manner in which the election passed off; expresses gratitude to Providence for staying the pesilence, and permitting us to enjoy peace and plenty; passes a brief eulogy on Daniel Webster; and then treats of the Fishery Difficulties and of Cuban Affairs.

We copy entire, under proper headings, the remarks upon the fisheries and Cuban affairs, and all those parts of the Message which are of general interest.

The Fishery Difficulties.

In the course of the last summer considerable anxiety was caused for a short time by an official intimation from the government of Great Britain, that orders had been given for the protection of the fisheries upon the coasts of the British provinces in North America, against the alledged encroachments of the fishing vessels of the United States and France. The shortness of this notice and the season of the year seemed to make it a matter of urgent importance. It was at first apprehended that an increased naval force had been ordered to the fishing grounds to carry into effect the British interpretation of those provisions in the Convention of 1818, in reference to the true intent of which the two governments differ. It was soon discovered that such was not the design of Great Britain, and satisfactory explanations of the real objects of the measure have been given both here and in London.

The unadjusted difference, however, between the two governments as to the interpretation of the first article of the convention of 1818, is still a matter of importance. American fishing vessels within nine or ten years have been excluded from waters to which they had free access for twenty-five years after the negotiation of the treaty. In 1845 this exclusion was relaxed as far as concerns the Bay of Fundy, but the just and liberal intention of the Home Government, in compliance with what we think the true construction of the convention, to open all the other outer bays to our fishermen, was abandoned, in consequence of the opposition of the colonies. Notwithstanding this, the United States have, since the Bay of Fundy was reopened to our fishermen in 1845, pursued the most liberal course towards the colonial fishing interests. By the revenue law of 1846, the duties on colonial fish entering our ports were very greatly reduced, and by the warehousing act it is allowed to be entered in bond without payment of duty. In this way colonial fish has acquired the monopoly of the export trade in our market, and is entering to some extent into the home consumption. These facts were among those which increased the sensibility of our fishing interest, at the movement in question.

These circumstances and the incidents above alluded to have led me to think the moment favorable for a reconsideration of the entire subject of the fisheries on the coasts of the British provinces, with a view to place them upon a more liberal footing of reciprocal privilege. A willingness to meet us in some arrangement of this kind is understood to exist, on the part of Great Britain, with a desire on her part to include in one comprehensive settlement, as well this subject as the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British provinces. I have thought that whatever arrangements may be made on these two subjects, it is expedient that they should be embraced in separate conventions. The illness and death of the late Secretary of State prevented the commencement of the contemplated negotiation. Pains have been taken to collect the information required for the details of such an arrangement. The subject is attended with considerable difficulty. If it is found practicable to come to an agreement mutually acceptable to the two parties, conventions may be concluded in the course of the present winter. The control of Congress over all the provisons of such an arrangement, affecting the revenue, will of course be reserved.

Cuban Affairs.

The affairs of Cuba formed a prominent topic in my last annual message. They remain in an uneasy condition, and a feeling of alarm and irritation on the part of the Cuban authorities appears to exist. This feeling has interfered with the regular commercial intercourse between the United States and the island, and led to some acts of which we have a right to complain. But the Captain General of Cuba is clothed with no power to treat with foreign governments, nor is he in any degree under the control of the Spanish Minister at Washington. Any communication which he may hold with an agent of a foreign power is informal and matter of courtesy. Anxious to put an end to the existing inconveniences, (which seemed to rest on a misconception,) I directed the newly-appointed minister to Mexico to visit Havana, on his way to Vera Cruz. He was respectfully received by the Captain General, who conferred with him freely on the recent occurrences; but no permanent arrangement was effected.

In the mean time, the refusal of the Captain General to allow passengers and the mail to be landed in certain cases, for a reason which does not furnish in the opinion of this Government even a good presumptive ground for such a prohibition, has been made the subject of a serious remonstrance at Madrid; and I have no reason to doubt that due respect will be paid by the government of her Catholic Majesty to the representations which our Minister has been instructed to make on the subject.

It is but justice to the Captain General to add, that his conduct toward the steamers employed to carry the mails of the United States to Havana has, with the exceptions above alluded to, been marked with kindness and liberality, and indicates no general purpose of interfering with the commercial correspondence and intercourse between the island and this country.

Early in the present year official notes were received from the Ministers of France and England, inviting the Government of the United States to become a party with Great Britain and France to a tripartite Convention, in virtue of which the three powers should severally and collectively disclaim, now and for the future, all intention to obtain possession of the Island of Cuba, and should bind themselves to discountenance all attempts to that effect on the part of any power or individual whatever. This invitation has been respectfully declined, for reasons which it would occupy too much space in this communication to state in detail, but which led me to think that the proposed measure would be of doubtful constitutionality, impolitic, and unavailing. I have, however, in common with several of my predecessors, directed the Ministers of France and England to be assured that the United States entertain no designs against Cuba; but that, on the contrary, I should regard its incorporation into the Union at the present time as fraught with serious peril.

Were this island comparatively destitute of inhabitants, or occupied by a kindred race, I should regard it, if voluntarily ceded by Spain, as a most desirable acquisition. But, under existing circumstances, I should look upon its incorporation into our Union as a very hazardous measure. It would bring into the Confederacy a population of a different national stock, speaking a different language, and not likely to harmonize with the other members. It would probably affect in a prejudicial manner the industrial interests of the South; and it might revive those conflicts of opinion between the different sections of the country, which lately shook the Union to its center, and which have been so happily compromised.

The Japan Expedition.

Our settlements on the shores of the Pacific have already given a great extension, and in some respects a new direction, to our commerce in that ocean. A direct and rapidly-increasing intercourse has sprung up with Eastern Asia. The waters of the Northern Pacific, even into the Arctic sea, have of late years been frequented by our whalemen. The application of steam to the general purposes of navigation is becoming daily more common, and makes it desirable to obtain fuel and other necessary supplies at convenient points on the route between Asia and our Pacific shores. Our unfortunate countrymen who from time to time suffer shipwreck on the coasts of the eastern seas are entitled to protection. Besides these specific objects, the general prosperity of our States on the Pacific requires that an attempt should be made to open the opposite regions of Asia to a mutually beneficial intercourse. It is obvious that this attempt could be made by no power to so great advantage as by the United States, whose constitutional system excludes every idea of distant colonial dependencies. I have accordingly been led to order an appropriate naval force to Japan, under the command of a discreet and intelligent officer of the highest rank known to our service. He is instructed to endeavor to obtain from the government of that country some relaxation of the inhospitable and anti-social system which it has pursued for about two centuries. He has been directed particularly to remonstrate in the strongest language against the cruel treatment to which our shipwrecked mariners have often been subjected, and to insist that they shall be treated with humanity. He is instructed however at the same time to give that government the amplest assurance that the objects of the United States are such and such only as I have indicated, and that the expedition is friendly and peaceful. Notwithstanding the jealousy with which the governments of Eastern Asia regard all overtures from foreigners, I am not without hopes of a beneficial result of the expedition. Should it be crowned with success, the advantages will not be confined to the United States, but, as in the case of China, will be equally enjoyed by all the other maritime powers. I have much satisfaction in stating that in all the steps preparatory to this expedition the Government of the United States has been materially aided by the good offices of the King of the Netherlands, the only European power having any commercial relations with Japan.

The Treasury.

The cash receipts into the Treasury for the fiscal year ending the 30th June last, exclusive of trust funds, were $49,728,386 89, and the expenditures for the same period, likewise exclusive of trust funds, were $46,007,896 20; of which $9,455,815 83 was on account of the principal and interest of the public debt, including the last instalment of the indemnity to Mexico, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, leaving a balance of $14,632,136 37 in the Treasury on the first day of July last. Since this latter period, further purchases of the principal of the public debt have been made to the extent of $2,456,547 49, and the surplus in the Treasury will continue to be applied to that object, whenever the stock can be procured within the limits, as to price, authorized by law.

The value of foreign merchandise imported during the last fiscal year was $207,240,101; and the value of domestic productions exported was $149,861,911; besides $17,204,026 of foreign merchandise exported; making the aggregate of the entire exports $167,065,937; exclusive of the above there was exported $42,507,285 in specie; and imported from foreign ports $5,262,663.

The Land Office.

The report from the General Land Office shows increased activity in its operations. The survey of the northern boundary of Iowa has been completed with unexampled dispatch. Within the last year 9,522,953 acres of public land have been surveyed, and 8,032,463 acres brought into market.

In the last fiscal year there were sold	1,553,071 acres.

Located with bounty land warrants	3,201,314 "
Located with other certificates	115,682 "
Making a total of	4,870,067 "

In addition, there were—

Reported under swamp land grants	5,210,188 "
For internal improvements, railroads, &c	3,025,920 "
Making an aggregate of	13,215,175 "

Being an increase in the amount of lands sold and located under land warrants of 569,220 acres over the previous year.

The whole amount thus sold, located under land warrants, reported under swamp land grants and selected for internal improvements, exceeds that of the previous year by 3,342,372 acres; and the sales would, without doubt, have been much larger but for the extensive reservations for railroads in Missouri, Mississippi, and Alabama.

For the quarter ending 30th September, 1852,

there were sold	243,255 acres.
Located with bounty land warrants	1,387,116 "
Located with other certificates	15,649 "
Reported under swamp land grants	2,485,233 "
Making an aggregate for the quarter of	4,131,253

The Post Office Department.

Your attention is respectfully called to the report of the Postmaster General for the detailed operation of his Department during the last fiscal year, from which it will be seen that the receipts from postages for that time were less by $1,431,696 than for the preceding fiscal year, being a decrease of about 23 per cent.

This diminution is attributable to the reduction in the rates of postage made by the act of March 3, 1851, which reduction took effect at the commencement of the last fiscal year.

Although in its operation during the last year the act referred to has not fulfilled the predictions of its friends by increasing the correspondence of the country in proportion to the reduction of postage, I should nevertheless question the policy of returning to higher rates.

European News.

European news to Nov. 20th has been received.

The principal subject of comment in England is the Wellington Funeral, which took place on the 18th ult., and was one of the most imposing spectacles ever witnessed.

The West India Mail steamer La Plata had arrived at Southampton, with the loss of her commander, Capt. Elliott, also the Purser, Third Engineer, and six of the crew, from fever. Several more of the crew and a number of the passengers were ill. The ship had been placed in quarantine.

From France, there is scarcely an item of news of general interest. Numerous protests against the establishment of the empire have been made, and it is announced that the army has been reduced about 30,000 men during the year.

The Earl of Shrewsbury died at Rome on the 9th ult. He was noted as one of the pillars of the English Roman Catholic Church.

The manufacturing house of Hermann Munder, of Bremen, has stopped payment, with liabilities to the amount of 100,000 thalers, while the assets are estimated at some 70,000 thalers. The loss will fall chiefly on houses in Hamburg, Bremen and Elberfield.

The advices from Australia are highly favorable to the continued production of the mines. The arrivals of gold dust were moderate, but large sums are known to be on the way.

Disastrous Hurricane.

The National Intelligencer publishes the following extract of a letter from Mr. Gaines, American Consul at Tripoli, to Mr. Winthrop, American Consul at Malta:—

TRIPOLI, Oct. 31, 1852.

I have only time to send you a few lines by this opportunity, to inform you of the terrible disaster which has recently occurred to the shipping of this port. On Tuesday night, the 19th, it came on to blow a heavy gale of wind, which continued to increase in violence throughout that night and the following day, and reached its climax about midnight on Wednesday, the 20th. There were in the harbor at the time twenty-two vessels, beside five xebecks; of this number sixteen of the vessels and all of the xebecks dragged their anchors, came ashore, and went to pieces. They will all be total wrecks, it is thought; most of them have already broken up. Beside the vessels lost in the port, we have heard of seven others that are wrecked on the coast, not far from here. The Maltese brig Giannina went ashore at Tajourno Point, the crew and passengers all saved; another Maltese vessel (a speronara) went ashore near Sleaton, and is a total wreck. A Turkish brig, on its way to this place from Tunis, was wrecked to the west of Tripoli, about two days' journey from here. She had a large number of passengers (chiefly Mussulmen) and a rich cargo, much of it money. Of the passengers about fifty are reported as lost, and the Arabs pillaged every particle of the cargo, not even sparing the baracans which covered the bodies of the dead. The Governor-General has sent a large force to capture the ringleaders in this disgraceful affair, and to force the tribe to which the robbers belong to restore the property stolen, or to pay down its value. Some eight or nine lives were lost in the harbor. In addition to the damage which the shipping has sustained, much injury has been done in the country by the mountain torrents, and a great number of date and olive trees have been blown down in the gardens around this city.

DEATH OF DISTINGUISHED WOMEN.—We find the two interesting obituary notices which follow, in the National Intelligencer:—

By a letter from the United States Legation at the Hague, the painful information has reached her friends in this city of the decease of Mrs. Mary Elizabeth Lee, consort of Baron de Maltitz, now, and many years past, Minister of the Emperor of Russia at the Hague. The Baroness was the daughter of William Lee, deceased, formerly United States Consul at Bordeaux, and afterwards, for a number of years, a resident of this city, and in the public employ.

Mrs. Deborah Randall died at the city of Annapolis, Md., on Saturday night last, in the 96th year of her age. She had often danced with Gen. Washington. She had children down to the third generation, and was the mother of several distinguished sons, viz: Judge Randall, of Florida; Dr. Burton Randall, U. S. A.; Hon. Alexander Randall, formerly member of Congress from Maryland; John Randall, Esq., a prominent planter there; Major Daniel Randall, late paymaster of the U. S. A., deceased, and Hon. Richard Randall, deceased, formerly Governor of Liberia.

LAND WARRANTS.—The Commissioner of the General Land Office furnishes the annexed information upon the subject of Land Warrants:—

	Acres.
The Scrip proposed to be issued by House Bill No. 380, will embrace about	58,300,000
The outstanding Warrants for military services include, it is estimated	44.810,540
Those yet to be issued, it is estimated, will absorb about	4,400,000
Making a total of	107,510,540

The average amount of land disposed of for the last ten years, is about 4,141,000 acres per annum; consequently, at that rate, it would take about twenty-six years to absorb the whole amount of scrip above mentioned.

The receipts of the American Tract Society in this city for October were $31,466 63; at Boston, $3,662 97.

SUMMARY.

By a late report of the Banking Department at Albany, we learn that the following country Banks have given notice of their intention to close their concerns: Adams Bank, Amenia Bank, American Bank, Champlain Bank, Cortland County Bank, Commercial Bank of Lockport, Excelsior Bank, Henry Keep's Bank, Knickerbocker Bank, Genoa; Lumberman's Bank, McIntyre Bank, Merchant's Bank, Ontario County; Merchants' Bank, Washington County; New York Stock Bank, Northern Bank of New York, Oswego County Bank, Prattsville Bank, Sullivan County Bank, Village Bank, Warren County Bank.

An elephant, which had been long an inmate of Stupinigi, a summer residence of the King of Sardina, was recently put to death. This fine animal was of enormous size. He was killed by means of carbonic acid, all doors and windows being closed. Some time ago, his groom having ill-treated him, he fell into a fit of rage, seized him with his trunk, and flung him in the air to the hight of a hundred feet. Since then he had not been permitted to quit his stable. He had become extremely dull and heavy, and only allowed the wife of his former attendant to approach him. The King ordered him to be stuffed and placed in the Turin Museum.

The steam frigate Mississippi, at present the flag-ship of the Japan squadron, has sailed at last from Chesapeake Bay for the appointed rendezvous at Madeira. She is to be joined by the Vermont ship of the line, and several other vessels still in port, and by the squadron now in the China seas, making a fleet of 13 ships and steamers, with about 320 guns, manned by 3000 seamen and 700 marines. Commodore Perry is the commander of the fleet, and carries ample diplomatic authority as well as military force.

A bet of $10,000 has been pending in Boston on the passages of the American ship Nightingale and the British ship Challenger, from Shanghai—the arrivals of which vessels in England, are announced by the Europa. The Nightingale left Shanghai on the 31st July, and arrived at Deal on the 18th November. The Challenger left Shanghai on the 27th July, and reached Deal on the 17th November,—consequently, unless the stoppages of the vessels on the run alter the case, the Nightingale has beaten the Challenger 3 days.

The Mariette Intelligencer says that the verdict of the Coroner's Jury, in the case of the blowing up of the Buckeye Belle, was that the explosion was caused by the improper management of the second engineer, Joseph Daniels, of Harmer. Mr. Leland Murfy, of Beverly, is dead, and but little hope is entertained of the recovery of three or four others who were injured at that time. The list of dead now amounts to twenty-five, and five others are yet missing, supposed to have been blown into the river.

We doubt if the following challenge of the Saginaw Times will be met: "Two years ago last spring the town of Buena Vista was organized—the 'Town Meeting' being held in Esq. Emerson's dining-room. There were but seven votes polled; the voters electing themselves to the various town offices. At the late general election 337 votes were cast for Presidential Electors, showing an increase in a little over two years of 330. We challenge the whole West to show us an instance where the increase of population has equaled this."

Mr. Henry Harper, Jr., of Pocahontas County, Va., came to his death a few days since by a singular accident. Having taken out a long dirk-knife for the purpose of reducing the size of a wooden pin to fasten his gate, he hurriedly placed the knife against his right side to shut it, and in so doing the blade penetrated his body, severing a principal artery. This was so sudden that he had only time to ask his son to run to the house for something to stanch the blood.

The Worcester Ægis states that the insane man who escaped suffocation at the recent fire at the Worcester County House, was called upon to testify before the Coroner's Jury, and gave his evidence as intelligibly and correctly as any witness. He wrapped himself in a blanket and lay down on a floor, with his face to the ventilator, and thus saved himself. He is not now considered insane, though he was before thought to be one of the "incurables."

The plot of ground bounded by Broadway, Fifth-av., Twenty-fifth and Twenty-sixth-sts., New York, being 119 feet on the avenue, 155 on 26th-st., 213 on Broadway, and 80 on 25th-st., was recently sold for $110,000. It fronts Madison Square, and is eligibly situated—on the avenue for residences, and on Broadway for stores. The three long lots on the north side are very valuable. Since the sale of this property, an offer of $130,000 has been made for it.

Mr. Hiram Bacon, near Indianapolis, raised last year 1,650 bushels wheat from 50 acres; 4,000 bushels corn from 70 acres; 600 bushels barley from 30 acres; 300 bushels Oats from 7 acres. The value of wheat produced was $825; cash received for pork, $318; for corn, $800; barley, $376; potatoes, $50; oats, $45; value of butter and cheese produced, $500; calves, $59; growth of young cattle, $50—making the total productions of 200 acres, $3,113.

The Prairie Farmer has made an inquiry of several corn raisers in Middle Illinois, of the actual cost of this grain per bushel in the crib. There was very little difference in their estimates, which ranged from 4 to 6 cents! The soil is of such a nature as to be plowed with the greatest ease; no hoeing is needed; all the cultivation being done by horses; the rows being from half a mile to two miles in length, and the husking of the huge ears being done from the standing stalks in the field.

The New Jersey Railroad Company long charged Four Dollars for each passage by the Mail Line between this City and Philadelphia, and all remonstrances failed to convince them of the mistake in which they were persisting. The Albany Journal says: We have seen it stated in several papers, that since the completion of the Pennsylvania Railroad, the cars are to run between Philadelphia and Cincinnati in 30 hours, which is certainly very rapid traveling; but it does not come up to the speed of the Central Line of Railroad from New York via Albany and Buffalo to Cincinnati. The schedule on this line is as follows: New York to Albany, 5 hours; Albany to Buffalo, 10; Buffalo to Cleveland, 6; Cleveland to Cincinnati, 8; in all 29 hours.

Miscellaneous.

Father is Coming.

BY MARY HOWITT.

The clock is on the stroke of six,
The father's work is done;
Sweep up the hearth, and mend the fire,
And put the kettle on;
The night-wind now is blowing cold,
'Tis dreary crossing o'er the wold.

He's crossing o'er the wold apace,
He's stronger than the storm;
He does not feel the cold, not he,
His heart it is so warm:
For father's heart is stout and true
As ever human bosom knew.

He makes all toil, all hardship light,
Would all men were the same;
So ready to be pleased, so kind,
So very slow to blame!
Folks need not be unkind, austere,
For love hath readier will than fear!

And we'll do all father as likes,
His wishes are so few;
Would they were more, that every hour
Some wish of his I knew!
I'm sure it makes a happy day
When I can please him any way!

I know he's coming by this sign,
That baby's almost wild;
See how he laughs, and crows, and stares—
Heaven bless the merry child!
His father's self in face and limb,
And father's heart is strong in him.

Hark! hark! I hear his footsteps now—
He's through the garden gate;
Run, little Bess, and ope the door,
And do not let him wait!
Shout, baby, shout, and clap thy hands,
For father on the threshold stands!

Daily Life of Louis XIV.

The following was the ordinary routine of life, day after day, and year after year, with Louis XIV., in the palace of Versailles. We do not wonder at the exclamation of Madame Maintenon: "Could you but form an idea of what kingly life is! Those who occupy thrones are the most unfortunate in the world."

At eight o'clock in the morning two servants carefully entered the chamber of the king. One, if the weather was cold or damp, brought dry wood to kindle a cheerful blaze upon the hearth, while the other opened the shutters, carried away the collation of soup, roasted chicken, bread, wine, and water, which had been placed, the night before, at the side of the royal couch, that the king might find a repast at hand in case he should require refreshment during the night. The valet de chamber then entered and stood silently and reverently at the side of the bed for one half hour. He then awoke the monarch, and immediately passed into an anteroom to communicate the important intelligence that the king no longer slept. Upon receiving this announcement, an attendant threw upon the double portals of a wide door, when the dauphin and his two sons, the Duke of Chartres, who awaited the signal, entered, and approaching the bed with the utmost solemnity of etiquette, inquired how his majesty had passed the night. After the interval of a moment the Duke du Maine, the Count de Toulouse, the first lord of the bed-chamber, and the grand master of the robes, entered the apartment, and with military precision took their station by the side of the couch of recumbent royalty. Immediately there followed another procession of officers bearing the regal vestments. Fagon, the physician, and Telier, the head surgeon, completed the train.

The head valet de chamber then poured upon the hands of the king a few drops of spirits of wine, holding beneath them a plate of enameled silver, and the first lord of the bed-chamber presented to the monarch, who was ever very punctilious in his devotions, the holy water, with which the king made the sign of the cross upon his head and his breast. Thus purified and sanctified, he repeated a short prayer, which the church had taught him, and then rose in his bed. A noble lord then approached and presented to him a collection of wigs, from which he selected the one which he intended to wear that day, and having condescended to place it with his own royal hands upon his head, he slipped his arms into the sleeves of a rich dressing-gown, which the head valet de chambre held ready for him. Then reclining again upon his pillow, he thrust one foot out from the bed-clothes. The valet de chambre reverently received the sacred extremity, and drew over it a silk stocking. The other limb was similarly presented and dressed, when slippers of embroidered velet were placed upon the royal feet. The king then devoutly crossing himself with holy water, with great dignity moved from his bed and seated himself in a large arm-chair, placed at the fireside. The king then announced that he was prepared to receive the First Entree. None but the especial favorites of the monarch were honored with an audience so confidential. These privileged persons were to enjoy the ecstatic happiness of witnessing the awful ceremony of shaving the king. One attendant prepared the water and held the basin. Another religiously lathered the royal chin, and removed the sacred beard, and with soft sponges, saturated with wine and water, washed the parts which had been operated upon and soothed them witt silken towels.

And now the master of the robes approaches to dress the king. At the same moment the monarch announces that he is ready for his Grand Entree. The principal attendants of royalty, accompanied by several valets de chambre and door keepers of the cabinet, immediately took their stations at the entrance of the apartment. Princes often sighed in vain for the honor of an admission to the Grand Entree. The greatest precautions were observed that no unprivileged person should intrude. As each individual presented himself at the door, his name was whispered to the first lord of the bed chamber, who repeated it to the king. If the monarch made no reply, the visitor was admitted. The duke in attendance marshalled the new comers to their several places, that they might not approach too near the presence of His Majesty. Princes of highest rank, and statesmen of the most exalted station, were subjected alike to these humiliating ceremonials. The king, the meanwhile, regardless of his guests, was occupied in being dressed. A valet of his wardrobe delivered to a gentleman of the chamber the garters, which he in turn presented to the monarch. Inexorable etiquette would allow the king to clasp his garters in the morning, but not to unclasp them at night. It was the exclusive privilege of the head valet de chambre to unclasp that of the right leg, while an attendant of inferior rank might remove the other. One attendant put on the shoes, another fastened the diamond buckles. Two pages, gorgeously dressed in crimson velvet overlaid with gold and silver lace, received the slippers as they were taken from the king's feet.

The breakfast followed. Two officers entered; one with bread on an enameled salver, the other with a folded napkin between two silver plates. At the same time the royal cup bearers presented to the first lord a golden vase, into which he poured a small quantity of wine and water, which was tasted by a second cup bearer to insure that there was no poison in the beverage. The vase was then rinsed, and being again filled, was presented to the king upon a golden saucer. The dauphin, as soon as the king had drank, giving his hat and gloves to the first lord in waiting, took the napkin and presented it to the monarch to wipe his lips. The frugal repast was soon finished. The king then laid aside his dressing-gown, while two attendants drew off his night shirt, one taking the left sleeve and the other the right. The monarch then drew from his neck the casket of sacred relics, with which he ever slept. It was passed from the hands of one officer to that of another, and then deposited in the king's closet, where it was carefully guarded. The royal shirt, in the mean time, had been thoroughly warmed at the fire. It was placed in the hands of the first lord, he presented it to the dauphin, and he, laying aside his hat and gloves, approached and presented it to the king. Each garment was thus ceremoniously presented. The royal sword, the vest, and the blue ribbon were brought forward. A nobleman of high rank was honored in the privilege of putting on the vest, another buckled on the sword, another placed over the shoulders of the monarch a scarf, to which was attached the cross of St Louis. The grand master of the robes presented to the king his cravat of rich lace, while a favorite courtier folded it around his neck. Two handkerchiefs of most costly embroidery and richly perfumed were then placed before his majesty, on an enameled saucer, and his toilet was completed.

The king then returned to his bedside. Obsequious attendants spread before him two soft cushions of crimson velvet. In all the pride of ostentatious humility he kneeled upon these, and repeated his prayers, while the bishops and cardinals in his suit, with suppressed voice, uttered responses. But our readers will be weary of the recital of the routine of the day. From his chamber the king went to his cabinet, where with a few privileged ones, he decided upon the plans or amusements of the day. He then attended mass in the chapel. At one o'clock he dined alone, in all the dignity of unapproachable majesty. The ceremony at the dinner table was no less punctilious and ridiculous than at the toilet. After dinner he fed his dogs, and amused himself in playing with them. He then, in the presence of a number of courtiers, changed his dress, and leaving the palace by a private staircase, proceeded to his carriage, which awaited him in the marble court-yard. Returning from his drive, he again changed his dress, and visited the apartments of Madame Maintenon, where he remained until 10 o'clock, the hour of supper. The supper was the great event of the day. Six noblemen stationed themselves at each end of the table to wait upon the king. Whenever he raised his cup, the cup bearer exclaimed aloud to all the company, "Drink for the king." After supper he held a short ceremonial audience with members of the royal family, and at midnight went again to feed his dogs. He then retired, surrounded by puerilities of ceremony too tedious to be read.

Lapland and its Inhabitants.

The Tribune translates and condenses the following interesting particulars, drawn from recent North Russian journals, of a country and people but little known:—

The number of the Russian Lapps does not exceed 2,000; those of Swedish Lapland were estimated in 1844 at 4,000, and those of Northern Norway 5,000—an aggregate of only 11,000 souls. Besides the Lapp population, there are to be found on the shore of the White Sea several villages of Russians, stretching along from Kerett to the Bay of Kandalasch (or Candalax). Between the village of Kandalaschka and Kola, on the coast, at the mouth of the Touloma, a distance of 213 wersts, (141 miles,) there are seven post stations, the mails being carried from one to another by reindeer, four of which animals are kept at each station. This mode of transport, however, is only employed in winter; in summer every thing being transported first a few miles by land to Lake Imanda, then the whole length of that fine body of water, some 60 miles, thence across to the River Touloma, and down that stream to Kola. The navigation of the Lake, by the way, is not always free from danger.

The language of the Lapps is similar to that of the Finns, from which race they are originally an offshoot. The Lapps in general are of middle stature. They have large heads, short necks, small brown-red eyes, owing to the constant smoke in their huts, high cheek bones, thin beards and large hands. Those of Norway are distinguished from the Russian Lapps by the blackness, luxuriance and gloss of their hair; the more northern portion of the race are somewhat larger, more muscular, and of a lighter complexion, than the rest. Those of Sweden and Norway are to some extent more cultivated, enterprising and industrious than those of Russia, and make light of the greatest privations and hardships. The richest of the latter have not more than 800 reindeer, while the former possess from 2,000 to 3,000. In Sweden and Norway, whoever owns from 400 to 500, passes for a man in moderate circumstances; with 200 a small family with proper prudence can live without suffering from want, but less than this number plunges a family into all the troubles of poverty. Whoever has not more than 50, adds his herd to that of some rich man, and becomes his servant—almost his slave, and is bound in the proper season to follow him to the hunting or fishing grounds.

Fish, game, and the flesh of the reindeer, are the usual food of the Lapps. Bread they never eat, though of the rye meal, which they procure in Kola or of the fishermen in barter for the products of their reindeer herds, they make a sort of flat or pan cakes, mingling the meal with the pounded bark of trees. For this purpose the meal is first soaked in cold water, and the cakes baked upon a hot iron. They are eaten with butter or codfish oil, which is esteemed a great luxury. The mingling of the bark with the meal is not done merely for the sake of economy, the Lapps considering it an excellent anti-scorbutic. They are very fond of salt, and eat nothing uncooked. Their cookery is all done in untinned copper vessels, perhaps because in all Lapland there are no pewterers; more probably, however, it is a long-descended custom, since in all Northern Asia the use of copper was formerly universal, and the art of overlaying that metal could hardly be known by the rude inhabitants. Nevertheless, cases of poisoning from the copper never occur, being rendered impossible by the perfect cleanliness of the copper vessels, which after every meal are scoured with sand till they shine like mirrors. Besides, after the food is sufficiently cooked, it is immediately poured into wooden vessels of home manufacture.

The Norweigan and Swedish Lapps make cheese of reindeer milk, and carefully save for use all the whey, &c. They milk their animals summer and winter, and freeze the milk which is set apart for cheese. The women consider this as a great luxury. It is remarkable for its pleasant odor, and has a ready sale in Norway at a rather high price. The Russian Lapps have no idea of making cheese from their reindeer milk, although the manufacture, beyond a doubt, would be of great advantage to them. This milk is distinguished for its excellent flavor; in color and consistency it is like thick cream from the milk of cows, and is remarkably nourishing.

The Ohio and the Alleghany.

BY PROF. ELLETT.

In tracing the Ohio to its source, we must regard the Alleghany as its proper continuation.

This noble tributary rises on the borders of Lake Erie, at an average elevation of 1300 feet above the surface of the sea, and nearly 700 above the level of the lake. The plain along which this river flows is connected with no mountain range at its northern extremity, but continues it rise, with great uniformity, from the mouth of the Ohio to the brim of the basin which incloses Lake Erie. The sources of the tributary streams are generally diminutive ponds, distributed along the edge of the basin of Lake Erie, but far above its surface, and so slightly separated from it, that they may all be drained with little labor down the steep slopes into that inland sea.

From these remote sources a boat may start with sufficient water, within seven miles of Lake Erie, in sight sometimes of the sails which whiten the approach to the harbor of Buffalo, and float securely down the Connewango, or Cassedaga, to the Alleghany, down the Alleghany to the Ohio, and thence uninterruptedly to the gulf of Mexico. In all this distance of 2400 miles, the descent is so uniform and gentle, so little accelerated by rapids, that when there is sufficient water to float the vessel, and sufficient power to govern it, the downward voyage may be performed without difficulty or danger in the channels as they were formed by nature; and the return trip might be made with equal security and success, with very little aid from art.

And such is also the characteristic of many of the smaller ramifications of the head waters of the Alleghany, which do not rise on the borders of Lake Erie. They still descend so gradually and uniformly, that they may be safely traversed by rafts and boats when reduced to a width of only twelve or fifteen feet. The elevation of the Alleghany at Olean Point, 250 miles above Pittsburgh, as determined by the surveys of the writer, is 1403 feet above the tide. Steamboats have ascended to this point in sufficient water—2,300 miles from the mouth of the Mississippi—and might, by a little labor, be capable of running there at all times.

Here follows a profile of the Alleghany river, Chautauque Lake, and Lake Erie, from which it seems that Lake Erie lies in the bottom of an immense basin about 1000 feet deep, on the very brim of which, more than 700 feet above the surface of the Lake, many of the tributaries of the Ohio take their rise.

The Upper Alleghany and its tributaries, traced towards their sources, rise very uniformly at the rate of about three feet per mile, and terminate in a number of small lakes, of which the Chautauque is the most important, and separated like the others, by a narrow ridge from the basin of Lake Erie. An excavation only sixty feet deep, through this ridge, would turn one of the principal tributaries of the Ohio into Lake Erie and the St. Lawrence.

The following table shows the actual descent, and descent per mile, of the Alleghany, Ohio, and Mississippi rivers, from point to point, from Coudersport, forty miles above the head of natural steamboat navigation on the Alleghany, to the Gulf of Mexico:—

From	Miles.	Ft. Fall.	Ft.	In.	Per M.
Coudersport to Olean Point,	40	246	6	2
Olean Point to Warren,	50	216	4	4
Warren to Franklin,	70	227	3	3
Franklin to Pittsburgh,	130	261	2
Pittsburgh to Beaver,	26	30	1	1	85-100
Beaver to Wheeling,	62	49		9	50-100
Wheeling to Marrietta,	90	49		6	58-100
Marrietta to Le Tart's Shoals,	31	16		6	17-100
Le Tart's Shoals to the mouth of Kanawha,	56	33		7	20-100
Mouth of Kanawha to Portsmouth,	94	48		6	13-100
Portsmouth to Cincinnati,	105	42		4	80-100
Cincinnati to Evansville,	328	112		4	10-100
Evansville to the Gulf of Mexico,	1.365	320		2	80-100
Coudersport to mouth of the Mississippi,	2,446	1,649

From the above table, it appears that from Pittsburgh to Cairo, the mouth of the Ohio, a distance of 975 miles, this river has an average fall of about $5\frac{1}{4}$ inches per mile; and from Cairo to the Gulf of Mexico, 1178 miles, the Mississippi has an average fall of 2 8-10 inches per mile.

By observing the descent of the Alleghany from Franklin to Pittsburnh, we may conclude that rivers, of which the fall does not exceed two feet per mile, are navigable for steamboats, unless there be great irregularity in the distribution of the fall. In the event of such irregularity existing, rivers having an average descent not exceeding two feet per mile, if well supplied with water, must afford exceedingly good navigation between the rapids, which must be very remote and easily overcome.

We learn, also, from these tables, that a descent of nearly four feet per mile is not incompatible with the existence of steamboat navigation, if the supply of water be well maintained; for a steamboat has ascended the Alleghany as far as Olean Point, overcoming, in places, a slope of nearly five feet per mile.

It is well known that the navigation of the Ohio, which, at certain seasons, is scarcely surpassed on living streams, often fails for want of water of sufficient depth to float the boats that can be most advantageously used. It has been proposed, at times, to remedy this defect by leading the water of Lake Erie into the Ohio, and maintaining the navigation by supporting the depth in the channel from that ample source. But it will be perceived, by an inspection of the foregoing table, that the Ohio river at Pittsburgh is, at low water, 134 feet above the level of Lake Erie; and that the plane of the surface of that lake, extended to the south, will pass 700 feet below the sources of the Alleghany, 395 feet below the town of Franklin, 134 feet below Pittsburgh, 55 feet below low water at Wheeling, and would cut the inclined plane of the Ohio between Parkersburg and Marietta, and at a point about 100 miles south of Lake Erie.

The Blind Seeing.

The Woodstock American furnishes an interesting notice of an experiment made by Dr. Cadwell, in Canada, a few days ago. Our cotemporary says that a blind girl, named Sarah Hawley, of the township of Malahide, was restored to sight almost instantaneously, and then goes on to remark:—

It seems she was born perfectly blind, and is now twenty-one years of age. During this long time of course she had not the slightest comprehension of the appearance of any object more than she could acquire from the sense of touch. It is little wonder, therefore, that her feelings were excited when she first beheld the light of the sun and the appearance of all the things around her. Our cotemporary says—'To describe the sensations of the young lady when the first welcome ray of light entered her hitherto sightless orbs, would be beyond our power. In an instant, as if by magic, the ideas of material things which she had cherished for so many years through the sense of feeling, were entombed in memory. A new and bright world, full of light and life—full of wonder and admiration—terrible, because hitherto unknown in its realized beauty and grandeur, arose before her. She looked and trembled; she shook from head to foot, like an aspen leaf; and, unable to utter a word, she gazed in wild astonishment on the scene before her.

When her emotion had somewhat subsided, Dr. Cadwell inquired if she saw him. "Yes," said she, "I see you. Oh, how white you look!" Subsequently she noticed a pair of brass candlesticks in the room, and inquired what they were. On being informed she was incredulous. The ideas which she had formed of a candlestick were far different from those which her new-born sight conveyed. The candlesticks were brought to her; she handled them and exclaimed, "Oh, yes, they are candlesticks; how bright they look." Dr. Cadwell showed her his gold watch, and inquired if she knew what it was. She answered in the negative, and on being informed she said, "What a queer thing it is; both sides of it are not alike." We may add, that the young lody's sight is daily improving in strength, and that she returned to her house in Malahide, a few days since, rejoicing in the light of life.

A New Locomotive.

Mr. William D. Arneet, of Iowa, has made certain improvements in the locomotive, by which it is adapted to running on plank or Macadamized roads. As far as we can judge from an examination of his plan, its chief novelty appears to consist in the arrangement of the driving wheels, and operates in such manner as, to a considerable extent, to increase the speed of the locomotive, by increasing the tractile power of its driving wheels, and also to operate so as to prevent them from cutting or otherwise injuring the road. This locomotive, in form resembles those in common use, having a steam boiler, cylinder, and other necessary appendages. It has a steering apparatus of novel construction, by which the pilot can, by the turning of a windlass, give any desired direction to the locomotive in the shortest possible time. The design of this locomotive is to draw any suitable number of conveniently constructed vehicles, and to connect with a railroad to receive passengers or freight and convey them to distant towns or villages, where it is not only impracticable to construct a railroad, but where traveling and business are not sufficient to support such. This improvement seems admirably fitted for the Western portions of this country, and especially the immense prairies which are now being laid with plank roads. It would seem also to be adaptable to agricultural purposes, by simply connecting therewith a line of plows; or for driving machinery for various purposes, by supporting the locomotive upon a pair of wheels situated on either side of the driving wheels, and using one or both of the latter to communicate the power of the engine through a band, or otherwise, to the machine to be driven.

Woolen Rags as a Manure.

As a fitting return for your trouble in answering my inquiry in the May number, in regard to the application of woolen rags as a manure, I now send you the result of my so doing. In my former letter I said nothing about the quality of the land I intended planting. It was a light yellow sand, and had been cropped with wheat the year previous, and sowed with clover, which had not, however, taken well. I planted the piece, just one-third of an acre, part on the 10th of May, and the other part on the 20th, in rows three feet apart, putting the sets one foot apart. They would, I think, have produced more if only eight or nine inches apart. I first drew the rows, and then, after cutting them up, scattered the rags, at the rate of one ton to the acre, dry, in just the state I saved them, in the rows, and dropped my sets on the rags, covering them up in the usual manner. I hoed them three times, and the product is just seventy-five and a half bushels of the largest and best Pink-Eye potatoes I ever saw. The rags now appear but little decomposed. I purposely left two rows without rags; the difference in the appearance of the potatoes during their growth, and in the quality and quantity of the product, was very striking.

Ship Canal.—The Important Ship Canal which is to unite Lake Superior with Lake Michigan, will soon be commenced. The surveys for its location have been completed, and the ground has been found quite as favorable for the easy and speedy construction of the work as was expected. Several routes have been surveyed, which will enable the Legislature of Michigan and contractors to obtain a perfect understanding of the whole subject. The canal will be a fraction less than a mile in length. The law of Congress provides that the locks shall be at least 250 feet long and 60 feet wide, and the Michigan Legislature has power to enlarge the dimensions. When completed, this canal will enable steamers of the largest class to run from Buffalo to the head waters of the lake without any transhipments—an improvement that will quadruple the trade of this immense lake in less than two years.

Leaves for Littering Stables.

In this year of scarcity of hay, straw will be used more than usual for feeding stock, instead of being used for litter. Leaves from the forest may be used for litter as a substitute for straw, in many instances with advantage. They may be readily gathered in large quantities where woods are free from underbrush and the ground is dry. In many situations, the winds sweep them together in piles, along fences or the lee side of rocks and hills. They make the best possible bedding for pigs—are clean and wholesome, give the animal a clean skin, and protect him, better than almost anything else, against cold.

Another advantage of leaves for litter, they make excellent manure. Gardeners well know their value for this purpose. A mixture of leaves with animal manure, and old turf or peat, decomposed and well mixed, furnishes a compost which is very favorable to the growth of most plants. For litter, leaves should be gathered, if practicable, dry.

Ancient Substitute for a Library.—A story is told of a Roman who expended vast sums in purchasing a household of learned slaves. He wished to have the best poets and historians in living editions. One servant recited the whole of the Iliad; another chanted the Odes of Pindar. Every standard author had a representative. The free Press has replaced the bondman. Literature is no longer an heirloom, nor can an emperor monopolize Horace. A small outlay obtains a choicer collection of verses than the ancient amateur enjoyed, and without the annoyances to which he was subject. He had no familiar book for a corner, nor any portable poet to be a companion in a field-walk, or under a tree. Not even Nero could compress a slave into an Elzevir. Moreover, disappointments sometimes occurred. Perhaps the deputy "Pindar" was out of the way; or a sudden indisposition of "Homer" interrupted Ulysses in the middle of an harangue, and left Hector stretching out his arms to the child.

Longevity in Canada.—The Montreal Herald mentions some regular instances of longevity brought to light by the late census It says:—

"We understand that more than twenty persons are returned whose ages exceed one hundred years. The most venerable patriarch of these, if we make no mistake, resides in the township of Grey, Simcoe county, aged one hundred and fifteen years. Ninety-five years ago he scaled the cliffs of Quebec with General Woolfe; so that his residence in Canada is coincident with British rule in the province. He has attached himself to the Indians, and lives, in all respects, like them. This veteran is named Abraham Miller. Gallantry will not permit us to omit honorable mention of an almost equally distinguished person of the other sex. Helen Maguire is one hundred and six years of age. She still dresses without help, and walks out for air and exercise whenever the weather is sufficiently fine to tempt her from the chimney corner. She still has all her faculties, and can thread a needle without spectacles."

A Fish Nursery.—Dr. Samuel J. Stratford, of Toronto, Canada, has asked Nova Scotia for a salt-water lake. He desires to make a fish nursery for salmon, lobsters, oysters, &c. The French have lately turned their attention to schemes of the kind; and the doctor thinks he could carry out the plan successfully at Lake Bras d'Or, in Cape Breton; a plan which, he says would prevent the extirpation which threatens these floating aliments of man. He proposes to erect defenses at Barra Strait, which will prevent the escape of the fish, and feed and protect them in the spacious inclosure. He would do this in such a way as that navigation should not be hindered. He has a method of preserving his fish alive, and so exporting them in salt water to foreign countries; and he expresses his confidence that he could not only alone supply the markets of Canada and the United States, but also those of England and the continent of Europe.

The crops in South Russia this year have surpassed all calculation. The Mennonite Colonies alone will have over one-and-three-quarter million bushels of grain for export. The demand for laborers has been so great in the fields that the shops of the tailors, shoemakers and stone-cutters were all deserted during harvest. Every day is bringing these countries nearer to England.

The Boston Medical Journal gives the following simple and economical apparatus for overcoming bad odors and purifying any apartment where the air is loaded with noxious materials: Take one of any of the various kinds of globe lamps—for burning camphene, for example—and fill it with choleric ether, and light the wick. In a few minutes the object will be accomplished.

The Legislature of Vermont adjourned on Wednesday morning, 24th ult. Among the acts of the session was a liquor law, similar to the one now in operation in the state of Maine. The measure is to be submitted to a direct vote of the people, for their adoption of rejection, in March next.

The farm of Mr. Polhemus, situated between Astoria and Ravenswood, of 100 acres, sold a few days since for $50,000, being $500 per acre. Another farm of 40 acres, near Astoria, which belonged to the late Isaac Van Alst, sold for $35,000, being $870 per acre.

The Street Department of New York City Government have signed a contract with Mr. Henry R. Concklin for the enlargement of the Battery to about double its present size, in accordance with the plan long since agreed upon, and to consummate which propositions were long ago invited.

Fifty thousand dollars have been recently subscribed, mainly by the farmers of Delaware, to endow their College at Newark. It is conditioned that a Professorship of Agriculture shall be at once established, which is to go into operation the present winter.

Rev. R. T. Middleditch, of New Jersey, has been awarded by the Southern Baptist Publication Society, a prize of $50 for the best Essay on Missions.

Sugar cane, of very good quality, has been produced in South Carolina, and the Charleston Mercury calls the attention of the planters of that State to its cultivation.

The Telegraph announces the unexpected death of Hon. Walter Forward, of Alleghany Co., Pa., whose age must be about 65 years.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

A RIGHT FAITH AND A RIGHT LIFE.

There is perhaps no error more common, in our day, than that of finding a cloak for every kind of heresy and pernicious doctrine in the trite maxim, which in many minds has evidently settled into a belief, that it makes no difference what a man believes, provided his life be right. The proposition which is used by infidels and moralists (falsely so called) to rebut every attempt to enforce upon them the doctrines of the Bible, and which we propose briefly to consider, usually finds an expression in the following form, viz: "His Faith is not wrong whose Life is in the right."

Faith is doubtless employed here to denote the object of belief; that is, a system of doctrines accredited and received by Christians. Life must be used to mean, either a man's whole course of actions, or his daily course of conduct. And by right is evidently intended in conformity to the law of God—freedom from error—in accordance with truth or fact.

The above proposition admits of two senses, and is true or false according to the sense in which it is understood. Its whole import seems to turn upon what definition we give the word life, which may mean, as above defined, either a man's whole course of actions, or his daily course of conduct.

1. According to the first view, we are disposed to maintain the truth of the proposition. For, to affirm that a man's whole life is right, is to affirm that all his acts, towards God, and with respect to man, including all his mental decisions, are right. But in order to do right, it is necessary to know what right is, so far as the action is concerned; for how can a man feel right, or think right, with respect to God, unless he knows how to feel and what to think. Moreover, his faith must be right; for, as faith is a system of doctrine—the object of belief—if a man act contrary to his faith, although that action may be, objectively considered, right, yet his mental determination to do contrary to his own belief was certainly a wrong act. Thus it becomes impossible for a man to use hypocrisy without involving himself in wrong action. The question may here be raised, whether right action is not sometimes purely accidental, in which case it would not argue a right faith in the actor. Grant it. But, on the same ground, it would not argue a wrong faith; on the contrary, if a wrong faith exist, the action could not be purely accidental; for if there be a belief on any subject, action upon that subject must either agree or disagree with that belief. If faith be wrong, and the action right, then it must have been performed contrary to one's own belief, and consequently involves previous wrong action, as was shown above. In this particular, what is true of one action is true of every action. Therefore, if a man's whole course of actions be right, every motive, intention, and mental decision must be right, which implies a correct knowledge of his duty, so far forth as his actions extend; hence his faith must be right.

2. If we understand the word life to mean daily conduct, (which is evidently the sense intended,) the proposition wears an entirely different aspect. An examination into the conduct of two classes of men, representatives of which are almost everywhere met with in society, will, to our mind, clearly demonstrate the falsity of the proposition taken in this sense. Before proceeding, however, it might be well to remark, first, that we can never determine the subjective quality of a moral act without knowing the motive from which the act proceeds; and, second, that of a very large class of actions, we have no means of finding out the motive, unless the agent chooses to reveal it to us. From the foregoing we should infer, what in experience we find to be abundantly the fact, that many would take advantage of these principles, by practicing deceit in order to accomplish their wicked purposes. Let such characters stand for the first of the above-mentioned classes. For example, a rank infidel may deem it decided policy to practice most of the external Christian virtues. Indeed, he may, to the eye of man, appear in every respect a Christian. He may even go so far as to make profession of the religion of Christ, while in his heart he repudiates the whole doctrine. Now, if the proposition be true, this infidel's faith cannot be wrong; but we know that such a man is a disbeliever of the true doctrine; therefore the proposition cannot be true.

It may be objected, perhaps, that real disbelief will in some way manifest itself. To this we answer, that God alone knoweth the heart; and again, that man may deceive his fellow man, is too evident to need a comment. Thus, within the veil of piety, and under the cloak of religion, are found those who possess all the externals of Christianity without the heart, all the forms of godliness without its essence. In this class may be included all those who entertain wrong views of the Gospel, and at the same time for sinister ends yield an outward obedience to its claims. The second class is designed to comprehend those who do right from improper, though not from wrong motives. Many, doubtless, merely from social influences, are led to unite with the church, and afterward, by similar causes, are led to the performance of Christian duties. It will be quite evident to every mind, upon reflection, that the righteousness of such does not in the slightest degree follow from their doctrines or faith; and consequently it frequently happens, that men of this cast, when removed from the influence of virtuous society, and from under the restraints of the church, exhibit the most glaring irregularities of life, and make perfect shipwreck of their faith. It is possible that many are thus obedient to the gospel, who have never stopped to examine the foundation of their belief, and are totally unconscious that the major part of their virtue is to be attributed to surrounding circumstances. However this may be, it is sufficient for our present purpose, that correct life is not an index to a right faith.

TACITUS.

SABBATH SCHOOLS.

It would seem that all has been said that is necessary to be said, about the importance of Sabbath Schools, as a means for the cultivation of our youth in religious knowledge. It would seem, that in this enlightened, Christian age, when the beneficial influences of this institution have already been observed and felt, Christian parents could not remain inactive and insensible upon this subject. Yet it is a painful fact, that some of our churches have no Sabbath Schools, while in others such Schools are from time to time built up, and kept alive perhaps for a few short months, when the interest dies away, and they are neglected. Why is this? Why has not every church its Sabbath School, fostered and cherished with the most tender care? Why do parents feel so much anxiety for the tempora interests of their children, causing them to labor and toil week after week, month after month, and year after year, to provide for their present and future bodily support, to build school-houses and academies, and pay out money for teachers to instruct them in the sciences, and fit them for places of respectability and honor in life, (which is all right so far as it goes,) and yet utterly neglect the culture of their immortal spirits, which are of infinitely greater value than the body. This neglect, in my opinion, argues a want of true, vital piety, in any church where it exists. For, how can a community of religious fathers and mothers, whose hearts are filled with love to God, who have an ardent desire for the upbuilding of the Redeemer's kingdom, who are zealous in the work of sending the gospel to the heathen, overlook the means for the instruction of their own offspring in those things which vitally affect their interests, for time and eternity? Would Christian parents naturally be guilty of such an oversight, who in other respects regard the welfare of those whom God has given to their charge with such anxious solicitude?

Who can calculate the amount of influence which we as Seventh-day Baptists might possess at this day, had every child in our denomination enjoyed the benefits of a Sabbath School, instructed by pious and faithful teachers, sanctified by the grace of God, and seconded by the prayers and Christian example of parents? How many would enter upon manhood, or womanhood, without regeneration of heart, and an acquaintance with the doctrine taught in the Holy Scriptures? How many inactive and inefficient members would our churches have? How many, thus early taught to love and revere the teachings of the Bible, would forsake and dishonor the Sabbath, and bring reproach upon our people? How many Christian fathers and mothers would go down in sorrow to the grave, their gray hairs dishonored by the wayward conduct of ungodly sons and daughters? Oh, parents, as your hearts yearn for your children; as you wish them to escape destruction; as you love the pure and unadulterated religion of Jesus Christ; as you regard the future prosperity of the denomination, upon whose efforts, under God, the vindication of the Sabbath of the Lord depends; as you desire to go down to your graves in peace, loved and honored by your posterity; we beseech you, give them the advantages of a religious education.

I do not wish to be understood as placing confidence in the Sabbath School as being sufficient in itself to regenerate the soul; on the contrary, I firmly believe, that nothing less than the influence of the Holy Spirit is able to work a change so wonderful. But I as firmly believe, that the Holy Spirit works by means, and that no individual can embrace Christ without a knowledge of Him. Nor do I believe that this knowledge may not come through other instrumentalities, but that, as the common school is the most efficient means for communicating knowledge to the youthful mind in the sciences, so is the Sabbath School the most efficient means through which a knowledge of the principles of religion may be inculcated in the minds of the young. If, ten or twelve years from this time, you should search out the most prosperous and active churches, you would, in my opinion, find them where now exists the deepest and most abiding interest in Sabbath Schools. Many who are now Sabbath School scholars will then have arrived at years of activity and usefulness, already trained in the school of Christ, whose minds will have been already stored with the doctrines and precepts of the Christian religion, which will require many years of advanced life to learn, by those who have not enjoyed their early opportunities.

What a glorious era for our Republic would that be, in which all the youth in our land should enjoy faithful Sabbath School instruction! A generation of young men and women, coming upon the stage of action, being possessed of firmly established moral and religious principles, would give to our government a character of firmness, justice, and righteousness, never possessed by any nation governed by human legislation.

CHRISTIANA, Wis., Nov. 21st, 1852.

DISCOVERY IN PERSIA.

The Boston Chronicle has seen a letter from a scientific American gentleman now in Persia, to his friend in Boston, describing some recent discoveries which have been made by a Board of Commissioners who are engaged, under the mediation of England and Russia, in running and marking the boundary line between Persia and Turkey:—

"Col. Williams, well known to many Americans, and a man of character and talent, is the English commissioner. In the prosecution of this work, the commissioners have come upon the remains of the ancient palace of Shushan, mentioned in the sacred books of Esther and Daniel; together with the tomb of Daniel, the prophet. The locality answers to the received tradition of its position, and the internal evidence, arising from its correspondence with the description of the palace recorded in the sacred history, amounts almost to demonstration. The reader can turn to Esther, ch. i. 6; there he will read of a 'pavement of red, and blue, and white, and black marble in that palace.' That pavement still exists, and as described by Col. Williams corresponds to the description given thus in the sacred history. And in the marble columns, dilapidated ruins, the sculpture and the remaining marks of greatness and glory that are scattered around, the commissioners read the exact truth of the record made by the sacred penman.

"Not far from the palace stands a tomb; on it is sculptured the figure of a man bound hand and foot, with a huge lion in the act of springing upon him to devour him. No history could speak more graphically the story of Daniel in the Lion's Den. The commissioners have with them an able corps of engineers and scientific men, and most interesting discoveries may be expected. The Persian arrow-heads are found upon the palace and the tomb. Glass bottles, elegant as those placed upon the toilet table of the ladies of our day, have been discovered; with other indications of art and refinement, which bear out the statements of the Bible. Thus, twenty-five hundred years after the historians of Esther and Daniel made their records, their histories are verified by the peaceful movements of the nations of our day."

DEBTS OF HONOR.

These (says the Editor of the Western Watchman) are such as men feel under special obligations to pay promptly. An honest man will endeavor to pay all his debts. Yet if any of them must be paid off, debts of honor should be paid, in preference to debts which come in the ordinary course of business transactions. Let us specify a few.

A debt incurred for the support of religion is in the highest sense a debt of honor. Have you subscribed for the support of your minister? That is a debt of honor; your minister so regards it. He spends time, and strength, and incurs expenses for the support of his family, the increase of his library, and the efficiency of his labors, on the confidence which he reposes in your honor, that you will pay him promptly, what you have agreed to. God so regards it. He treats it as a debt due to himself. "Will a man rob God?" Could there be a greater breach of honor?

A debt due for your religious paper is a debt of honor. It was sent to you on the confidence reposed in you that you would pay for it honestly, according to its printed terms. It is due to one who has never seen you, but he confides in your integrity, believing that every one who takes interest enough in a religious paper to read it, will pay for it. If a stranger who had never seen you had lent you a sum of money at your request, would you not feel that it was a debt of honor, which must be paid? So it is with him who sends you your religious paper. The sum which you owe may be a small one; but it is by just such small sums that the heavy expenses of the paper are sustained. You pay four or five cents per week for your paper, but it costs, perhaps, from one hundred to five hundred dollars per week to keep the paper going. The very smallness of the sum which you owe, therefore, renders it even more sacredly a debt of honor.

Now, it is always to be taken for granted, that a Christian will act on the highest principles of honor, in money matters. If he subscribes for a religious paper, he will pay for it according to its printed terms. If he does not pay in advance, he will pay the additional price for delay. He will not be small in a matter of such inestimable public and religious interest as the support of his religious paper. He will do as he would be done by if he was engaged in such an enterprise. He will not send to have his paper stopped, leaving eight or ten papers, nor even two or three papers unpaid for. Above all, he will not attempt to escape payment for his paper, by refusing to take it from the post-office. He would regard such conduct the height of meanness and dishonor.

THE FOUR PHILOSOPHERS.

Four great philosophers
Come every year,
Teach in the open air,
Then disappear!

WINTER's the Stoic,
So chill and heroic:
He sits in the mountain breeze biting and pure;
And when to bring fear and doubt,
Damp, nightly winds are out,
Wraps an old cloak about—he can endure.

SPRING, at dull hearts to mock,
Comes in a farming frock,
With garlands and plowshare a lesson doth give;
He sings through the field awhile,
Turns up the soaking soil,
All haste and laughing toil—briskly can live.

SUMMER, with mantle free,
Epicurean he,
Lolls in the cooling shade, like a tired boy;
While blazing suns unkind,
Leave the stout mower blind,
Where faints the mountain wind—he can enjoy.

AUTUMN, when all are done,
He's the good Christian one;
Fills well the granaries, where seeds may lie
New, coming years to bless;
Then in his russet dress,
All hope and quietness—sweetly can die.

DEATH OF LUTHER.

On the morning of Jan. 23d he set out for Eisleben, and took with him his two sons, Martin and Paul, the eldest of whom was then about twenty. His wife was sick, and on that account obliged to stay at home. There had been a violent storm, the rivers had all overflown their banks, the bridges were carried away, and traveling was both difficult and dangerous. At eleven o'clock on the morning of the 24th, he arrived in Halle, and in the evening preached in St. Mary's Church. He was detained there three days by the state of the river Saale, which was full of floating ice, and running with a furious current. On the 28th, he and his two sons, with Dr. Jonas, rowed themselves across the river, in a skiff, at the imminent hazard of their lives. While they were struggling with the ice and water, Luther spoke to Dr. Jonas in his dry, pleasant way—"Dear Doctor, would it not be fine sport for the devil to drown Dr. Martin Luther, and his two sons, and Dr. Jonas, all together, here in the river?" They gained the shore in safety, and proceeded on their journey. The Count of Mansfeld met them with a company of one hundred and thirteen horses, and escorted them to Eisleben. When they came in sight of the church-tower of Eisleben, a rush of tender reminiscences crowded upon the mind of Luther with such overwhelming force that he fainted entirely away. When he recovered, he said, "The devil must needs insult me from the old steeple yonder. But I will give him a pull or two yet before I die." Luther found himself very much exhausted by the fatigues and inconveniences of his journey. He had an issue for the pains in his head. This had been neglected since he left home, and had become very painful. After a night's rest, however, he entered on business, and pursued it with unremitting diligence.

February 14th, he ordained two preachers, and received the Lord's Supper for the last time. The next day he preached his last sermon from Matt. 11: 25—30.

February 16th, at supper, Luther spoke with great cheerfulness on the brevity of human life. . . . .

His appetite had been very good, and his meals remarkably cheerful; and he observed that, getting back to his native town, his food tasted to him as it did when he was a boy.

On the morning of Feburary the 17th, he appeared so unwell, that the Count of Mansfeld begged him not to attend to business that day, but keep his room. This he consented to do; he saw no company, and his dinner was sent up to his apartment. In the afternoon, however, he said he could not bear to eat his meals alone, it was so gloomy and unsocial; he would go down and take supper with the family. His two sons were with him, his friend Dr. Jonas, and his servant Ambrose. He walked thoughtfully up and down in his chamber, and at length said:—"I was born here in Eisleben; what if I should die here?" He complained of pressure for breath; he walked to the window and opened it; his lips moved, and a low murmur was heard, as if he were in earnest prayer. His servant Ambrose, supposing he might want assistance, came softly behind him, and heard him speak to the following purport:—"Lord God, Heavenly Father, I call upon thee in the name of thy dear Son, Jesus Christ our Lord, whom I by thy grace have acknowledged and preached, that thou wouldst, according to thy promise, and for the glory of thy name, graciously listen to my prayers at this time. Oh, grant, according to thy great mercy and loving-kindness towards me, that the light of the gospel, which now begins to shine on the earth, may everywhere take the place of the terrible apostasy, and darkness, and blindness of the Pope, before the great day of judgment, which cannot now be far off, but is at the door; and withal preserve thou the Church of my dear fatherland pure unto the end in the steadfast profession of the truths of thy holy Word, and graciously keep it, that all the world may know that thou didst send me to do this work. Ah, dear Lord God, Amen, Amen."

Not a word was spoken by any of his attendants. They felt as Jacob did in Bethel, "How dreadful is this place!"

He resumed his seat, and said to Dr. Jonas and his sons:—"Oh, I wish this business of the Count of Mansfeld were settled, that I might go home and lay myself down in my coffin to sleep, and give this poor body to the worms!"

Michael Coelius, the minister of Eisleben, came in to see him, and he said to Coelius and Dr. Jonas—"Pray for our dear Lord God, that it may go well with him and his Church, for the Council of Trent is in a great rage." He complained of pain in his breast, and requested them to rub him with warm flannels, which they did. He felt better, and at supper-time went down and ate with the family with a good appetite. Observing the company rather desponding, he began to converse with great liveliness, and by two or three sallies of his ever-ready wit, threw them into a hearty laugh.

After supper he again complained of a pain in his breast, and asked to be rubbed with warm flannels. They urged him to send for a physician, but he declined. At nine o'clock he went up stairs, in company with his two sons, Martin and Paul, Dr. Jonas, Mr. Coelius, and his servant Ambrose. He lay down on a sofa in a little ante-room adjoining his chamber, and slept for about an hour and a half. He then awoke, and asked Ambrose to warm the bed in his chamber. He rose from the sofa, took off his clothers without assistance, wrapped himself in a dressing gown, walked to his bed, and lay down. Seeing his sons and the other friends standing anxiously around him, he requested them to retire to bed; but they earnestly begging permission to sit up with him, he made no further objection, but turned his face towards the wall, and seemed to sleep. His servant Ambrose says he did not really close his eyes, but seemed to be narrowly watching the flickering shadows made upon the wall by the unsteady light of the fire. At half-past eleven, he told his servant to light a fire in the little room, and soon after exclaimed, "O Lord God!" in a tone of distress. His friends were immediately around him, and he said to Dr. Jonas: "I have most distressing pains at my heart; I think I must be dying." They rubbed him again with flannels, and the sad news spread through the family and through the city, that Luther was dying. The two principal physicians of the city were soon by his bedside. The Count of Mansfeld came hurrying in with some salts of ammonia, then newly discovered, and was soon followed by his lady, the Countess, the Count John Henry von Schwartuzburg and his lady, and Dr. Aurifaber, the particular friend and biographer of Luther.

Luther soon recovered, rose from the bed without assistance, walked once or twice across the chamber, and then went into the little ante-room, and lay down again upon the sofa. It was now one o'clock in the morning. Soon after lying down, he said in Latin, "Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit. Thou hast redeemed me, O Lord God of truth."

The Countess of Mansfeld wished him to take some of the medicines she had brought; but he said his poor dear Caty, in her abundant anxiety for him, had put up, just before he came away, a little case of refreshments and medicines, and if he took anything, he would rather have some of that. His son went to his trunk, took out the parcel he spoke of, and handed it to him. He took one or two of the things it contained, just put them to his lips, handed them all back to his son, and told him to put them away, and never to forget the kindness of his mother. Soon after, he said, "Dear God, I am in dreadful pain, I must be going." Mr. Coelius said to him, "Venerated father, call upon our dear Lord Jesus Christ, our great High Priest, our only Mediator; you have done a great work for Him; God will be gracious to us; you will yet recover." "No," said Luther, firmly, "I feel the cold sweat of death; I am breathing my soul out; my distress is increasing." He then prayed in German:—"My heavenly Father, eternal, most merciful God, thou hast revealed to me thy dear Son, our Lord Jesus Christ; him have I professed, him have I preached; I adore him as my only Saviour and Redeemer, while the ungodly reproach, and revile, and persecute Him. Oh, take my poor soul to thyself." He then said in Latin three times, in quick succession, "Into thy hands I commit my spirit;" and added, "God so loved the world that he sent his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him might not perish, but have everlasting life." After a moment's silence, he again spoke in German: "O heavenly Father, although this body is breaking away from me, and I am departing from this life, yet I certainly know I shall forever be with thee, for no one can pluck me out of thy hand." And then subjoined with a cheerful tone in Latin, "Our God is a God of salvation; our Lord delivereth from death."

He appeared to be fast sinking, and the Countess of Mansfeld again administered some cordials and directed him to be bathed with spirits. Then Dr. Jonas said to him, "Most beloved father, do you still hold on to Christ, the Son of God, our Saviour and Redeemer?" His faded countenance once more brightened, his clear blue eye sparkled with intelligence, and he replied, in a distinct and thrilling tone, "O yes." He then folded his hands across his bosom, turned his face a little on one side, and began breathing softly and gently as a sleeping infant. His eyes were becoming fixed in their sockets, the glassy hue of death was fast gathering on them, when one of the old men in attendance, who had been his companion in childhood, (and who in bad weather had often carried the favorite little Martin to school in his arms,) in that awful moment, forgetting entirely the mighty reformer, and thinking only of the friend of his heart, knelt down by the sofa, and putting his arm across his bosom, and face to his cheek, exclaimed, in the plaintive tones of childhood, "Martin, dear Martin, do speak to me once more!" But there was no reply. The mighty spirit had already gone. Before the words were fully uttered, Luther was already with Moses, with Paul, with John and with Christ; and in the last only did he find a superior. The Countess of Mansfeld would not be persuaded that he was dead. Even when she heard the death-rattle in his throat, and after that all was still; when she saw his lips open with a slight and scarcely perceptible gasp, and then move no more, still, with all a woman's perseverance and hopefulness, she stood intently watching his face, and anxiously rubbing now his feet, and now his hands, till at last, perceiving that they grew ice-cold to her touch, and she could warm them no more, hope was forced from her, and she turned from the couch, threw herself into a chair, and covered her face, and wept like one who refuses to be comforted.

Luther died of cancer in the stomach, or angina pectoris, at half-past two o'clock on Tuesday morning, February 18, 1546, at the age of sixty-two years, three months, and ten days. As he seemed to anticipate, his native city, by a singular providence, became also the place of his death.

Luther's death, though peaceful and full of unwavering confidence in Christ and his Gospel, was not so joyous and ecstatic as that of many a Christian in humble life. For this, two reasons may be assigned:

1. His personal hopes were never of the exhilerating kind. Of himself, he was often distrustful; it was only in respect to the cause in which he was engaged, that he was always undoubtingly confident.

2. He was probably, during the whole time, suffering excruciating bodily pain. Though he said but little about it, it is evident from what he did say, that his sufferings were extreme. And it must have been so, for he had a mighty, muscular frame to be shaken down, and such a frame could not, in so short a time, have been brought to dissolution without terrible torture.

A MYSTERY SOLVED.

The pastor of a country congregation was once riding through a part of his charge, accompanied by a neighboring minister. When they reached a certain point, the pastor called the attention of his companion to two adjoining farms, and said, "On those farms reside two men, brothers-in-law, the one an elder, the other a deacon, in my church. Each has a large family of children, the eldest of whom are already men and women. The fathers are of about the same age, of the same social position, and much alike as to intelligence and information. The elder, however, is a very devout and earnest Christian, having some defects, indeed, but still recognized by all who know him as a truly godly man. The deacon, on the contrary, is what is often called "a hard Christian." He may be, and I trust he is, a child of God, but he is so worldly in his spirit, and there are so many inconsistencies in his conversation and deportment, that he is a grief of heart to me and to his brethren. He was brought into the deaconship by accident, but, his term of office once expired, he will never again be made an office-bearer in Christ's house. But here is a strange fact in the history of these two men, one over which I have often puzzled myself in vain, and which I wish you would explain to me. The pious and consistent elder carries his religion into his family, and is faithful in the discharge of parental duties, yet not one of his numerous children gives any appearance, much less makes any profession, of having undergone a saving change. They are apparently the most insensible and hopeless of my young people. On the other hand, the deacon is just as careless at home as he is abroad, and, I am sure, does not set the example before his family that he should; yet all of his children who have reached years of discretion are, with one exception, hopefully pious, and those who are younger give every reason to believe that as they advance in years they will give their hearts to God. Can you tell me the cause of this strange difference? Does the Lord put a premium upon inconsistency and indifference? Or is this one of those hard knots sometimes met with in providence and in grace, which nothing but the doctrine of the divine sovereignty can untie?

The minister to whom these inquiries were addressed was greatly the pastor's senior in years and service. He therefore shook his head and smiled, and then quietly asked, "What sort of women are the mothers of these two families?" The pastor at once clapped his hands in wondering surprise, and exclaimed, "Truly, the mystery is solved! The elder's wife is a professor of religion, but her light is hid under a bushel. Charity may hope well of her, but she is one of those disciples of whom one would not knotw the religious character, except for their regular attendance upon the Lord's Supper. She may be concerned for the spiritual welfare of her children, but she gives no sign of it to others, and, I very much fear, none of it to themselves. But the deacon's wife is eminently spiritual-minded. Religion with her is undeniably the chief concern. Her heart is in it. She is instant in prayer, and, no doubt, intercedes fervently for her children, while diligent in the use of all proper means to lead them to the Saviour. Now I see my mistake. In studying this case, I thought of the father's character and influence as the only or chief agency in shaping the spiritual character of the household, whereas that place belongs to the mother."

Who can doubt the justness of this solution? Much has been written on the subject of a mother's influence, but the half has not been told. And though there are some who scout the idea as a romantic delusion, or the mere offspring of gallantry to the sex, it is in the main true, that the children's moral character depends (under God) upon that of their mother. The incident above cited is but one of a thousand. The whole history of the church is lined with similar cases. In this view, how important to the church is the character of those who are to be the mothers of her children! And how important to every young man the character of her who is to be the head of his household and the moulder of its spiritual relations! These are matters which extend very far. They cover all of life, they take hold of eternity. Happy that land, that church, that household, the types of whose mothers are to be found in Jochebed and Hannah, in Elizabeth and Eunice!

ST. PETER'S CHURCH.—The minds and resources of forty-three Popes were employed for three hundred and fifty years in this stupendous work. Its cost exceeded ten millions sterling; nor is there now wealth enough in the Papal treasury to purchase it; all Catholic Christendom were put under contribution to build it—and even the vilest lusts and passions of fallen humanity were taxed for its completion; for it, indulgences were sold, and liberty to crime granted, and hell itself aroused to effort.

CONSEQUENCES OF SIN HERE AND HEREAFTER.

A certain system of theology, very prevalent at the present day, teaches that the penalty of sin is suffered only in this life. The doctrine of pardon, in the sense in which it is commonly received, is rejected, and the idea is set forth, with much pertinacity, that the punishment of sin cannot be avoided. There is no remission of punishment, according to this system, either on account of the Saviour's death, or the sinner's repentance; and the person who has been forgiven has, nevertheless, suffered the proper punishment of his sins. As nearly as we can understand the system, it is this:—that pardon is the manifestation of God's unchangeable love to the sinner, after due justice has been administered.

We are not about to spring a controversy with those who hold this view, but we suggest whether it does not originate in defective apprehensions of the nature of sin. Do not the believers in this doctrine measure the evil of sin merely by the injury which it inflicts upon society? If we mistake not, the opinion is very generally entertained by them, that all the evil—all the enormity and aggravation—there is in sin, consists in the injury which it does to our race. The relation which it has to God seems not to be taken into account. Indeed, it seems to be supposed that, as God cannot be injured by our obliquities nor profited by our righteousness, so he could have no particular objection to sin, were it not for the mischief which it creates in the world. At all events, whether this is the opinion held by the advocates of the theological system above referred to or not, it is an opinion which commands the assent of great numbers, and as such we shall comment upon it.

Our deviations from moral rectitude are to be regarded in a two-fold light:—1. As disobedience to the commands of God. 2. As injuries to mankind. And here, let it be remarked, we do not allude to the division sometimes made of the Divine Law into First and Second Tables; the first comprising those duties which are to be rendered directly to God, and the second those which are to be performed directly towards our fellow creatures. We speak of all duties whatever. Those which directly concern the interests of our fellow creatures, such as obedience to parents, respect for a neighbor's property, regard for his life, and so on, are nevertheless enjoined upon us by the authority of God, and it is impossible for us to violate them without offering an affront to his authority.

If now the question be asked, To what extent do we suffer for our sins in this life? we answer, to just that extent in which they are injurious to our fellow creatures. But as far as there is any guilt or criminality in our sins, considered as committed against God, the punishment is not inflicted in this life. He that is disrespectful to his parents, brings grief to their hearts, and in old age neglects them, will reap the fruits of his behaviour, before he leaves this world. Should he become a parent himself, in all probability the conduct of his own children will bring a terrible retribution upon him. He that is contentious or churlish with his neighbors, will be punished in the scorn and violence which will be visited upon him in return. He that robs or cheats his fellow man, will thereby bring upon himself so much trouble, that he will wish he had not undertaken it. In general, with what measure he metes, it shall be measured to him again. So far, indeed, as his conduct operates injuriously to his fellow creatures, he is punished here to the full extent that his offenses deserve.

The fact that this kind of retribution is so often witnessed, and is a matter of such universal experience, is probably one reason why it is taken to be all the punishment that is due to transgression. But all this retribution, be it observed, is simply the manner in which God avenges the injuries and wrongs which our fellow creatures suffer by reason of our evil doings. The offense to himself, involved in these injuries and wrongs, is not thus requited. That is reserved for a judgment to come.

Is there not, then, a moral turpitude in sin, over and above what consists in the injury which it does to our fellow creatures? Is there not a heinousness in it, considered as committed against God? Is it not the abominable thing which He hates? Is not the way of the wicked declared to be "an abomination to the Lord?" Are not divers weights, diverse measures, the false balance, lying lips, the heart that deviseth wicked imaginations, the hands that shed innocent blood, abominations to God, as well as injurious to men? Are not these and many other sins spoken of in the Scriptures of truth as being opposed to the holiness of God's nature? Does not God loathe them? Surely, their heinousness consists in their loathsome contrariety to the essential goodness and perfection of his own nature; and it is solely on this account, that the wicked can have no place in the kingdom of heaven. The man who merely looks on a woman to lust after her, has offered her no injury, neither has he injured him whose wife she is; nevertheless, he has committed adultery with her already in his heart. That is, he is just as loathsome in God's sight, as if he had actually committed the deed. He carries himself with as much opposition to God's will, he has the same unwillingness to be restrained, the same unreconciled heart, the same want of complacency in God's holiness, as the open adulterer.

What was it that opened the eyes of Saul of Tarsus to the true nature of sin? He was not blind to the fact that all deviations from righteousness were injurious to society. He knew that all sin was mischievous in its tendency, and felt the importance of leading such a life that no man could justly blame him. Nevertheless, sin had not yet appeared to him "exceeding sinful," simply because he had not yet seen it in the light of "the commandment." But the very moment that he looked upon it as forbidden by God, and as possessing an enormity on that account, then, and not till then, he saw it in its true character. Rom. 7: 7—13.

As against God, sin is infinitely more aggravated—more loathsome—more exceeding sinful—than as an injury to man. True, God is infinitely happy in himself, nor can his eternal serenity be disturbed by all that a sinner can do. But the turpitude of a crime consists more in the state of heart which it manifests than in the amount of mischief actually accomplished. The character of the person against whom the crime is committed is also reckoned as modifying the offense. To abuse a person of low reputation may argue some baseness of heart; but to abuse one whose praise is in every body's mouth—a good man—a man of standing excellence, and withal a benefactor of his race—who but the most abandoned wretch would be guilty of it? To abuse the great God, therefore, is to abuse infinite goodness. It is to despise and make destructive onslaught upon all the goodness in the universe; for it all centers in God. Hence there is an infinite evil in sin, which all the affections of this life are insufficient to requite. He in whose heart it reigns unsubdued, cannot enjoy God.

To us, therefore, it appears that the nature of sin against God is such as necessarily to require a future day of reckoning. It is worthy of note, that those who are enlightened as to its true nature, and feel themselves vile when contrasting themselves with the holiness of their Creator, (Job 42: 5, 6, Isa. 6: 5,) and in the spirit of self-abasement learn to say, "Against thee, thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight," never feel like finding fault with God "because he hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness." BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

GLASGOW, November 26, 1852.

In the House of Lords, our Prime Minister, the Earl of Derby, has this week given his views relative to the opening of the Crystal Palace on Sunday afternoons. Availing himself of the opportunity afforded by an adverse petition being presented, he stated that he had received a vast number of Memorials urging that a clause should be inserted in the charter to be granted to the Company, prohibiting its being opened on any part of Sunday. He, however, still believed, that instead of its being unfavorable to religion, it would promote the interests of morality—if opened only to the extent and under the regulations which the promoters had agreed to adopt in a draft charter which had been submitted to him. In the length to which they had gone, he and the parties interested had proceeded on the assumption that there was nothing in the law at present which would prevent the exhibition being opened, either in whole or in part, on Sunday; and that, therefore, the restrictions proposed and accepted were regarded as limitatious rather than facilities in the use of the building and grounds, the opening of which he considered would be productive of very great advantages. But a charter cannot make legal what is illegal by statute; and there is an old law which prohibits the taking of money for admission to any place of amusement on Sunday, which, if applicable to the Crystal Palace, would prevent its being opened on that day. This point was now under the consideration of the law-officers of the crown; and if it should be regarded as applicable, the matter would be submitted to the decision of Parliament, which had the remedy in its hands, should it be deemed proper to use it; and this, he believed, would be in accordance with the feeling of a large proportion of the population of the country.

Lord Campbell expressed his satisfaction with the statement, and trusted it would be satisfactory also to the great majority of the people, as he believed it would be conducive to morality and religion. He believed they might safely go farther in this direction, and that the opening also of the Art Union, and similar exhibitions, would materially tend to prevent the debauchery which prevails on Sunday. There is such an act in force as that to which the noble Earl referred, but he hoped Parliament would prevent its being applied to such places as the Crystal Palace.

Were Sunday indeed the Sabbath of the Lord, and subject to the regulations of His Sabbath law, the soundness of the arguments and anticipations so expressed might well be questioned. Amid the professions on the subject, therefore, it seems not a little remarkable, that not a voice was lifted up in protest on the occasion. All the Bishops were silent; and even the Earl of Shaftesbury allowed the subject to drop without a remark—for he was not only present, but was the next speaker, addressing the Prime Minister about Convocation. But there are those without the walls of Parliament who can too correctly appreciate the effects of the Sunday exhibition at the Palace for the million, on this ordinance of their own, to allow the question to rest.

Another church agitation may be anticipated—although, when directed to Parliament in favor of Sunday, likely to be fruitless. The Rev. D. Wilson, Islington, has addressed a letter to the Times, reiterating statements made by him as to the misconduct of Sunday visitors at Hampton Court Palace, which statements had been impugned in that paper by Mr. W. C. Selle, organist at her Majesty's Chapel, Hampton Court. In strong terms he had vouched for the orderly conduct of the thousands of Sunday pleasure-seekers who resort to that place of recreation. The Patriot newspaper, one of the journals of the Independents, which formerly objected to legislative measures for the enforcement of Sunday, has now taken a different course, and rebukes the Nonconformist for being too lax. It is giving in supplements Conder's Law of the Sabbath, so misnamed.

The Tractarians made a bold attempt to convert Convocation into a reality, by sitting three days discussing the Address to the Queen—which is usually voted without discussion. They, however, got no farther than the Address, and are sorely galled by repeated declarations of Ministers, that they are determined to oppose any attempt at enacting Canons for the regulation of the Church. The earnest leaders are said to have taken so much to heart this determination to prevent all exercise of power in the church, that they are about to secede, and join the Episcopal Church of Scotland, which is even more Popish in its Articles than that of England. This step has probably been suggested, at all events it has been anticipated, by the Right Honorable W. E. Gladstone, M. P., who some time ago united himself with the Scotch Church, although, in a published correspondence, he shows himself very indignant at the Rev. Dr. McCaul, for saying in a public meeting, that in so doing he had left the Church of England. The Scottish Episcopalians, having no state endowments, may avow, if they please, all the errors of Popery, without disguise or equivocation; and they may enact whatever Canons their people will submit to—circumstances which will probably be regarded as of no small value by those Tractarians who are denied them in England, and have only their endowments as an equivalent.

The Morning Herald states that a convention was signed in London, this day week, in the name of England, France, Russia, Bavaria, and Greece, stipulating that the Kings of Greece must, hereafter, be of the Greek Church. The present King is a Roman Catholic. J. A. BEGG.

THE PALESTINE MISSION.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

It is an adage, that to plead after judgment is useless; so in this matter. When the decision was pending on the adoption of a new field of missionary effort, it should have been the policy of the advocates of the several fields to urge their claims for consideration. But when the question has been decided, it may be deemed not only useless, but troublesome, to continue to plead. I will not, therefore, offer this with the hope that has to some small extent inspired my pen, as there is no probability of means being furnished to sustain a Palestine Mission in connection with those already adopted, even if there was a probability of the Board having their doubts removed, and their deficiencies supplied. Still, there is a satisfaction in reviewing our position, and the claims that are urged for the occupation of this field.

These claims are based on the following considerations, viz: 1st. The promise of God to Israel, which secures their restoration to their own country, after their long and last dispersion. No prophecy of Scripture is more precise and clear than those adduced to establish this point. They are undeniable and unmistakable, and the New Testament is equally as clear as the Old. 2d. The time is intimated by the prophet Daniel, whose testimony is corroborated by our Saviour; and chronologists and the best commentators on the prophecies concur, that the time fixed for the termination of their dispersion is near at hand, if it has not actually transpired, and may now only await their own efforts to re-establish their own government. 3d. Their repentance and reformation is not only foretold by the prophets, but their conversion to Christianity is asserted by the apostle Paul, in Rom. xi., showing that, though broken off in unbelief, they will be grafted into their own olive tree, and again be the people of God; and, what is more, he has disclosed the purposes of God in breaking them off, that the Gentiles might be grafted in, and that blindness in part has happened to them, until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in, and so all Israel shall be saved. Have they stumbled that they should fall? asks the Apostle. This, he infers, was not the purpose of God; "God forbid;" but his purpose was, that through their fall salvation should come to the Gentiles, to provoke them to jealousy. "Now, if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles, how much more their fullness; for if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the recieving of them be but LIFE FROM THE DEAD?" In this prediction, or rather declaration, of the Apostle, as to the effect, the church and the world are greatly interested—a moral resurrection of the church from apathy, division, opposition, and strife, to a glorious eminence of harmony and love, and all the results of a full recognition of the claims of Christianity on the church and the governments of the world—enough to awaken ardor in the Christian bosom, and, if susceptible of enthusiasm, to inspire it. And the appointed time is at hand. This point is as well settled as any other.

But the Jews are still in unbelief. Their conversion is to be effected by means, and God's means and instruments for converting the world are the church. But the Jews have rejected Christ, and the pride of the human heart is opposed to concession. They have the law and the prophets, and receive the moral law as we do, as the perfection of his wisdom, and unchangeable. And every Christian missionary who has been sent to them, has presented an inconsistency, to them unreconcilable with their high pretension, in the change of the Sabbath, which to the Jew is evidence that their mission is not of God. They have uniformly sought to disconnect them from their people, and the hopes of a glorious future, which they so confidently cherish. Having transferred all their promises to the church, they seek to denationalize them. Yet, with all these inconsistencies, some are proselyted.

The Seventh-day Baptists present to them a different attitude. They observe the Sabbath; they allow them their national rites, nor seek to disconnect them from the anticipation of Israel's glorious future. They are informed by others, that the Sabbath was changed by Christ, or by his sanction, which presents to them a defect in his character and pretensions. But we not only disabuse his character, and Christianity, of this inconsistency, but in our pretensions we are not chargeable with the inconsistency, and we have ready access, and a degree of their confidence. In this position we are sustained by all considerate men. Mr. Wolff, the indefatigable Jewish missionary, admitted it freely, and conceded that we would have a great advantage over others in approaching the Jew, and Gentile Christians would have greatly the advantage over the proselyted Jew; and in this view there is a concurrence of opinion. With this work before the church, and the guaranty of God's word for its success, with the almost inconceivable advantage we possess over other Christians for the work, from the near approach of the anticipated period to realize our hopes, how can we doubt of duty, or hesitate on the importance of immediate action? Those who recognize the lead of Providence in auspicious circumstances, of however inconsiderable a nature, surely should be able to offer very satisfactory reasons for doubting a lead of Providence in such a combination of circumstances.

It is not that more sympathy is felt, or anxiety experienced, for the salvation of those who crucified the Saviour, (although I doubt the propriety of the charge resting on them, more than on the Gentiles, and certainly not on the present generation,) than for others of Gentile races; but, in the conversion of the Jews as a people, the salvation of the world is promoted to a most important extent. Both the end, and the means, are in accordance with the promise of God, in prophecies of Scripture; and whoever, in my opinion, has the most general and enlarged missionary ardor, has the most ample scope for his benevolence for the whole world in his ardor and enthusiasm for that people and that field exclusively.

It may be asked, Why, what advantage has Palestine as a station over Honan in China? I answer, Palestine is the country and home of the Jew; all his sympathies are there; and all the Jews, from all countries, that have intercourse with the world, correspond with that country; it is the land of promise, and their religious metropolis. The law to them goes forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. So, whatever effect is produced by our missionary efforts in Palestine, is heralded all over the world. And should Christianity be adopted by the authorities, it would become the signal for the Jews in every quarter of the world. We have, it is true, a promise for the conversion of the world to encourge us, but a special and specific promise for Israel; for, with all their stubborness, they must bow to the sceptre of Immanuel, or the Scriptures are not understood. But the conversion of Jews in any other part of the world would be less conspicuous, and would have less importance attached to it. Like substances deposited in the stream; they may affect the waters below, but will not approach the fountain. The Jews of Honan are an isolated people; they are separated from the Jews of all the world. The vast sandy deserts which separate them from the North and East, have shut them out from even the knowledge that the Messiah was expected, or that Jesus Christ was crucified at Jerusalem, though nearly two thousand years have intervened. Their happiness and salvation are worthy the efforts of the benevolent, and I am not surprised that brethren Carpenter and Wardner should feel disposed to lend them all the aid they are able to afford; and I hope our missionaries in China will be encouraged to test the practicability of doing them good. They, like the Jews of primitive times, received the Christians as merely a sect of their own religion, and may be favorably affected. But their ignorance will not long remain. In the study of Christianity, the truth will appear, and they will know that Christ, who claimed to be the true Messiah, was rejected of their nation eighteen hundred years ago, and their present ignorance will avail us but little. Better, like the primitive missionaries, go up to Jerusalem at once, and if they succeed there, the battle is won, and the controversy ended. The consideration is one of time only. Is it now time? is all the question. Palestine as a station is easy of access, only separated from us by a voyage of a few weeks, and reached as readily as some portions of the States; while Honan, from Shanghae, would be as difficult of access as Palestine from America, and attended with greater expense, and far more dangerous to life and property. Those who discover a lead of Providence in the application for instruction by Jews from Honan, will, I doubt not, find them every where, when our missionaries come in contact with that people, or whenever consistent Sabbath-keeping Christians come in contact with them. It affords a favorable introduction, the effects of which can never be lost. What is said of Honan might, to some extent, be applicable to any station out of the Holy Land. If they become interested or alarmed at the advances of Christianity, nothing is more certain than that the subject must go up to Jerusalem, as that is their great citadel, and place of defense.

I have now given a summary of my views on this subject. It is an ample subject, the details of which might fill a volume, independent of those gratifying indications of Providence, in the position and prosperity and favor shown to Meshullam in his attempt to fertilize the soil of that country, the Providential acquaintance with Sabbath-keepers, and the favor with which he is regarded by Jews, Turks, and the traveling Arabs, his resistance hitherto of the temptations which have assailed him, and sought to detach him from the Sabbath interests, and that while all the Christian world was before him, he has turned his face to America, and that among all the families of Protestant Christians our denomination has attracted his eye, and his hands have been stretched out to us for assistance. However poor we might be, if silver and gold we could not supply, we might have bestowed on him what might have been more advantageous, faithful counsellors, to encourage his heart, and stay his hands in the truth, by establishing a mission in his neighborhood. Should he fail to maintain the patience and integrity of Job, and sink under the influence of the powers and temptation, opposed, for want of timely aid, our responsibility will be great, and great may be our chagrin and mortification; and if God shall, through our tardiness, employ other agents, and reject us from this glorious work, for which he has qualified and sustained us, our sorrow will be equal to our mortification.

I shall be sorry, if by thus having occupied so much space in your columns, and expressed my views so unreservedly, I shall have extinguished the growing ardor of any; and I am sure that if the fire is of a genuine kind, a little cold water will not quench it, nor the floods drown it. It will live and flourish against opposition and deferred hopes. It is probable, that I shall not volunteer to say any more on this subject, though I shall make no promises; but I hope some more skillful pen will be enlisted, and be made successful in convincing the churches of their privilege and duty, and present them in a more attractive light. ANTIQUARIAN RESEARCHES.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I have learned from the Minutes of the General Conference, that at its last session in Plainfield, N. J., I was appointed one of a committee to collect facts connected with the history of the denomination. I have recently had presented to me, by a friend, a volume of the printed Minutes of the Philadelphia Baptist Association—the first Baptist Association in America—for one hundred years, from 1707 to 1807; and believing that a few extracts may be in accordance with my appointment, and may elicit similar information from some now living, who may be in the possession of interesting facts connected with the same particulars, if this should come to knowledge, I send you the following for publication:—

At a meeting of the Association in Philadelphia, 1724:

A query concerning the Fourth Commandment, whether changed, altered, or diminished.

Ans.—We refer to the Confession of Faith, set forth by the elders and brethren, met in London, 1639, and owned by us, chapter 22, secs. 7 and 8.

At a meeting of the Association in Philadelphia, in 1730, a query was presented from the church in Cohansie: In case a member of a regular church separate himself on the account of the seventh day, and join himself to those that hold the same for a Sabbath; when at the same time the church he was a member of allowed that if it was to him a matter of conscience he might observe it, and keep his place where he was a member, and that they would respect him as they used to do; yet nevertheless he goes away and presumes to be a leader among the aforesaid seventh-day people; what must the church do in such a case, in order to discharge their duty?

Resolved, That it is the duty of such a church, in as moderate a way and manner as they can, to disown such member, so as he may not be looked upon to be a member any further with them on any account. Page 31.

At a meeting of the Association in Philadelphia, 1752, a query was presented from the Church at Scotch Plains, Whether a person observing the seventh day as a Sabbath, and keeping the first day in condescension, may be received into membership?

Resolved, That such may be, provided nothing else appears to the contrary. Page 70.

At a meeting of the Association in Philadelphia, 1771, the petition of Mr. Ebenezer David, a student in Rhode Island College, was granted to the amount of £14, he giving bond to the trustees to return the money in case their intention of the benefactor should not be answered. Page 118.

[It will be remembered, that Ebenezer David was a Seventh-day Baptist, and died while a chaplain in the American Army.]

At a meeting of the Association in Philadelphia, 1773, the case of Henry Daveson, late of London, now of Newport, R. I., came before the Association. Agreed, that Messrs. Samuel Jones, David Jones, David Sutton, Henry Williams, and Joseph Hart, be a committee to consider the matter, and make their report. They met and reported as follows: As it doth appear to us, that the said Henry Daveson hath deposited all his substance in a safe hand for the benefit of his creditors, and otherwise manifested a suitable inclination, and endeavors to the utmost of his abilities to pay and discharge his debts, we are of opinion that any record or minute formally made by this Association respecting him, should and ought to become null and void, as if the same had not been made.

The Association agreed thereto, and the records were made void.

N. B. The reason of our having to do with Mr. Dawson, was, that till late he professed himself to be a First-day Baptist, but now is in the observance of the seventh day. Page 129.

In the minutes of the Association at its meeting in 1790, are given the statistics of the Seventh-day Baptists, as follows: Churches 12, Ministers 15, total 2000.

At a meeting of the Association in Philadelphia, in 1796, a query from the Baptist Church at Dividing Creek: This Association think it inexpedient to admit Mr. German (a Seventh-day Baptist) to administer the ordinances among them, inasmuch as those of his own society will not commune with us, and also as it may be productive of confusion and disorder. DEDICATION OF CHILDREN.

ALFRED CENTER, Dec. 7, 1852.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I have read with much interest the article headed "MOTHERHEART," by William M. Fahnestock, M. D., in the Recorder of December 2d, and, if I rightly understand him, his position is, that the Saviour did ordain as a rite to be observed in his church, that little children should be brought, and that hands should be put upon them, and prayer offered for them. So understanding him, I beg to ask of him, if consistent with his sense of duty and propriety, to present his proof for the same.

Yours for the right, N. V. HULL.

Happening in the office of the Recorder on the arrival of the above communication, I avail myself of the opportunity the circumstance affords, to add a word, and thereby save delay.

If "N. V. Hull" will re-read that portion of my article commending the dedication of children, he will find the scriptural proof on which the rite is predicated sufficiently referred to; which I am sure could not have escaped that brother's keen observation; but as the whole design may be—as a mutual friend at my elbow suggests—to call me out in a more elaborate exposition of that subject, (being there only incidentally introduced,) I append a remark or two for immediate consideration.

If that be the purpose of the communication, I shall be happy to comply with his wishes some time hereafter, should my life be spared; but at present my mind is so pressed with anxious cares and responsibilities, that I can scarcely find sleep for my eyelids, besides having on hand several engagements for literary contributions of no inconsiderable length, which require a deal of recondite research; still, so soon as I dispatch them, and can command sufficient leisure, I shall turn to this matter cheerfully. In the mean time, as a good farmer generally goes over his lawns and meadows early in the spring, before the grass is up much, to pick off the loose stones, which may impede the cutting of the crop; and as I am, just now, exceedingly hurried, it will be kind, it will be neighborly, in my good brother, to step in and do that important office for me, as I may wish to borrow his scythe, and should be sorely distressed "to dull it" for him. In other words, as Elder Hull is expert at asking questions, and I have no doubt is equally expert at answering them, he may greatly expedite the object sought—1. By defining the meaning of religious ordinance, and naming the positive ordinances absolutely imposed on the Christian church, by explicit scriptural injunction, and then those ministered solely on inference; 2. By defining the import of religious rite, and showing the difference between a rite and an ordinance, and enumerating the rites of the New Testament clearly commanded, and then those administered on inference; 3. By defining the signification of religious ensample, in reference to the examples of the blessed Master, and stating when they are operative and when a nullity, and distinguishing between the examples of ordinances and rites expressed in words, and those taught by example, and, also, when barely intimated, yet accompanied with the example, the pattern, the formula; 4. By defining the extent of scriptural privilege, so far at least as it is legitimate to give an external manifestation to the conscientious impulses of our nature, and detailing the instances to the point from the Scriptures; 5. By defining the interpretation of religious dedication, and exhibiting prominent scriptural illustrations, and examining whether such dedications confer peculiar capabilities and rights on all persons and things so dedicated; 6. By defining religious consecration, and proving that religious consecration is always designed to vouchsafe holiness on all persons and things thus consecrated; 7. By defining religious duty, and expounding the Gospel law of duty, as applying to the ordinances, rites, examples, privileges, dedications, and consecrations, which that law makes obligatory on all and every disciple of the lowly Jesus—who significantly says, If a man love me, he will keep my words. Then I may comprehend what proof Bro. Hull wants, and then I shall come in and define consecrated association, which is all that I claim for the rite or privilege of dedicating children unto the Lord; for I have not claimed in the least degree, much less asserted, that it confers church membership, or any particular rights, on the child, but simply presents a claim to the care of the church; for whatever is solemnly dedicated or consecrated to the Lord, after his own pattern and formula, should ever be under the abiding care of His Church.

REVIVAL IN BERLIN.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

It may be interesting to the friends of Zion to learn, that we have been enjoying a precious revival of religion in Berlin, N. Y. About the first of September last, the Church gave brother Lester C. Rogers, of Waterford, Ct., a call to pay them a visit, which was accepted. Soon after his arrival, he commenced labors in one of the school-districts within the bounds of the Society, and it soon became apparent that God was pouring out his Holy Spirit and converting sinners. Some fifteen or twenty were hopefully converted, and twelve came forward and made their offering to the church. About this time, brother Rogers was joined by Bro. H. H. Baker, of Waterford, and since that time the good work has been steadily progressing. Two weeks last Sabbath, Bro. Baker baptized fifteen, who were received to membership in the church. Yesterday he baptized thirteen more, who also have been received; and others there are who will probably go forward soon. May the Lord continue his gracious work. JOHN WHITFORD.

BERLIN, N. Y., Dec. 6, 1852.

MISSIONARY LABOR AND RELIGIOUS INTEREST.—A communication from Eld. Hiram P. Burdick, of Hartsville, Allegany Co., N. Y., gives us some account of his labors, during a part of the last four or five months, as a sort of volunteer missionary. Leaving Hartsville in the early part of June, he visited Troupsburg, N. Y., Tioga Co., Pa, Westfield, Scio, Amity, Belvidere, and Olean, N. Y., preaching in each of those places, and in some of them several times. While at Olean, he was invited by Eld. Phineas S. Crandall, pastor of the 3d Genesee Church, and preacher a part of the time for the 2d Genesee Church, to assist him in conducting a meeting in progress in those churches. Between the 27th of August and the early part of October, Eld. H. P. Green baptized two persons, Eld. Burdick two, and Eld. Crandall thirty-six. It was thought that about ninety had been hopefully converted, and the work was still in progress, at last accounts.

LIBERAL BENEFICENCE.—The Church of the Puritans in New York recently contributed nearly $1,500 to the American Tract Society in a plate collection; and the amount has since been considerably increased by voluntary offerings. A gentleman in this City handed a check for $1,000 to one of the officers of the Society, unsolicited, as an expression of interest in its beneficent enterprises, and of gratitude for worldly prosperity. Another citizen sent the Treasurer a donation of $600 anonymously, and a lady gave a check for $250 to aid in liquidating the Society's debt.

OUR PUBLICATIONS.—With the present number The Sabbath Recorder enters upon the last half of the current volume. The Sabbath-School Visitor and The Seventh-day Baptist Memorial both enter upon new volumes with the new year. Now, therefore, is the time to commence taking these publications. Will not the friends of the Publishing Society consider this matter, and at this favorable season of the year make an effort to increase our lists of subscribers?

DR. JUDSON'S FAMILY.—On Sunday afternoon, Dec. 5th, at the Sansom-st. Church, Philadelphia, Rev. Dr. Dowling baptized Miss Abbie Judson, eldest daughter of the venerated missionary. Mrs. E. C. Judson is in the enjoyment of improved health, and will spend the ensuing winter in Philadelphia, whose climate is more congenial than that of her home in New York.

HOSPITAL FOR CHILDREN.—The incipient steps have been taken for the establishment in this city of a hospital exclusively for the children of indigent parents, similar to those which exist in some of the principal cities of Europe. Those concerned in the movement, whose medical experience had led to a thorough investigation of the subject, are deeply impressed with the necessity for such an institution. Records of mortality for the last sixteen years show that forty-nine per cent. of the whole number of deaths are of children under ten years; and the proportion appears to be on the increase. A prominent cause of this fatality is supposed to be the crowded condition in which a large class of the population live. It is proposed to establish a permanent hospital for the sick children of the poor, as one of the necessary measures for their relief. "St. Nicholas Hospital" is the name suggested.

TWENTY DOLLARS REWARD FOR A PREACHER.—The following paragraph, headed "Twenty Dollars Reward," appeared in a recent number of the New Orleans Picayune:

"Run away from the plantation of the undersigned, the negro man Shedrick, a preacher, 5 feet 9 inches high, about 40 years old, but looking not over 23, stamped N. E. on the breast, and having both small toes cut off. He is of a very dark complexion, with eyes small but bright, and a look quite insolent. He dresses good, and was arrested as a runaway at Donaldsonville some three years ago. The above reward will be paid for his arrest, by addressing Messrs. Armant, Brothers, St. James parish, or A. Miltenberger & Co., 30 Carondelet-st."

FOUR CROPS IN NINE MONTHS.—I harvested in nine months of the present year, from about 1½ acres of ground, four good crops, as follows:—100 lbs. sugar, and some gallons of molasses; 40 cords good sugar wood, together with some oak and chesnut rails; 18 cart-loads good cheese pumpkins; 11 cart-loads good sound corn. Can the rich and productive prairies of the West compete with this?

J. F. RANDOLPH.

NEW MILTON, Doddridge Co., Va., Dec. 1852.

Proceedings in Congres last Week.

SECOND-DAY, DEC. 6.

The SENATE was called to order at 12 o'clock, by Hon. W. R. King, and a quorum being present, proceeded to business. C. W. Cathcart, appointed to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. Whitcomb, of Indiana, was sworn in. The credentials of Archibald Dixon, Senator elect by the Legislature of Kentucky, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Henry Clay, were read, and discussion upon the question of reception occupied the remainder of the day, with the exception of the time necessary to hear the President's Message.

The HOUSE was called to order by the Speaker a few minutes after 12 o'clock, and as the roll was called by the Clerk, 182 members answered to their names. Sherrard Clemens, of Va., and Wm. Preston, of Ky., were qualified and took their seats. The usual Committees to announce the opening of the session to the Senate and the President were appointed. Among the various resolutions offered, one by Mr. Lane was adopted, instructing the Committee on Territories to inquire into the expediency of forming all that part of Oregon North of the Columbia River into a new Territory. On the receipt of the President's Message, Mr. Stephens, of Georgia, moved to dispense with the reading, but so much opposition was made, that it was finally read by the Clerk, three-fourths of the members retiring meanwhile.

THIRD-DAY, DEC. 7.

In the SENATE, Mr. Clemens gave notice of a bill to confer the rank of Lieut. General upon Gen. Scott; Rev. C. M. Butler was elected chaplain; and the remainder of the day was spent in discussing Mr. Dixon's claim to a seat.

In the HOUSE, there was rather a warm discussion on the Tariff, without results; a motion was adopted to print and refer the Message; and Rev. James Gallagher was appointed Chaplain.

FOURTH-DAY, DEC. 8.

Among the items of business in the Senate, the most important were, notice of a bill by Mr. Chase, granting all the unsold and unappropriated public lands in Ohio to that State; the introduction of a joint resolution by Mr. Clemens, conferring the rank of Lieutenant General by brevet on Maj. Gen. Scott; and notice of a bill from Mr. Gwin, granting public lands for the construction of a Railroad from the Mississippi to the Pacific Ocean; after which Mr. Dixon's claim to a seat in that body was taken up. After considerable talk, the subject was laid over till Second-day.

In the HOUSE, the Standing Committees were announced, nearly the same as at the last session. Mr. Houston reported a bill, making an appropriation of $20,000 as compensation for the Electoral Messengers, which was, after some debate, passed. Mr. Scudder, of Mass., then rose and announced the death of his colleague, Mr. Orrin Fowler, paid a tribute to his memory, and submitted the usual resolutions, which were passed, and the House then adjourned.

FIFTH-DAY, DEC. 9.

In the SENATE, the proceedings possessed no special interest. Certain accounts of the United States Treasury, and one of unexpended appropriations from the Department of the Interior, were laid before that body. Mr. Hale's resolution to repeal the rule which prevents the usual honors to the memory of members deceased during the recess, was rejected. After an Executive Session, the Senate adjourned at 1 P. M.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Duncan (of Mass.) announced the death of Hon. Benjamin Thompson, his former colleague, and after some appropriate remarks from him, and from Mr. Chandler, the usual resolutions passed, and the House adjourned.

SIXTH-DAY, DEC. 10.

The SENATE was not in session.

In the HOUSE, pending a motion to refer the Message, Mr. Brooks attempted to get a Special Committee on the Tariff and Revenue, and a prolonged debate ensued, without coming to any result. The House adjourued to Second-day.

California News.

The steamship Philadelphia, with California dates to Dec. 16th, arrived at New Orleans from Aspinwall. The Philadelphia sailed in company with the steamship Illinois for New York, which vessel has two and a quarter millions of gold dust on freight, and 200 passengers.

The City of Sacramento had been almost entirely destroyed by fire. Nearly every house was burned, and many lives were lost.

Destructive fires have also occurred in San Francisco and Marysville.

The State had gone for Pierce and King by about 15,000 majority.

The steam propeller City of Pittsburgh was burned at Valparaiso on the 20th October. She was owned in Philadelphia.

The clipper ship Sovereign of the Seas, Capt. McKay, from New York 4th August, had arrived out at San Francisco.

—The foregoing was received by telegraph from New Orleans. Since it was in type, the steamer Illinois has arrived at New York, with $25,000,000 in gold dust, and full details of the California news.

The fire at Sacramento is the leading feature of the news. This occurred about 11½ o'clock on Tuesday night, the 2d of November. It broke out in a millinery shop in the heart of one of the most combustible blocks in the city. The wind was blowing a perfect gale at the time from the north, and spread the flames with fearful rapidity from block to block. In the short space of three hours 1,600 houses in the city were reduced to ashes, and with them an immense amount of goods. Blocks of brick buildings, filled with costly merchandize, and all the fine public buildings, except the Court-House, went down before the fiery storm. It is estimated that $10,000,000 will scarcely cover the loss. Eight or ten lives were lost in this terrible conflagration. The citizens of Sacramento have, however, been by no means disheartened by this almost crushing disaster, but have set diligently to work rebuilding their ruined city. Within the past nine days 350 new buildings, many of brick, have been erected, and hundreds of others are rapidly going up. As soon as the news spread through the country, a universal spirit of sympathy for the unfortunate sufferers was excited—contributions for their relief were raised in the principal towns, and in ten days the citizens of San Francisco alone contributed $30,000 to relieve the most pressing wants of the sufferers.

A letter from San Francisco, dated Nov. 15, says: "While the fire at Sacramento was raging, four or five men chartered a steamboat and proceeded to San Francisco with a view of purchasing and monopolizing all the lumber, and all the provisions their money and credit would enable them to secure. They were landed in a small boat from the steamer off North Beach, and she remained a few miles out in the Bay, refusing to land any other passengers for several hours, until these had time to accomplish their unholy purpose. The steamer then came to her wharf, and the news of the fire became public. Lumber went up, in their hands, to four hundred dollars a thousand—more than 300 per cent. Flour advanced to $45, Pork to $55 and $60, and other Provisions in proportion. Goods to the amount of several millions have already been shipped from this city to Sacramento, and the demand is yet brisk. A large number of wooden buildings have been taken down here and sent to that city. Several hundred temporary buildings have already been erected there, but the 'rainy season' is upon us, and it must present a melancholy scene of suffering, sickness and destitution. God help them!"

Scarcely had the flames subsided in Sacramento, when news was received of another destructive fire on the 7th Nov., in Marysville, by which an entire block of buildings was consumed and property to the value of $100,000 destroyed.

A fire occurred in Napa Valley, and property to the amount of $60,000 was destroyed.

The farmers of Calaveras have also been visited by the terrible scourge, and a great quantity of hay and grain has been destroyed.

A fire occurred at San Diego, in which a fine building was destroyed and one person seriously injured, and a fire also occurred in Sonora, Tuolumne County, which was extinguished without causing much damage, the adjoining buildings having been torn down by the hook and ladder company.

The steamer City of Pittsburgh was burned in the Bay of Valparaiso, on the 24th of October. It is presumed the fire originated from combustion of Chili coal. She sank ten hours afterward, and no lives were lost. The measurement of the City of Pittsburgh was about 2,000 tuns. She was insured for $279,000. She carried 53 passengers, who, together with the crew of 106, are (almost all of them) left without a change of clothes.

The latest returns from the vote in France upon the Empire give, from 83 Departments, the Army and the Navy, Yeas 7,200,000, Nays 250,000. It was supposed that the result would be made known on December 1, and the Empire declared on the 2d, the anniversary of the coup d' état, and of Napoleon's coronation. Louis Napoleon has sent a message to the Legislature, stating that the change in the Government will be merely nominal.

A letter from Vienna states that Mr. Webster's death will restore relations between Austria and the United States, and that Hulsemann will return here.

SAD AND SIGNIFICANT.—A Georgia correspondent of the Janus, a German paper in New York, says that he was at Cedartown lately, when a negress was hung, and thus relates the case: The master of the negress told her that he had sold her four children to a man to whom they were to be delivered next day. The purchaser was known through the neighborhood as a tyrant and miser, who not only half-starved his slaves, but beat them brutally at every opportunity. The mother, who tenderly loved her children, was overcome with grief at the thought of having them sold to such a monster. She begged her master on her knees to keep the children, or, if they must be sold, to let them go to a more humane master. But all her efforts proving vain, and being driven to desperation, she on the following night murdered the children. This was the crime for which she was hung.

SUMMARY.

Three ladies stopping at the Adams House, Boston, went out for the purpose of seeing a fire on Wednesday night. While they were in the crowd, one of the ladies thought she perceived an attempt made to pick her pocket. She had about $1,000, and some articles of jewelry with her, which she immediately took from her pocket, and carried in her hands; at the same time cautioning her companions to take whatever of value they had with them from their pockets. They did so, and on returning to the Adams House they found that their dresses had all been cut, and their pockets taken.

The value of linseed oil and cotton for burns has long been known. Here is a case of its use, which shows the danger of binding it too closely, when placed upon a wound: A child in Fredericton, New Brunswick, a few days ago, burned its leg against a stove; the mother immediately applied linseed oil and cotton-wool, with a tight bandage over all; in a short time the screams of the child induced the mother to remove the bandage, when it was discovered that the cotton-wool had taken fire, and had considerably increased the size of the burn.

John Whitcomb was appointed Postmaster at Hancock, Mass., in 1812, and has held the office ever since—41 years. He was appointed under Madison, and has served under ten Presidents. The town contains 1500 inhabitants, a large portion of whom differ from Mr. W. in politics.

Rev. Albert Barnes has returned to his home from Europe, in his usual health. It is hoped that by rest his impaired eye-sight will be wholly restored.

We have before mentioned the sad probability that the steam propeller Oneida foundered with all on board during the late storm on Lake Erie. The Boston Courier says in relation to this: We are informed by Mr. S. T. Bacon, of this city, that there is no longer any doubt of the loss of the Oneida, and but little hope remains that any of those on board were saved. The Keystone State passed the Oneida keeled up, and for nine miles above Dunkirk the beach was strewn with portions of the wreck and cargo, but no bodies were seen. One small boat washed ashore stove to pieces, and the other with the papers and books of the Oneida; also, the provision box had come on shore.

Four young lads, respectively of the ages of twelve years, were arrested by officer Sickles, at the Albany and Schenectady Railroad Depot, on Saturday evening. They belonged in Williamsburgh, and had arrived in Albany by steamboat on Saturday morning. They started on foot for Schenectady, at which place they arrived at near sundown. Not liking the place or the inhabitants, they started again for Albany, taking the railroad route. The conductor on the next train down, seeing the lads at the stopping place, took them on the cars and brought them to Albany. They are very smart and intelligent.

An English barber claims to have invented a new touch in the hair restorative art. It consists of a machine containing combs and brushes, so arranged and constructed as to produce a galvanic current when used. The teeth of the combs are made of copper and zinc alternately, and continued back to a chamber in the hind part of the comb, in which is placed a flannel saturated with salt water as an excitant. The object of the invention is to excite an electric current when the combs or brushes are used. The brushes are made of fine copper and zinc in place of bristles.

Daniel Street and wife, father and mother of four children, deck passengers on board the steamer James Millinger from St. Louis to Louisville, recently committed suicide under the following circumstances: When near Evansville, the wife seized the youngest child, an infant, and jumped into the river. The husband immediately followed. The three remaining children were taken care of by passengers, and landed at New Albany in charge of their grandfather. Nearly $60 were contributed by passengers for the support of the children.

A dispatch dated New Orleans, Monday, Dec. 6, 1852, says: Great preparations are making for the funeral pageant next Thursday, the 9th inst., in honor of Clay, Webster, and Calhoun. The eulogy on Clay will be delivered by Judge McCabb; on Webster, by Christian Roselius; and on Calhoun, by Judge Eustis. There will be an immense procession, and minute guns will be fired. It is expected to be the grandest display ever known in New Orleans.

At Xenia, Ohio, on the 30th ult., a grinding powder mill, belonging to Messrs. Austin, King & Co., exploded, completely destroying the building and the machinery. Fortunately, no lives were lost, and no personal injury sustained by any of the large number of persons engaged in the mills. The supposition is, that some part of the machinery gave way, and that the friction thereby produced elicited a spark of fire which ignited the powder.

A letter from Cape Haytien, dated Nov. 19, says that the French Naval forces have taken possession of Samana, in St. Domingo, commanding the Mona Passage, between Hayti and Porto Rico, and design to hold it as a naval station, unless the United States should object. The first part of this report appears to us quite probable. Samana is a considerable island at the North of the Bay of Samana, one of the safest harbors in the world.

The Legislature of Mississippi was petitioned last winter for a Prohibitory Liquor Law, after the Maine model, by the people of three townships in the metropolitan County of Hinds, and passed an act prohibiting the sale of liquors in those towns, provided the people, by a direct vote, should so decide. The vote was taken at the late election, and the law emphatically sustained.

The Report of the Secretary of War says that during the past year, out of about 11,000 officers and men, comprising the army, 8,000 have been employed in the defense of Texas, New Mexico, California and Oregon, or of emigrants destined to the two last. With the exception of the Rio Grande country, which has been disturbed by the movements of Caravajal, Texas has generally been free from Indian depredations.

H. Lecount was executed at Cincinnati on Friday, Dec. 3, for the murder of Mr. Clinch, in a drunken brawl. The criminal was forty-seven years of age, and left a wife and six children the inheritance of his ignominy. He attributed his crimes, disgrace and felon's end to that bane of man—strong drink—which fired a fierce, ungovernable temper. The execution was in private.

The Railroad route between New London and Stonington has been surveyed and found favorable for a railroad connection between those points, and the stock has been taken and the road will be built at once. The distance is eleven miles. This will make another direct land route between this City and Boston.

Of invalid pensioners there are 5,986 enrolled, and 4,232 have been paid.

We have advices from Mexico to Nov. 20. Count Raousset-Boulbon has not only defeated the Mexican troops in Sonora, but has proclaimed that State annexed to France! Uraga, the revolutionary leader in Guadalajaxa, was expected to put the federal forces in that region to utter rout, and the revolution was generally in a prosperous condition.

The quantity of lumber surveyed at Bangor annually, averages about 200,000,000 feet, and the value cannot fall short of $3,000,000. The quantity this year is not so great as last, but the price has been a dollar a thousand higher.

Church Bells.

CHURCH, FACTORY, AND STEAMBOAT BELLS constantly on hand, and Peals or Chimes of Bells (of any number) cast to order. Improved cast-iron Yokes, with moveable arms, are attached to these Bells so that they may be adjusted to ring easily and properly, and Springs also which prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. Hangings complete, (including Yoke, Frame, and Wheel,) furnished if desired. The horns by which the Bell is suspended, admit of the Yoke being changed to a new position, and thus bringing the blow of the clapper in a new place; which is desirable after some years' usage, as it diminishes the probability of the Bell's breaking, occasioned by repeated blows of the clapper in one place.

An experience of thirty years in the business has given the subscribers an opportunity of ascertaining the best form for Bells, the various combinations of metals, and the degree of heat requisite for securing the greatest solidity, strength, and most melodious tones, and has enabled them to secure for their Bells the highest awards at the N. Y. State Agricultural Society and American Institute, at their Annual Fairs, for several years past. The Trinity Chimes of New York were completed at this Foundry, as were also cast Chimes for New Orleans, La., Oswego and Rochester, N. Y., and Kingston, C. W., and also the Fire Alarm Bells of New York, the largest ever cast in this country.

Miscellaneous.

Modern Crusoes.

We extract the following from a letter written by an Indian officer on sick leave :—

"After leaving Java Head we had a fresh breeze from the south-east, and as we had been unable to take in water at Anger, the captain decided upon doing so at some small islands I had never heard the name of before; they are called the Cocoas, and are about 700 or 800 miles to the southward and westward of Java Head. Their history is rather curious. A Captain Ross, formerly of the East Indian service, lives on them with his family. Before Borneo was given up to the Dutch, he was Governor of it, and while there, he advised the English Government to allow him to build a sloop of war, as there was such magnificent timber.

"She was launched only the day before the island was given up; but the Dutch allowed him to finish her, and the English Government then made a present of her to Captain Ross as a reward for his services. He cruised about in her for many years, and, as it were, re-discovered these islands, for they had been known to exist, although never visited. He took a fancy to them, wrote home to England, and brought out the whole of his family. The English Government refusing him protection, he has placed himself under that of the Dutch, and got 300 Malay slaves, whom he liberated upon arriving in the islands, and formed a settlement there.

"His ship was lost on a voyage to Batavia, and he was many years without having any intercourse with the world; but being nearly starved—for the islands produce little more than cocoanut trees—he built a schooner, making the ropes of the cocoanut fibre, and the sails of the thick bark that is round the cocoanut tree just below the branches. He was just sailing when a whaler put into the island, and from her he procured canvas and went to Batavia, since which time he has traded regularly there, selling cocoanut oil, of which he makes great quantities, having a steam-engine of ten horse power to bruise and press the nut. About the sixth day from Java Head we sighted the islands, which are very low, covered to the water's edge with trees. There are about 24 of them, the largest of them not three-quarters of a mile abroad; they are in a circle, reefs joining them, and forming a magnificent lagoon, to which there is only one entrance. I went on shore early the morning after we anchored, and pulled about three miles up the lagoon to the settlement. Their chief amusement appears to be sailing boats, of which there are immense numbers, and managed beautifully. I counted nearly 30 as we pulled up, sailing away to the different islands to pick up the nuts.

"Capt. Ross is a strange, gaunt-looking man; he and his sons resemble Robinson Crusoes. They live in wooden houses, raised about ten feet, on piles, from the ground, and are as rough as you can well imagine. They have books, and the quantity Capt. Ross has read is wonderful. He has been 26 years in the islands. The Malays are a lazy set of fellows; he pays them so much a day, and so well that they won't work more than two or three days a week. The greatest punishment he inflicts is to banish them from the islands.

Quiddling.

We once knew a gentleman, whose favorite interrogatory phrase was, "How goes the enemy?" meaning time. And in fact, that precious friend of man is treated, as if he were the worst of enemies, to be abused, killed, got rid of in some way, by some artifice or deception. Among the ingenious contrivances to this effect, one of the most successful hitherto discovered, is undoubtedly that known by the name of Quiddling. If "Procrastination is the thief of Time," Quiddling is its assassin. Where a man only puts off the performance of something for an hour or a day, there is still some opportunity left to do some other act in the meanwhile. He may be said to treat time politely, as an acquaintance or a companion, according to the world's fashion, which exacts only the semblance, not the substance of a benefaction. But the Quiddler cannot, by any body's ethics, be taken for a friend of time. He kills him. For, while madam or sir is annihilating the golden moments by a destructive mixture of worthless alloy, they cannot, like the procrastinator, be doing any thing else.

And what is quiddling, pray? "I don't remember," says one, "to have heard it enumerated among the mortal sins, as you make it, when you charge the offender to be guilty of murder." We will tell you what it is. It is spending five minutes in doing a thing "just so," when the variation of a hair's breadth would make no difference. It is waiting a quarter of an hour before the glass to adjust a curl, or give a graceful turn or color to a moustache. It is the consumption of a whole forenoon to dress for a walk, or of an entire afternoon to get ready for an evening party. This consumption of time can boast of more victims than the more talked-of one of the lungs. He who is forever getting ready to do something, and never does it, is a quiddler. Life, as some live it, is an enormous preface to a meager work not finished, sometimes not begun.

If this matter were viewed as seriously as it ought, there might be a pathetic song written on quiddle, quiddle, quiddle, as on "work, work, work." A poor laborer is waiting for his breakfast; how lamentably the good house-wife spins round and round, cutting all manner of figures, but not cutting up the bread nor ham. Here is a pretty fellow, who takes a quarter of an hour to tie his cravat, a quarter to put on his coat, double that time to brush his hair, pull on his gloves, and so on. If he has a letter to dispatch, he is so tedious in selecting the paper and pen, and so shockingly nice and prosy in its composition, and so curiously particular and slow in affixing an appropriate, but ten to one a mistaken and fantastic seal, that the mail starts off without it.

This habit is very costly in more ways than one. None, therefore, but rich people can afford to be quiddlers. It is a luxury, which, like the dyspepsia and gout, poor folks must not think of enjoying, any more than the privilege of lying abed till 9 or 10; then toying an hour, as some hygenists recommend, over breakfast, two hours over dinner, another over a third, and perhaps a fourth meal; thus reducing the definition of a human being to one who spends all his time in eating, sleeping and dressing, and the remainder in drinking.

It is a sad misfortune to an author, or an artist, if the spirit of quiddling once insinuates itself. We cannot stop to relate its mischiefs now—how it injured Akenside's Pleasures of the Imagination, and drove Allston to paint half a dozen Belshazzar's Feasts one over the other, some worse and some better than the fragment finally left, which was made the fragment it is by quiddling.

If husband and wife are sinners in this respects alike, time ambles smoothly enongh, but to no purpose. If one alone is guilty, the yoke is carried unevenly, and trouble ensues. It has been said already that quiddling is an expensive pleasure. One instance must suffice, and conclude this dissertation. A few weeks ago the following scene occurred: "Are you coming, my dear, I shall be late?" "Yes, husband, I shall be ready in a minute. I have only my hat to put on." That was true; it had been equally true, for full twenty minutes since she began to do it. Again the husband, "Come, come, wife, really I must go." "Almost ready," blandly replied the lady, in the quietest tones. "Jeanette, positively, I'll go, can't stop another second," and the front door was heard to open, before which the carriage had been waiting five and forty minutes, during most of which time the lady been hard at work in drawing on her gloves and adjusting her bonnet, for all the rest of her rig was completed before. On hearing the opening of the door she was aware the case was pressing, so began to move down stairs gently, looking extremely nice, but not so tasteful in some of her arrangements, as they were thirty minutes before she had altered them for the worse. At length they were off, and arrived in Wall-st. just in time for the husband to learn that the subscription book for a certain stock, which we shall not mention, had been closed pursuant to previous notice just six minutes and a half. Yesterday, he might have sold the shares reserved for him to the last moment, at two thousand dollars advance. "A costly hat, and an expensive wearer of it! But the wealthy have indulgences that others know not of, "and don't want to," somebody, looking over my shoulder, says. [Newark Adv.

Louis Napoleon.

The Brooklyn Daily Advertiser, moralizing upon the rapid ascent of Louis Napoleon up the ladder of ambition, from positive poverty to superlative grandeur and power, recalls some reminiscences of his sojourn in that city many years ago. The editor says :—

"Strange events have occurred within a few years, in reference to that man. We knew him whilst he was residing in New York, at a lodging house in Reade street, then kept by a gentleman who now occupies a high official position under the French Government. At that time, he was very poor, and very dissipated. Notoriously profligate in his habits, and without the pecuniary ability to indulge in the full bent of his inclination the culpable propensities which characterized him, he was frequently expelled from certain places in which he obtruded himself, and more than a dozen times was the occupant of a cell at the old jail in the Park, long since torn down.

"Not long prior to his leaving the United States, he was arrested for a misdemeanor committed by him at the disreputable house of a woman, whose establishment he often visited, and the writer of this article was employed professionally by him to save him from the threatened consequences of his recklessness and indiscretion. We little supposed at that time, that the thoughtless, gay young man who was then our client, (and who is still indebted to us for counsel-fees and disbursements,) would become Emperor of France. Such, however, is now his 'manifest destiny,' although we believe that his realization of his ambitious hopes and aspirations will but hasten the fearful doom which unquestionably impends over him."

The Lady Freemason.

Hon. Elizabeth St. Leger, was the only female who was ever initiated into the ancient and honorable mystery of Freemasonry. How she obtained this honor, we shall lay before our readers, premising that our information is derived from the best sources. Lord Doneraile, Miss St. Leger's father, a very zealous Mason, held a warrant and occasionally opened lodge at Doneraile House, his sons and some intimate friends assisting; and it is said, that never were masonic duties more rigidly performed than by the brethren of No. 150, the number of their warrant. It appears that previously to the initiation of a gentleman to the first steps of masonry, Miss St. Leger, who was a young girl, happened to be in an apartment adjoining the room generally used as a lodge room; but whether the young lady was there by design or accident, we cannot confidently state. The room at the time was undergoing some alteration; amongst other things, the wall was considerably reduced in one part, for the purpose of making a saloon. The young lady, having heard the voices of the Freemasons, and being prompted by the curiosity natural to all, to see this mystery so long and so secretly locked up from public view, had the courage to pick a brick from the wall with her scissors, and thus witnessed the two first steps of the ceremony.

Curiosity gratified, fear at once took possession of her mind, and those who understand this passage well know what the feelings of any person must be who could unlawfully behold that ceremony; let them then judge what were the feelings of a young girl under such extraordinary circumstances. There was no mode of escape, except through the very room where the concluding part of the second step was still being solemnized, at the far end, and the room a very large one. Miss St. Leger had resolution sufficient to attempt her escape that way, and with light but trembling steps glided along unobserved, laid her hand on the handle of the door, and opening it, before her stood, to her dismay, a grim and surly Tiler, with his long sword unsheathed.
